The church of ST. MICHAEL is a CHURCH small structure re-erected on the old site in 1775, chiefly in blue and red brick. A church is known to have stood here in the 12th century, but the only fragment remaining of it is a piece of stone in the rectory garden carved with zigzag ornament. The plan of the present building is a plain rectangle 32 ft. 7 in. by 17 ft., with a small chancel 5 ft. 10 in. deep and 17 ft. wide, having an apse to the east. The windows are all round-headed ; there were three on either side of the nave, but the south-west has been partly filled in and its place taken by the entrance doorway ; the former entrance was evidently in the west wall, which has been rebuilt at a later date. The roof is gabled and tiled ; the ceiling is barrel vaulted in plaster. Over the west end is a small wood bell-cot, on which hangs a small modern bell. The furniture is all modern except an 18th-century pulpit, and the font, which has a white marble bowl carved in relief with cherubs' heads and foliage ; the stem is of stone, and has a band of carving in high relief, with figures apparently representing the bringing of the children to our Lord, the head of every one wherever possible having been broken off, evidently a work of premeditated malice or mischief. The work appears to be Italian and of 18th-century date, the stem and the bowl having originally no connexion.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, paten and alms dish of 1707, the gift of Maria Phillips.<sup>53a</sup>

The registers before 1812 are in a single book, baptisms beginning 1702, marriages 1754 and burials 1742.

In the churchyard south of the building is an old yew tree.

There was a church in Crux ADVOWSON Easton at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>53</sup> The advowson followed the descent of the manor<sup>54</sup> until the latter half of the 18th century, when it was sold by the Lisles. In

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

1795 it was in the possession of a certain John Smith<sup>55</sup> and since that date has passed through many hands, being at the present day in the gift of Mrs. Charles de Havilland.

The schools were erected in 1847 at a cost of £333 for thirty children.

There are, it appears, no endowed charities in this parish.

FACCOMBE

Faccan cumbe (x cent.); Faccumbe (xi cent.); Fackumbe, Facumb, Faucumb (xiii cent.); Fackombe (xiv cent.); Faccum, Facham (xvi cent.).

The parish of Facombe contains 2,669 acres, and is situated in the extreme north of Hampshire, 7 miles north-west from Hurstbourne station on the London and South Western Railway, and 8½ miles north by east from Andover. Pilot Hill in the north-eastern extremity of the parish reaches a height of 900 ft. above the ordnance datum, and from here the ground sweeps down westwards to the beautiful and picturesque valley in which the hamlet of Netherton is situated. The main manor of Facombe had its centre at Netherton, and it was here that the parish church of St. Michael originally stood. A meadow, now called Old Orchard, which still shows traces of a large building, marks the site of the old manor-house called Facombe Court.<sup>1</sup> Netherton Hall, now serving as the rectory, is a plain brick house of 18th-century date. The village of Facombe is situated at a height of about 750 ft. above the ordnance datum, about a mile east of Netherton, at the junction of the road from Netherton with one running north from Hurstbourne Tarrant to Combe. To the west of the road to Combe are the modern church of St. Barnabas, towards the cost of which the late Mr. Allan Borman Heath gave the land and £500,<sup>2</sup> and the schools which were opened in 1866 for thirty-five children. To the east is Facombe Manor House, the residence of Mr. Allan Borman Heath, prettily situated in a park of about 50 acres. The house was modernized by the late Mr. Allan Borman Heath,<sup>3</sup> and represents the old manor-house of Facombe Upstreet, formerly the property of the Sandys. Facombe Wood covers the whole of the south-western portion of the parish.

The parish contains 1,024 acres of arable land, 158½ acres of permanent grass and 563 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>4</sup> The soil is light loam and rubble, the subsoil is chalk. The chief crops are wheat, oats and turnips. Among place-names mentioned in early records are Iwynespuynde,<sup>5</sup> Pykmerscrofte,<sup>6</sup> Stroclynchesacre,<sup>7</sup> Haldewey,<sup>8</sup> Bygges-

FACCOMBE was part of the ancient MANORS demesne of the Crown, and at the time of the Domesday Survey was held at farm of the king by Roger of Poitou, younger son of Earl Roger de Montgomery, for £16 a year, although it was only worth £13 a year.<sup>23</sup> In 1167 a certain Alan rendered account of 1 mark for Facombe.<sup>24</sup> From him it seems to have passed to Richard de Solers, lord of the manor of Shipton Solers (co. Glouc.),<sup>25</sup> who was holding it in John's reign by the service of one knight's fee.<sup>26</sup> It fell to King John as escheat of the Normans, and was divided into three parts. From it in 1207 he granted land worth 100s. to Thomas Peverel to hold during his good pleasure,<sup>27</sup> while the rest of the manor he divided between William Cosyn and Oliver de Punchardon, although there seems to be no record of this grant preserved.<sup>28</sup> William Briwere, as sheriff of the county, disseised Oliver of his land 'for an ancient debt owed by his ancestors to the ancestors of King John,' but in 1216 was ordered to restore it to Oliver, who was then in the king's service at Nottingham.<sup>29</sup> Oliver's property in Facombe was augmented in 1221 by the grant of the land formerly held by Thomas Peverel.<sup>30</sup> This grant was during the king's pleasure only, however, and was not made permanent until 1231, in which year Henry III granted to Oliver and his heirs that half of the manor which he had previously held of the king's bailiwick, until the king should restore it to the right heirs.<sup>31</sup>

As to the part of the manor granted to William Cosyn by King John, an entry occurs in the Red Book of the Exchequer to the effect that William Cosyn, Thomas Peverel and Oliver de Punchardon were then (1211) holding the knight's fee formerly belonging to Richard de Solers.<sup>32</sup> In the Testa de Nevill William Cosyn is returned as holding two parts of Faccombe and Tangley in conjunction with

Oliver de Punchardon by the service of two parts of one knight's fee,<sup>33</sup> while there is a further entry to the effect that Nicholas son of William Cosyn was holding land in the manor worth £2 18s. by the service of the third part of one knight's fee, and was in the wardship of his father, who had lately married another wife, whereas he ought to have been in the wardship of the king.<sup>34</sup> A later return which shows that Richard de Punchardon, who in 1231 had given the king 20 marks to have the custody of the lands and heirs of his brother Oliver,<sup>35</sup> was holding the whole manor of the king in chief by the service of one knight's fee,<sup>36</sup> seems to point to the fact that by this time the Cosyns had given up their portion of the manor to the Punchardons, and they appear in the reign of Edward III as villeins in the manor. From this time until the reign of Henry VI,<sup>37</sup> when the Cosyns rebelled against their lord, the names of Cosyn and of Cosynstreet frequently occur on the Faccombe court-rolls. At a court held in 1426 it was presented that Richard and Hugh Cosyn and John Paulet, junior, on Michaelmas Day, 1425, had lain in ambush at Cosynstreet in Faccombe, and had so beaten, wounded and maltreated John Punchardon that his life was despaired of.<sup>38</sup> Another attack on his life was described by his son Richard Punchardon. John Punchardon was lying in bed on the night of the Sunday before St. John at the Latin Gate (16 May 1426), when Hugh, Giles, Peter, Thomas and Richard Cosyn (all described as 'laborers') of Faccombe, Richard Badderley, yeoman, and Robert Anglote 'Frensheman' and Robert Frytt, of Newbury, hosier, and others, came and dragged him out of his bed into a field called Fyfe-acres and there struck him a number of blows, from any one of which he would have died.<sup>39</sup> In the same year Richard Cosyn 'with others of his affinity and following marched to the lord's court at Faccombe with bows, arrows, swords and shields, and so terrified the seneschals sitting in court that the law-day was not held.'<sup>40</sup> Swift vengeance, however, overtook the insurgents. Peter Cosyn, Giles Cosyn and Thomas Cosyn and many of their followers were hanged.<sup>41</sup> Richard Cosyn left his tenement never to return,<sup>42</sup> and after the manumission of one John Cosyn in 1433<sup>43</sup> the name of these early lords of the manor disappears from the court rolls, although it is still preserved in Curzon Street Farm, a short distance to the east of the village.

To return to the Punchardons, who in 1232 held the whole manor of Faccombe, which consequently was sometimes called PUNCHARDONS or FACCOMBE PUNCHARDON. In 1280 Oliver de Punchardon, probably grandson of the original grantee, had come of age and succeeded to the manor, for in that year he proved his right to it and claimed the assize of bread and ale there.<sup>44</sup> Fifteen years later it was ascertained by inquisition ad quod damnum that it would be no damage if Oliver cut down 50 acres of wood in his wood of Faccombe within the royal forest of Chute, since only his tenants lived there and they desired it.<sup>45</sup> Hence two years later licence to that effect was granted to him on condition that for five years he inclosed the 50 acres with a small dyke and low hedge so that the deer could get in and out.<sup>46</sup> He died seised of the manor in 1323, leaving a son and heir Robert, aged forty,<sup>47</sup> on whom the manor was settled in fee-tail in 1324.<sup>48</sup> However, since Robert died without issue in the following year, the manor passed to his brother and heir Oliver, parson of the church of Faccombe<sup>49</sup>, who granted the reversion to Bartholomew de Punchardon in 1346.<sup>50</sup> Bartholomew, however, predeceased Oliver, who died seised of the manor in 1356. He was succeeded by Oliver son of Bartholomew, aged sixteen,<sup>51</sup> who died in 1417, leaving a son and heir John, aged forty.<sup>52</sup> On the death of John in 1427<sup>53</sup> Faccombe passed to his son and heir Richard,<sup>54</sup> who died forty years later, leaving a son and heir Walter.<sup>55</sup> Walter died while under age in 1479, his heirs being his three sisters, Maud, who married first William Okeden and secondly William Cooke, Philippa wife of Thomas or William Lewston of Lewston (co. Dors.)<sup>56</sup> and Anne wife of Thomas Sendy.<sup>57</sup> Hence the partition of the manor into three parts, and the formation in the 16th century of the so-called manors of FACCOMBE KNIGHTS and FACCOMBE SENDY.

of the manor to John Okeden, grandson of Maud,<sup>68</sup> who had already succeeded to one-third of the manor on the death of his father William in 1517.<sup>69</sup> In 1544 John Okeden sold two-thirds of the manor by the name of 6 messuages, 6 gardens, 6 orchards, 150 acres of land, 12 acres of meadow, 150 acres of pasture, 180 acres of wood, 50 acres of furze and heath and 10s. rent in Facombe and half of the manor of Facombe to Michael Kydwelly with remainder to Peter Kydwelly and Joan his wife and their heirs.<sup>69</sup> Michael held a court in Facombe in 1546,<sup>61</sup> but by 1574 the property had passed to William Kydwelly, probably a son of Peter Kydwelly,<sup>62</sup> who by will dated 20 December 1574 bequeathed it to his widow Jane.<sup>63</sup> Jane did not long survive her husband, but died on 13 March 1575, when the property passed to her brother Robert Knight, aged twenty-nine.<sup>64</sup> Hence it was sometimes called the manor of FACCOMBE KNIGHTS. Four years later Robert Knight sold his inheritance to Andrew Reade,<sup>65</sup> who in 1583 bought up the remaining third part of the manor,<sup>66</sup> which by this time was known as the manor of FACCOMBE SENDY, the previous history of which is as follows. It passed, as has been seen above, on the death of Walter Punchardon in 1457 to Anne wife of Thomas Sendy. She predeceased her husband, who was still living in 1518 and was then holding it as a free tenement.<sup>67</sup> He, however, died before 27 January 1536, on which day his son and heir Arthur held a court in conjunction with John Okeden.<sup>68</sup> About this time Arthur Sendy came to an agreement with John Okeden, the holder of the other two-thirds, by which farms and copyholds were exchanged and each had a compact property, although the woods, copses, wastes and royalties of the manor as also rents called 'Martyn Rent' and 'Stick Eggs' were left in common to be divided equally between them in the proportion of one to two.<sup>69</sup> Arthur Sendy died seised of the third part of the manor of Facombe in 1557, leaving a son and heir William,<sup>70</sup> on whose death in 1575<sup>71</sup> it passed in dower to his widow Agnes,<sup>72</sup> who held a court in conjunction with Andrew, Henry, Richard and Robert Reade on 13 April 1579.<sup>73</sup> She died four months later, and the property then passed by the name of two-thirds (though properly one-third) of the manor of Facombe to her son Arthur.<sup>74</sup> Arthur held a court baron of his so-called manor of Facombe Sendy on 22 October 1582.<sup>75</sup> A year later, as he was then living in 'Gosheies' (co. Essex), he made arrangements with his agent to dispose of his property, and the latter managed so well, alleging that he had often been offered £1,200 for the premises, that he secured £1,100 from Andrew Reade, whereas he had never been offered even £1,000 from the other bidders, Thomas Webb of Salisbury, Robert Oxenbridge and John Gunter.<sup>76</sup> Andrew, subsequently discovering how he had been duped, tried to get some of his money back,<sup>77</sup> but whether successfully or not is unknown. Thus by 1583 the three original shares had become re-united and in the possession of Andrew Reade. He died seised of the manor of Facombe in 1623, leaving a son and heir Henry,<sup>78</sup> who died in 1647, when the manor passed to his son Francis,<sup>79</sup> who in 1655 sold it to Sir Berkeley Lucy.<sup>80</sup> From the latter it descended to Sir Berkeley Lucy, bart., who dealt with it by recovery in 1693<sup>81</sup> and by fine in 1727.<sup>82</sup> Sir Berkeley died without male issue in 1759 and was buried in the old church of St. Michael Facombe.<sup>83</sup> He left an only daughter and heiress Mary Lucy, wife of the Hon. Charles Compton, youngest son of George fourth Earl of Northampton.<sup>84</sup> The manor was probably sold soon after the death of Sir Berkeley, but its subsequent history is somewhat uncertain. However, it ultimately passed to the Everett family, Joseph Everett being the lord of the manor in the beginning of the 19th century.<sup>85</sup> In 1858, some time after his death, his representatives sold the manor to Mr. William Hawkins Heath, from whom it descended some ten years afterwards to his son and heir, Mr. Allan Borman Heath, of East Woodhay.<sup>86</sup> The latter converted an old farm-house into the present manor-house in 1878-80, and owned the manor till his death on 10 November 1893. His second son, Mr. Allan Borman Heath, of Facombe Manor, carried on the estate until October 1902, when, in accordance with the terms of his father's will, he sold it to Mr. W. P. Taylor of Colthorpe Park (co. Oxon.).<sup>87</sup> The present lord of the manor is Mr. E. Fisher Kelly of Northerwood House, Lyndhurst, who purchased the estate from Mr. W. P. Taylor in 1907.<sup>88</sup>

The manor of FACCOMBE FIFHYDE, FIFHYDES, FACCOMBE SANDYS or FACCOMBE UPSTREET probably originated in the 6 messuages, 5 virgates of land, 100 acres of wood, 200 acres of pasture and £2 3s. 1d. rent in Facombe and 'La Strete' which Peter de Punchardon acquired in fee from Oliver de Punchardon in 1325, and sold shortly afterwards to Florence, Henry and Giles de Pun-See Hutchins, Dors. iv, 128-9 and iii, 469, and the inquisition on the death of Maud in 1501, in which William is returned as her son and heir (Chan. Inq. p.m. [Ser. 2], xv, 40).

SANDYS. Argent a ragged cross sable.

His heir was his cousin Joan, who married first Sir John Sandys and secondly Sir Thomas Skelton, and died seised of the so-called manor of Faccombe in 1415.<sup>94</sup> From this time the manor remained in the Sandys family until 1668,<sup>95</sup> when William Lord Sandys released all right in it to Sir Richard Lucy, to whom Frances Reade, widow of Francis Reade, Edward Reade and George Reade eight years before had made over the remainder of a ninety-nine years' lease originally granted by William Lord Sandys in 1573 to Hercules Ameredeth at a rent of £13 14s. and transferred by him to Andrew Reade in 1577. At the same time Sir William Lucy acquired the remainder of a further lease of seventy years<sup>96</sup> granted to Thomas Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, by William Lord Sandys in 1600 at a rent of £14 and made over by him to Andrew Reade in 1610.<sup>97</sup> As early as 1633 the right of the Sandys to the manor seems to have been merely nominal, for in that year Henry Reade held a court at Faccombe Upstreet described as 'of late Lord Sandys,'<sup>98</sup> whereas earlier courts held in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I are described as held by Andrew Reade and others, farmers of the manor by virtue of an unexpired lease of the manor made by William Lord Sandys in 1573.<sup>99</sup> The two manors of Faccombe naturally merged when they fell into the hands of Sir Richard Lucy, and from that date their history is identical.

A fairly complete and interesting series of court rolls of the manors from 1371 to 1633<sup>100</sup> exists at the British Museum. The boundaries of the chief manor as they existed in 1530 were quoted by a husbandman named Ambrose Brooker at a court held by Arthur Sendy on 22 October 1582 as extending 'from Butbancke shooting north and south from the south end of Butbancke, keeping Tangle church way which lyeth on the south syde of Rymer's pond until you come to Turnynge Thorne keeping the way to Road Gate, from Road Gate keeping Grymes Ditch untill you come to Westwoode end which is Punkerton's Woode.'<sup>101</sup> From the court-rolls it also appears that the chief manor was often called Faccombe Netherton from its position, while Faccombe Upstreet is the name usually given to the second manor.<sup>102</sup> There was a good deal of jealousy between the farmers of these two manors,<sup>103</sup> and it was repeatedly laid down that the lords of both had exactly equal rights to pasture for their animals on Chaldon or Chaldown.<sup>104</sup>

The miller of Faccombe was frequently presented at court for taking excessive toll,<sup>105</sup> from the 14th to the 16th century. Possibly the mill which had existed since the time of the Domesday Survey<sup>106</sup> had fallen into disuse in the later century. Careful watch was kept on the morals of the villagers, and at courts held in 1449 and 1450 an attempt was made to check excessive gambling among the villagers by forbidding them to play at 'trevgobet,' cards or pat-ball for money.<sup>107</sup> However, the gambling continued, and heavy fines were inflicted frequently on those who played cards, skittles, and bowls contrary to the form of the statute<sup>108</sup>; moreover, on one occasion at least the tithingman was fined for failing to present those inhabitants whose custom it was to play at bowls every Sunday in the churchyard.<sup>109</sup>

In 1514 Henry VIII by letters patent exempted the men of the manor of Faccombe from contributing towards the cost of knights of the shire representing them in Parliament.<sup>110</sup>

The church of ST. BARNABAS was CHURCH erected of stone and flint in 1866; the former parish church was a very small building at Netherton, but it was entirely demolished when the Faccombe church was finished, only the font being retained. The present building has a chancel

He acquired the tenements without licence, and in 1326 paid a fine of 6 marks for licence to retain them. The suggestion that these tenements were the nucleus of this manor seems to be supported by the fact that it was usually called the manor of Faccombe Upstreet.

17 ft. 6 in. by 15 ft. 6 in. with a north vestry, nave 52 ft. by 21 ft. 2 in., south porch and a more recently completed tower 9 ft. square inside. The style is that of the 14th century. The tower is of two stages; the bell-chamber is lighted to the south by a two-light traceried window and on the other three sides by quatrefoils. In it hang two modern bells.

The font bowl is of 12th-century workmanship; it is round with sloping sides carved with zigzag and two twisted roll moulds; the iron staples which formerly held the cover project from the sides.

Several monuments have been transferred from the old church; on the west wall of the nave is a brass set in a marble frame to Anne wife of Henry Reade and daughter of Sir Thomas Windebanke, kt. 'Clerk of the Signet to Queen Elizabeth and to King James that now is.' Her mother was Frances Dymmocke, daughter of Sir Edward Dymmocke, of 'Skeerlsby,' Lincs., the queen's champion. She died in 1624. Over the inscription are the kneeling figures of the lady, her two sons and three daughters. On the south wall adjacent is a marble tablet with an inscription to Henry Reade, 1647. Further east is an inscription on a brass plate to Mrs. Alice Reade, wife of Robert Reade of Linkenholt, daughter and sole heir of Francis Pooley, who died in 1598. A large monument on the west wall has a pompous inscription to Sir Berkeley Lucy, bart., who died in 1759. There are other later monuments.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, undated, and a silver paten of 1720.

The first book of the registers contains baptisms, marriages and burials mixed from 1585 to 1690; the second has baptisms from 1693 to 1795, marriages 1708 to 1754, and burials 1678 to 1794. It will be seen that there is a hiatus in the marriages from 1690 to 1708. The third book has marriages from 1755 to 1812, and the fourth baptisms and burials 1795 to 1812.

The advowson of the church of ADVOWSON Faccombe followed the same descent as the manor of Faccombe until the reign of King John, who, as has been shown, divided the manor into three parts. From King John it passed to Henry III, who on 14 March 1266-7<sup>111</sup> granted it to Oliver de Punchardon in reward for his faithful service to himself and his eldest son Prince Edward.<sup>112</sup> It remained in the Punchardon family until 1348,<sup>113</sup> in which year Oliver de Punchardon granted it to William de Fifhyde. Bartholomew de Punchardon, brother and next heir of Oliver, confirmed the grant, and the whole transaction was ratified by Edward III.<sup>114</sup> William de Fifhyde presented the rectors until his death in 1360,<sup>115</sup> when the advowson reverted to the Crown during the minority of his son and heir William.<sup>116</sup> Oliver de Punchardon, nephew of the original grantor, thinking this was a good opportunity of recovering the advowson, attempted, but without success, to make good his claim to present.<sup>117</sup> However, some ten years later, when William de Fifhyde, then of age, presented John de Podenhale to the church of Faccombe, Oliver de Punchardon claimed the advowson anew and presented Robert de Cadeham.<sup>118</sup> The bishop, on 13 October 1375, issued a prohibition to proceed further pending a trial of right. The verdict was evidently given in favour of William de Fifhyde, for on 29 October 1375 the prohibition was discharged, and on the following 29 November William presented a certain Thomas Tozande,<sup>119</sup> whose title was finally confirmed in 1398.<sup>120</sup> From this time the advowson followed the same descent as the manor of Faccombe Fifhyde or Faccombe Sandys until 1858.<sup>121</sup> In that year, as has been shown, the Faccombe estate was sold to Mr. William Hawkins Heath. The advowson was not included in this sale, and still belongs to the Everett family.<sup>122</sup>

In 1603 Andrew Reade petitioned the king for pardon for a supposed simony in presenting to the living.<sup>123</sup>

There are several interesting entries on the episcopal registers relating to the church of Faccombe. Thus it appears that during Henry Woodlock's episcopacy (1305-16) the fruits of the church were sequestered for some time in order that certain necessary repairs might be done to the chancel.<sup>124</sup> An edict of 1396 shows that the health of Thomas Tozande, rector of Faccombe, was so bad that he was forced to procure a chaplain to officiate during Lent.<sup>125</sup>

A survey of the rectory and parsonage of Faccombe was made in 1618 previous to the exchange of glebe-land called Parsonage Croft with Andrew Reade for other land of the same extent.<sup>126</sup> The parsonage-house is thus described, 'One fayre parsonage howse much thereof new builded and a seller made by Mr. Andrew Reade esquire with dyverse outhowes called the upper kitchen and brewhowse, also new builded with a stable, two parsonage barnes and a pigeon howse and certaine backside with stone walles about them made by the said Andrew Reade, and an orcharde and medow grounde thereunto adjoyninge on the south side thereof.'<sup>127</sup>

There are no endowed charities in this parish.

HURSTBOURNE TARRANT

Esseborne (xi cent.); Hesseburna, Esseburna regis (xii cent.); Husseburn, Huphusseburn, Hussheburn (xiii cent.); Husseburne Tarrent (xiv cent.); Husband Tarrant, Uphusband (xviii cent.).

Hurstbourne Tarrant, a large parish containing 4,841 acres, is situated about  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles north-west from Hurstbourne station on the main line of the London and South Western Railway. The village lies on the left bank of the Swift, which rises in the west of the parish, at the junction of the main road from Andover to Newbury with a road running from St. Mary Bourne to Vernhams Dean. It is on the lowest ground in the parish, the road from Andover dropping at Hurstbourne Hill from a height of 568 ft. above the ordnance datum to a height of 324 ft. on the left bank of the stream. When past the village it rises again, and at the summit of Doiley Hill in the north of the parish reaches a height of 526 ft. above the ordnance datum. In the west of the parish the ground is higher still, a height of 710 ft. being attained south of Sheep Down. St. Peter's Church stands on the outskirts of the village north of the road from St. Mary Bourne. Near it is the vicarage, and opposite it on the right bank of the stream are the schools, which were built in 1845 for 130 children.

The hamlet of Prosperous is about a mile north from the village along the road to Newbury. The hamlet of Ibthrope, with its substantial homesteads and half-timber cottages, is situated on the left bank of the stream along the road to Vernhams Dean, about three-quarters of a mile west from Hurstbourne Tarrant. Along the same road on the western borders of the parish is the hamlet of Upton, situated partly in Hurstbourne Tarrant and partly in Vernhams Dean. The schools here were built in 1872.

Doles, in the south of the parish, a house surrounded by woods and copses, is the residence of Mr. Albemarle Willoughby Dewar, the lord of the manor. Doiley Manor, in the north, is the residence of Messrs. Walter Allcroft and William Mulholland, farmers.

The area of the parish comprises 2,985 $\frac{1}{2}$  acres of arable land, 568 $\frac{1}{2}$  acres of permanent grass and 1,054 $\frac{1}{2}$  acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The land is hilly but fertile and productive, and the soil, which is chalky, is well suited to the growth of wheat, barley, oats, turnips and sainfoin. Doles Wood and Grubbed Grounds were inclosed in 1820 under a Private Act of 1818.

At the time of the Domesday Survey MANORS HURSTBOURNE was part of the ancient demesne, and was therefore not assessed, the three manors of Hurstbourne, Basingstoke and Kingsclere being jointly liable for the service of one knight.<sup>5</sup> The manor<sup>6</sup> remained with the Crown for a considerable period (Hamon Boterel being the farmer from 1156 to 1166), and Henry II seems to have had a royal residence in the parish, for there are various entries in the Pipe Rolls of sums disbursed for work on the king's houses in Hurstbourne.<sup>7</sup>

At length Henry II, in 1177, granted the manor to William Malveisin.<sup>8</sup> William Malveisin's widow received £24 2s. from Hurstbourne in 1185,<sup>9</sup> but thirteen years later Richard I granted the manor to John de Lyons, a citizen of Lyons, to hold to him and his heirs by the service of half a knight's fee.<sup>10</sup> King John confirmed this grant in 1201,<sup>11</sup> but soon afterwards he seems to have resumed possession of the manor, possibly on the death of John de Lyons, for in 1205 William Scales paid 10 marks fine to have the vill of Hurstbourne,<sup>12</sup> and a year later Engelard de Cygony, Andrew de Chancels, Geon de Chancels and Peter de Chancels, companions of Gerard de Attoyes, obtained a grant of the manor to hold during the king's pleasure for their support in his service.<sup>13</sup> Henry III, however, restored the manor to John de Lyons, probably a son of the original grantee, in 1233,<sup>14</sup> and a little later the same man, by the name of John 'de Leonibus,' is returned as holding Hurstbourne, valued at £24, of the gift of King Richard.<sup>15</sup> On the death of John de Lyons the younger the manor passed to his daughter and heir Joan, the wife of Geoffrey de Carelieu, whose grant to Pontius Blanchard, another citizen of Lyons, was confirmed by Henry III in 1255.<sup>16</sup> Pontius, however, only held the manor for a short time,<sup>17</sup> for in 1266 Henry III granted it in free alms to Tarrant Nunnery (co. Dors.), a house to which Queen Eleanor was so great a benefactress that it was sometimes styled in records 'Locus benedictus reginae' or 'Locus reginae super Tarent.'<sup>18</sup> It is to its connexion with this nunnery that the manor which had hitherto been called KING'S HURSTBOURNE, HURSTBOURNE REGIS or UP HURSTBOURNE, owes its name of HURSTBOURNE TARRANT. Entries relating to the manor in subsequent Close and Patent Rolls show clearly the favour in which the nunnery continued to be held by the Crown. Thus, in 1292, Edward I, to enable the abbess to satisfy her creditors, granted her licence to sell forty oaks in her wood of Hurstbourne within the bounds of the forest of Finkley.<sup>19</sup> Again in 1302 she was permitted to sell 40 acres of her wood of Hurstbourne in the forest of Chute, since it was ascertained by inquisition that there was no frequent repair of deer there.<sup>20</sup> Further, in 1343, on the petition of the abbes and convent setting forth that their houses and possessions in Dorset had been burned and destroyed by an invasion of the king's enemies in those parts, licence was granted them to cut down and make their profit of 200 acres, at the rate of 20 acres yearly, of underwood in their demesne wood of Hurstbourne in the forest of Chute by the view of the foresters, and when this had been done to inclose the wood after the assize of the forest.<sup>21</sup> The manor remained in the hands of the abbes and convent until the Dissolution,<sup>22</sup> when it became Crown property,<sup>23</sup> and so continued until 1547, in which year Edward VI granted it, at a reserved rent of £6, together with King's Long Coppice, Pikadoles Coppice, Fairelynch Coppice and Hillgrove Coppice within the forest of Chute and the manors of Chitterne (co. Wilts.) and Bramshill (co. Hants) to William Paulet Lord St. John, afterwards first Marquess of Winchester, and his heirs for the maintenance of the fortifications and a garrison of nine men at Netley Castle.<sup>24</sup> The manor continued in the possession of successive Marquesses of Winchester until 1630,<sup>25</sup> when, on the death of the fourth marquess, it passed to his fourth but third surviving son, Lord Charles Paulet, in accordance with a settlement of 1609.<sup>26</sup> Charles, son and heir of the latter, mortgaged it in 1664 for £2,600 to Edmund Ludlow, senior, of Kingston Deverill (co. Wilts.), but was unable to keep up the payment of the interest.<sup>27</sup> Consequently, Edmund foreclosed, and at his death in 1666<sup>28</sup> was seised of the manor. His heir was his nephew, Edmund Ludlow the younger, the notorious regicide, who was the eldest son of his brother Sir Henry Ludlow, of Maiden Bradley (co. Wilts.), and who, as one of the judges of King Charles I, was attainted of treason at the Restoration.<sup>29</sup> The manor consequently escheated to Charles II, who in 1669 granted it to Edward Boswell and Nathaniel Ludlow, a younger brother of Edmund, at a reserved rent of £3.<sup>30</sup> It seems, however, to have been subsequently restored to the Paulet family, for Sir John Huband of Ipsley (co. Warw.), bart., was seised of it at the beginning of the 18th century,<sup>31</sup> having probably inherited it from his mother Jane, the daughter of Lord Charles Paulet.<sup>32</sup> Sir John was succeeded by his son and heir John, who died a minor and unmarried in 1730, when the baronetcy became extinct, and his possessions were divided among his three sisters and co-heirs Rhoda, Mary and Jane,<sup>33</sup> the first-named of whom married first Sir Thomas Delves of Dodington (co. Ches.), and secondly John Cotes.<sup>34</sup> In 1738 Jane Huband sold her part of the manor and 'the thirteen copeses called Dowles' in the parishes of Hurstbourne Tarrant and Andover for £2,500 to James Wright of Warwick,<sup>35</sup> who subsequently purchased also the share of the other sister Rhoda.<sup>36</sup> From James Wright these two portions of the manor passed to his son and heir James Wright of Berkeley Square, who dealt with them in 1754 and again in 1765.<sup>37</sup> He subsequently purchased the remaining third and sold the whole manor to Joseph Portal of Freefolk and John Mount.<sup>38</sup> From the latter Hurstbourne Tarrant passed by sale in May 1782 to George Dewar, a wealthy West Indian planter of Scotch extraction,<sup>39</sup> who died in 1786, aged seventy-eight.<sup>40</sup> By his will dated 1785 he left all his manors and real estate in England, St. Christopher, Dominica and elsewhere to his younger son David Dewar, leaving only certain annuities to his eldest son John Dewar, who 'had by a continued series of imprudence and extravagance involved himself hopelessly in difficulties.'<sup>41</sup> The manor has remained in the Dewar family ever since,<sup>42</sup> Mr. Albemarle Willoughby Dewar, great-grandson of David Dewar, being the present lord of Hurstbourne Tarrant.

In 1280 the Abbess of Tarrant claimed pillory, tumbrel and other liberties within the manor.<sup>43</sup>

The forest of Chute formerly lay in Wiltshire and Hampshire, the Hampshire portion extending to Hurstbourne Tarrant and including the woods of Doiley and Dowles (or Doles). Doiley was written Digerle or Derhile in the 13th century, and there are many references to it in early documents.<sup>44</sup> Its site is marked at the present day by Doiley Barn, Doiley Cottages, Doiley Hill, Doiley Wood and Doiley Manor in the north-east of the parish. Doles Wood lay partly in the parish of Hurstbourne Tarrant and partly in that of Andover, and in the reign of James I William fourth Marquess of Winchester engaged in a dispute with Andrew Kingsmill, tenant and farmer of King's Enham, as to his right to The Raggs or Raggs Coppice, Blackden Bryle or Blackden Raggs, Doles Heath or Charlton Heath, and King's Enham Heath and other copeses and wastes.<sup>45</sup> According to the defendant Preston and Weste, tenants of the marquess, 'desiring to bathe themselves in the teares of many poore people,' had inclosed a certain parcel of The Raggs called Enham Raggs, which was in reality parcel of Enham Heath and in the parish of Andover, and had always been separated from the marquess's copeses by 'bounders and standills.' On the other hand the marquess declared that Kingsmill was attempting to deny his right under a 'shiftinge

<sup>44</sup> Thus in 1234 the king ordered Michael de Columbers to supply the sheriff of Southampton with sufficient timber from the grove of Digerle to make a new kitchen in Winchester Castle, a butlery and dispensary there, a drawbridge, the joists and boards of two turrets and also a chamber over the gate of the castle. Again, in the following year, Avise de Columbers was ordered to allow the constable of Winchester Castle to have a certain number of beams from the royal forest of Finkley and Derhele for making the king's dispensary and saucery in the castle (Close, 19 Hen. shadowe of wordes,' and asserted that the copses and wastes in question were really parcel of the bailiwick of Doles and, therefore, part of his inheritance.<sup>46</sup> Depositions on both sides were taken at Andover 23 April 1612, when most of the witnesses seemed to be in favour of Kingsmill,<sup>47</sup> but the marquess had already predisposed James I in his favour, as is shown by the fact that in the previous year the king by letters patent had more clearly defined his property in the neighbourhood, granting to him a number of copses and wastes—the coppices called Netherblackden, Stoney, Fairooke, Beareridge, Lodge, Pounde, Ladylonge, Netherthrowayes and Upperthrowayes, Upperblackden, Ridgewayes, Chilwayes, and Knolles Coppice, The Raggs, Blackden Raggs, Newmans Ryding, Doles Heath or Charleton Heath, and King's Enham Heath, Cow Down, Rushmer Down, Southdown and Brockhill—of which there is no mention by name in the patent roll of the reign of Edward VI.<sup>48</sup> Doiley and Doles still formed part of the manor in the reign of Charles II, Charles Paulet petitioning for leave to disafforest them in June 1662, on the ground that these lands were burdened with great debts incurred by his father and himself for loyalty and with provision for his mother, three brothers and one sister.<sup>49</sup> Three months later they were disafforested and the deer in them were granted to Charles Paulet in consideration of the services and sufferings of his father.<sup>50</sup> Thirteen copses of wood called Doles, containing 700 acres, are included in subsequent extents of the manor,<sup>51</sup> and the old forest-name is still preserved in Doles Wood and Doles, the residence of Mr. Almarie Willoughby Dewar. The fourth Marquess of Winchester, in addition to the dispute with Kingsmill, engaged in a controversy with divers inhabitants of the hamlet of Ibthrope. The latter asserted 'that they were freeholders and that all the grounds and soil of the village, as well that which was held in severalty as that which lay in open field and common, was always accounted and used as the freehold and inheritance of these tenants, and that the plaintiff and his ancestors had no part of the freehold or inheritance thereof,' and admitted that they had already with mutual consent divided and inclosed some of the common lands and were in the habit of cutting down trees and digging marl-pits in the downs of Ibthrope. The marquess, on the other hand, declared that they were only tenants at will and that the common downs, heath and commons called The Common Downs, Common Heath, Rushmer Down or North Down, South Down and Ambley were his proper freehold inheritance, as he could prove by copies of old court rolls, and that in bygone times his tenants had been amerced for felling trees and inclosing the common fields. He moreover accused them of appropriating to their own use 200 marks, 'the property of one Marvyn, who had hanged himself at Whitchurch.'<sup>52</sup> Depositions of witnesses were taken at Basingstoke in April 1610, most of them agreeing that when the sheep of the farmers of Hurstbourne Tarrant fed upon the downs of Ibthrope they were chased away by the tenants and inhabitants of Ibthrope and vice versa, and that there were boundary-marks between the demesnes of the manor and the hamlet.<sup>53</sup> In 1611 the Court of Exchequer recommended that the parties should come to some agreement amongst themselves.<sup>54</sup> The marquess, whose position was already assured by the patent roll of the preceding April,<sup>55</sup> was theoretically the victor, as is shown by the fact that the manors of IBTHROPE and UPTON are mentioned by name in the grant of the Hurstbourne property to Boswell and Ludlow in the reign of Charles II,<sup>56</sup> but Ibthrope still retains some trace of its old independence, the owners and occupiers of the hamlet having sole right to take for their own use but not for sale everything growing on Ibthrope Common, which covers an area of 59 acres.

By the manor of Upton, only that part of the hamlet situated in the parish of Hurstbourne Tarrant seems to have been intended, for the part situated in the parish of Vernhams Dean was included in the grant of the manor of Vernhams Dean to Henry de Bernevall in the reign of Henry II, and its subsequent history is given under the latter parish (q.v. infra).

The church of ST. PETER consists CHURCH of a chancel 34 ft. by 18 ft. 1 in., nave 58 ft. 8 in. by 17 ft. 6 in., north aisle 41 ft. 8 in. by 5 ft. 9 in., with a vestry at its west end 14 ft. 9 in. by 5 ft. 9 in., south aisle 52 ft. 2 in. by 6 ft. 7 in., with a south porch. At the west end of the nave is a wooden tower within the building. All these measurements are internal.

The history of the present building begins c. 1200, to which date belongs the nave as far westwards as the third bay of the arcade, with the aisles flanking it. The difference in detail between the two arcades shows that the north one is a little later than the south. The only trace of earlier work than this is the south doorway, which is of late 12th-century date. In the 14th century the church was lengthened westwards by one bay. In the north aisle the original west wall was allowed to remain and the extra bay was used to form a small chapel, but in the south aisle and nave the original west walls were removed. Other work of this century consisted of the insertion of most of the present windows to the aisles. The chancel was practically rebuilt, using the 13th-century windows again, about the year 1890, and the walls of the rest of the building were refaced at the same time. The mediaeval south porch was refaced in the 18th century and the tower was erected in 1897, partly of old timbers.

The east window of the chancel is of 15th-century date, having four cinquefoiled lights, under a low four-centred arch. The rest of the chancel windows are of 13th-century date, three on each side, a single light between two of two lights. The heads of the lights are in all cases modern and of ogee shape, and the south-west window has had its tracery removed and two 15th-century cinquefoiled lights substituted. The internal jambs have edge rolls dying into a chamfered rear arch.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Near the east end of the north wall is an aumbry with recessed jambs and segmental head, and traces of the fitting of a shelf, and in the same position on the south side is a piscina with chamfered jambs and trefoiled head. Between the first and second windows of the south wall is a modern doorway with plain chamfered jambs and two-centred head.

The chancel arch is two-centred and of two stop-chamfered orders built of chalk. The jambs are of Binstead stone, with square hollow-chamfered abaci, and both arch and jambs have diagonal tooling.

The north arcade of the nave is of three bays with circular columns, plainly moulded capitals with square-edged abaci, and bases which were probably moulded with a hollow between two rolls, now rubbed down to a single curve. The arches have two chamfered orders and are two-centred with a plain label on the nave side. The eastern respond is chamfered, and in it is a small trefoiled piscina with a shallow basin, the projecting part of which has been cut away. The corbel over this piscina which carries the inner order of the arch is in the form of an irregular octagon, and its mouldings are very similar to those of the capitals. In the west respond the orders of the arch are continued in the jamb with a plinth at the base which orders continuing the section of the jambs, with a hollow chamfered square-edged abacus at the springing. It has a label of the same section as the south arcade, and looks like early 13th-century work, re-used at the lengthening of the nave in the 14th century. Its width is not against the idea that it may have been in the west wall of the nave, but in that case a masonry tower must have existed or been intended early in the 13th century, and of this there is no evidence.

Above the arcades the walls are thinner and evidently later additions; the only clearstory windows are two of three lights with square heads, on the south side, of late date.

The walls of the north aisle were at first much lower, the line of the eaves and eastern slope being still visible outside; they seem to have been raised to their present height when the vestry was added.

The east window of this aisle is a trefoiled lancet, and of the three north windows the eastern and western are original, and have two trefoiled lights. The middle window is larger and set higher in the wall, and has three ogee-headed lights of peculiar character with tracery of 14th-century style, which seems to be old. The fourth window in this wall, which lights the north-west vestry, is a single trefoiled lancet, the west jamb of which is a modern restoration; it is higher than the original two-light windows east of it, and the wall here shows no sign of having been raised.

The east window of the south aisle is a single trefoiled light, which has been widened at some time, and has a modern head.

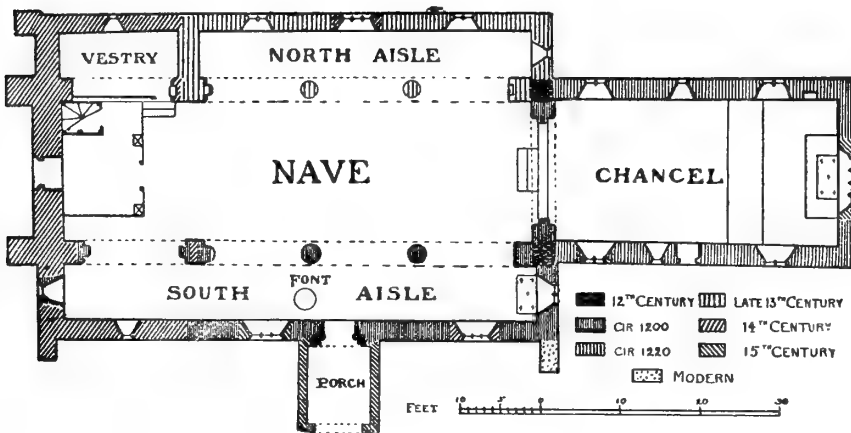

The first window in the south wall is of mid-14th-century date, a very pretty piece of tracery, with three trefoiled lights and two cinquefoiled circles in the head, and a trefoiled semicircle over. The second window is of late 15th-century date, with three cinquefoiled lights under a square head. The third window belongs to the date of the 14th century lengthening, and the west window is a plain 13th-century lancet reinserted here at that time.

The south doorway, which is between the first and second windows of the aisle, has jambs of two orders with engaged shafts without bases, but having foliate capitals, and a pointed arch of two orders, the inner being continued from the jambs, while the outer is enriched with horizontal zigzag ornament, of late 12th-century type. The wall thins at the springing and the extrados of the arch is exposed; there is no label, and the whole is evidently re-used material.

The west doorway is contemporary with the western extension of the nave and aisles, and has double chamfered jambs and a two-centred arch.

The wooden tower is in three stages with an octagonal spire, the whole being covered with oak does not return on the sides of the wall, and a hollow chamfered abacus at the springing. All this work is claw-tooled and probably well into the 13th century.

The entrance to the north-west chapel, which forms the fourth bay of the arcade, has chamfered jambs and double chamfered two-centred arch without corbels or abaci, with claw-tooled masonry, and seems of early 14th-century date. In the east respond is another piscina with stop-chamfered jambs, trefoiled head and shallow circular basin, the projecting part being chamfered.

The first three bays of the south arcade are very similar to those of the north, the only differences being that the columns are a little larger, the bases have three roll mouldings, and the capitals are of an earlier type. The eastern respond is also similar, but the corbel at the springing is composed of mouldings supported by a carved head surmounted by foliage of good early 13th-century type. The tooling is all vertical, and the masonry of the arches is of a light brown stone, irregularly banded with chalk. The fourth bay of the arcade is of two edge-chamfered shingles. The timbers supporting this tower spring from the floor at the west end of the nave, and the staircase to the belfry is also inside and is constructed entirely of wood.

All the walls of the church are of flint and stone, strengthened with modern brick buttresses at the ends of the south aisle and the north-west corner of the north aisle and with two stone buttresses partly old at the west end of the nave. The porch is wood, plastered over at a later date; it is probably of the 15th century, and brought to its present condition about a century ago. It has a slated roof, while all the other roofs are leaded, and there are modern gable crosses on the chancel and nave.

The roof of the chancel is of modern woodwork of low pitch. That of the nave has heavy tie-beams and moulded ridge and purlins, and appears to be old; it is of very flat pitch. The aisles have modern lean-to roofs.

The font is of 13th-century date and has a plain circular bowl resting on a stem which has attached round shafts at each angle and half-octagonal shafts on each face, each having a moulded base. It stands on a footpace paved with 14th-century tiles of various single and double patterns.

Many of the seats in the nave are of old woodwork, quite plain except for a moulded top, and the old baluster altar rails are also now in the nave. The octagonal pulpit is a rather hybrid structure, partly made of 17th-century woodwork, and the south door is old, with 18th-century panels on its outer face.

There are no monuments of any particular interest, the oldest being a marble slab on the north wall of the chancel to the Honourable Charles Paulet, eldest son of the Lord Charles Paulet, who died in 1677. Also to his wife Magdalene, who died in 1697, and their daughter Frances, 1694.

There are some remains of wall painting in the north aisle. On the north jamb of the east window is a diaper of red and white squares, the latter having a spot of red in the middle of each. Near the east end of the north wall and on the east jamb of the first window is a diaper of fleurs de lis, and between the first and second north windows is the fable of the three dead and the three living, very well drawn, and probably part of the original decoration of the aisle, a scrolled border above marking the height of the old wall. Between the second and third windows is a small piece of a circular panel which represented the seven deadly sins, the only two now distinguishable being luxury and drunkenness.

There are three bells in the tower, the treble being by O. Corr, 1725, the second by John Corr, 1740, and the tenor is dated 1654.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and salver (secular) of 1797 and 1775; a secular silver flagon of 1746 given by Mr. D. A. Dewar and a plated alms plate given by Mr. D. A. Bertie Dewar.

The registers are in three books, the first being a very good vellum specimen, containing entries of baptisms from 1546 to 1721, marriages from 1546 to 1687, and burials from the same date to 1722. The second book, also of vellum, contains baptisms and burials from 1723 to 1812, and marriages from 1724 to 1754. The third book continues the marriages on the usual printed forms up to 1813.

At the time of the Domesday ADVOVSON Survey there was a church in the parish attached to the manor, which was held by Vitalis the priest together with half a hide of land, one plough, two bordars, 1 acre of meadow and 'circsset' or churchscot which was appraised at 14r.<sup>57</sup> The advowson went with the manor until the end of the 12th century, when it was granted by Henry II to the church of St. Mary, Salisbury.<sup>58</sup> In spite of this gift, King John in March 1200 granted the church of Hurstbourne in free alms to his clerk Simon Pelagus for life,<sup>59</sup> but was forced a month or so later after an assize of novel disseisin to admit that the advowson belonged to the church of Salisbury.<sup>60</sup> However, Simon Pelagus continued to hold the living, as appears from an entry in the Testa de Nevill,<sup>61</sup> and in 1229, most probably on his death, Henry III presented Nicholas de Nevill, brother of the Bishop of Chichester, to the living 'vacant and in his gift.'<sup>62</sup> Three years later, however, the king was once more compelled to admit the right of the church of Salisbury.<sup>63</sup> The prebendary of Burbage, to whose prebend the advowson was attached, was in 1322-3 called upon to show reason why he had not resided at Hurstbourne Tarrant, but on appearing before the Bishop of Winchester licence of non-residence was given him since by reason of his prebend he was forced to reside in Salisbury, and had therefore appointed a perpetual vicar whose stipend was paid from the revenues of the church.<sup>64</sup> The vicars of Hurstbourne Tarrant continued to be appointed by the Canon of Salisbury and Prebendary of Hurstbourne Tarrant and Burbage until 1847,<sup>65</sup> when in the vacancy of the prebend the property of the prebend valued at £50 a year was taken over by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners<sup>66</sup> and the advowson fell to the Bishop of Salisbury,<sup>67</sup> who the next year transferred it to the Bishop of Winchester.<sup>68</sup> At the present day the living is a vicarage of the net yearly value of £217, with 12 acres of glebe and residence in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester.

The Congregational chapel was built in 1840 and has 200 sittings. There is also a Primitive Methodist chapel.

In 1756 William Jones, by deed, gave a rent-charge of £5 annually, charged on a farm in Ibthrope.

In 1775 Richard Bunny, by deed, gave £300 consols, the annual income to be applied in the relief of needy persons of the parish, and in placing out two children residing in that part of Upton which is within the parish to school.

In 1797 the Rev. Peter Debary, a former vicar, by his will directed the interest of a turnpike security of the value of £25 to be applied in the purchase of religious books or tracts for distribution amongst the parishioners.

LINKENHOLT

Linchehore, Lynkeholt, Lyncoholt (xi cent.) ; Linkeholth (xii cent.) ; Lynkynholt, Lyncknolt, Nyncknoll (xvi cent.) ; Lycknoll (xvii cent.).

Linkenholt is a small parish containing 1,073 acres, and situated 9½ miles north of Andover. Berkshire lies to the north, while Wodensdyke forms part of its southern boundary. The little group of buildings comprising the village in the west is at a height of 660 ft. above the ordnance datum, and the greatest height in the parish, viz. 706 ft., is reached a short distance to the north. The schools were erected in 1871 and reopened in 1888. The population in 1901 was eighty-eight.

Among place-names mentioned in early records are Vaucham, Roucombesdene and Hydene<sup>2</sup> (xiii cent.) and Westwood<sup>3</sup> (xvi cent.).

LINKENHOLT, which in the time MANOR of Edward the Confessor had been held by Edric of the king, was granted by William I to his follower Ernulf de Hesding, who in his turn, with the consent of the king, granted it on Candlemas Day 1081 at Salisbury to the Abbot and convent of St. Peter, Gloucester.<sup>4</sup> This grant was confirmed by King Stephen in 1138,<sup>5</sup> by King Henry V in 1414,<sup>6</sup> by King Henry VI in 1430<sup>7</sup> and by King Henry VIII in 1510.<sup>8</sup> Further grants of land in the neighbourhood were made to the abbot and convent by Henry de Bernevall, lord of Vernhams Dean, in the reign of Henry II and by his nephew and successor Roger de Bernevall.<sup>9</sup> The manor remained in the hands of the abbot and convent until the Dissolution,<sup>10</sup> when it became Crown property, and so continued until 1541, in which year Henry VIII granted it to the Dean and Chapter of the newly-erected cathedral of Gloucester.<sup>11</sup> Soon afterwards, however, the dean and chapter surrendered it with the manors of Littleton and Wallop (co. Hants) to Henry VIII, receiving in exchange Tullwell Court in the city of Gloucester and other property.<sup>12</sup> In June 1545 Henry VIII granted Linkenholt to his favourite Thomas Lord Wriothesley,<sup>13</sup> who in July obtained licence to alienate it to Richard Reade.<sup>14</sup> The latter sold it almost immediately to John Cheyne,<sup>15</sup> who dealt with it by fine in 1553.<sup>16</sup> In 1585, by fine between Vincent Coventry and Thomas Cheyne on the one side, and John English<sup>17</sup> and Elizabeth his wife, Andrew Reade and William Handfote on the other, Thomas Cheyne granted the manor to Andrew Reade to hold for sixty years at a rent of £10 10s., with reversion to Edward Hungerford and John Gwyllyn.<sup>18</sup> In 1600 Andrew Reade settled Linkenholt upon his son Robert, who died seised in 1627, leaving a son and heir Andrew,<sup>19</sup> who, two years later, sold<sup>20</sup> it to Emanuel Badd for £2,000.<sup>21</sup> On the death of Emanuel in 1632 the manor passed to his son and heir Thomas,<sup>22</sup> who was created a baronet in 1642,<sup>23</sup> and remained seised of the manor until a few years before his death.<sup>24</sup> In 1680 Joseph Hoskins Styles was sent by his uncle, Robert Styles, a wealthy Amsterdam merchant, to buy land in England to the value of £12,000, to be settled on Joseph and his sisters, Mary wife of John Worgan, and Lydia wife of Giles Stampe.<sup>25</sup> Joseph Styles gave the money to trustees, who, on behalf of John and Mary Worgan, covenanted with Sir Thomas Badd for the purchase of the manor of Linkenholt. However, owing to some flaw in Sir Thomas Badd's title, they hesitated to complete the purchase until empowered to do so by Chancery decree of 1689.<sup>26</sup> The manor was then settled upon John and Mary Worgan, and remained with them and their descendants until the beginning of the 19th century.<sup>27</sup> The next owners were the Colsons of Swanage and Dorchester, who continued in possession until about 1886, when the bankers, Messrs. Williams of Dorchester, who had a mortgage upon the estate, which then belonged to Thomas Morton Colson, foreclosed and sold to Mr. Charles John Radclyffe of Hyde, Wareham (co. Dors.).<sup>28</sup> The latter sold Linkenholt in 1898 to Mr. Charles Julius Knowles, whose executors are now lords of the manor.<sup>29</sup>

In the 13th century there was a mill in the manor of the annual value of 20s.,<sup>30</sup> but no trace of it now remains.

The church of ST. PETER consists CHURCH of a chancel 15 ft. 11 in. by 13 ft. 6 in., with a small vestry to the north, and nave 30 ft. by 15 ft. 2 in., with small porch.

The church was rebuilt in 1871; the only parts of the former structure which were retained are the south doorway, a small round-headed window and the bowl of the font; all date from the 12th century. The former building stood behind the manor-house in another part of the village.

The chancel is lighted by an east window of three lights, a south window of two lights and a single-light north window. In the north wall is a small recess, to the west of which is a doorway to the vestry, and in the south wall is an outer doorway; the chancel arch is of two chamfered orders, the inner springing from light detached shafts.

The nave has a small 12th-century round-headed window at the north-east, and a north-west window of two lights; on the south side are a three-light window and a trefoiled lancet. Between them is the entrance doorway, which dates from the 12th century; the jambs are chamfered and have grooved and hollow chamfered abaci; the head is round and of two orders, the outer having a line of billet ornament; the label is modern. In the west wall is a two-light window. Above the west end is a small painted wood turret supported on posts from the floor of the nave; it is crowned with an octagonal spire covered with oak shingles. In it hang two bells, one is inscribed 'Prayse God EA. I.C. 1642 R.T.', while the second is blank.

The font has a tapering round bowl, the top edge carved with a cable moulding between bands of saw tooth and zigzag ornament. The stem is modern.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten of 1715 and 1693 respectively and a glass flagon with a plated mount.

The registers before 1812 are contained in three books. The first book contains baptisms from 1585, the marriages from 1579 (excepting a gap from 1662 to 1695) and burials from 1577, all to 1741; the second book has the entries mixed from 1741 to 1799, some of the leaves in this book are mutilated; the third continues all three from 1801 to 1812.

There was no church in the parish ADVOWSON at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>31</sup> nor is there any mention of one in the Taxation of Pope Nicholas (1291). The first proof of the existence of one is during the episcopacy of John Stratford, Bishop of Winchester (1323-33), when the Abbot and convent of Gloucester presented a rector to the church of Linkenholt.<sup>32</sup> The advowson of the rectory went with the manor until about 1870,<sup>33</sup> when it was sold to the Rev. G. A. Festing, in whose family it still remains, the present patron being Miss Marian L. Festing.

The church was not assessed in the 14th century propter exilitatem.<sup>34</sup> In the 16th century the rectory was valued at £7 6s. 8d. a year,<sup>35</sup> and at the present day its net yearly value is £136<sup>36</sup> and residence.

There are apparently no endowed charities in the parish.

<sup>17</sup> In 1580 Thomas Cheyne had obtained licence to alienate the manor to John English (Pat. 22 Eliz. pt. i, m. 39), while in 1583 Robert Cheyne, probably his son, had quitclaimed all his right in the manor to the same John English (vide Pat. 30 Eliz. pt. xi, m. 18).

TANGLEY

Tangele, Tangelie (xiii cent.) ; Tankley, Tangelegh (xv cent.).

Tangley is a small parish with an area of 1,634 acres situated on the borders of Wiltshire in a hilly and well-wooded district  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles north-west from Andover station on the Andover Junction and Southampton section of the London and South Western Railway. The general rise of the ground is from south to north, but nowhere does it fall below 462 ft. above the ordnance datum, and a height of 755 ft. is attained on the northern boundary of the parish. The Roman road from Winchester to Cirencester, called here Hungerford Lane, intersects the parish from south to north. To the east is Tangley Holt, the residence of Mr. Edmund Harvey Aston Oakes.

In the garden of Mr. F. A. Merceron's house is a rectangular lead cistern which came from an old house in Bethnal Green. It bears the date 1689, and the initials <sup>H</sup><sub>I H</sub>, and is ornamented on the front and sides with a geometric pattern filled with shells, roses, crowns, fleurs de lis, cherubs' heads and crooked star-shape forms.

The village lies to the west near the county boundary. The schools were erected in 1870 for forty-two children, and there is also an undenominational Mission Church erected by Messrs. Tasker & Sons of Upper Clatford. Waterswell Cross, Round Ash and East End are hamlets situated respectively  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile south,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles south and  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles east from the village.

It is about an inhabitant of Tangley that Cobbett, in one of his Rural Rides, tells the following anecdote:

I rode up to the garden wicket of a cottage and asked the woman, who had two children and who seemed to be about thirty years old, which was the way to Ludgershall, which I knew could not be above four miles off. She did not know! A very neat, smart and pretty woman; but she did not know the way to this rotten borough, which was, I was sure, only about four miles off! 'Well, my dear, good woman,' said I, 'but you have been at Ludgershall?' 'No.' 'Nor at Andover?' (six miles another way). 'No.' 'Nor at Marlborough?' (nine miles another way). 'No.' 'Pray, were you born in this house?' 'Yes.' 'And how far have you ever been from this house?' 'Oh! I have been up in the parish and over to Chute.' That is to say, the utmost extent of her voyages had been about two and a half miles.

The parish contains 846 acres of arable land, 341 acres of permanent grass and 201 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil and subsoil are partly strong clay and partly chalk, the whole being intermixed with a great quantity of flint. The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats, turnips and swedes. Common fields in Tangley were inclosed by authority of an Act of Parliament of 1827.<sup>2</sup>

TANGLEY is included in the entry MANORS under Facombe in Domesday Book,<sup>3</sup> and continued to form part of that manor until about the middle of the 13th century,<sup>4</sup> when it was detached by some member of the Punchardon family—probably by Oliver de Punchardon—and granted to Andrew Wake, who in 1280 claimed to have part of the fines of the assize of bread and ale in Tangley.<sup>5</sup> He was succeeded by his son and heir, Ralph Wake, who died at the beginning of the 13th century.<sup>6</sup> His son and heir John<sup>7</sup> followed and died in 1348, leaving as his heirs (1) his daughter Elizabeth, wife of Richard Michel; (2) his daughter Isabel, who married into the Keynes family; and (3) his grandson John Tyrell, son and heir of his daughter Margery,<sup>8</sup> whereupon the manor was divided into three portions. Richard Michel, son and heir of Elizabeth, died without issue towards the end of the 14th century,<sup>9</sup> and on his death it is probable that his portion passed to his next heir, John Keynes, son and heir of his cousin, Thomas Keynes.

Isabel Keynes, the second daughter of John Wake, died in 1359 seised of 2 carucates of land in Tangley in the hands of villeins, which she held of the king in chief by the service of the fourth part of one knight's fee.<sup>10</sup> Her heir was her son Thomas, who died seised of the third part of the manor of Tangley in 1361, leaving as his heir his son John, aged nine.<sup>11</sup> The latter at the time of his death sixty years later was said to be seised of a moiety of the manor of Tangley,<sup>12</sup> a description of the premises which would make it seem probable that he had by this time succeeded to Richard Michel's portion. His heir was his son John, who died the next year, leaving as his heir his daughter Joan, who married firstly John Speke,<sup>13</sup> and secondly Hugh Champernoun.<sup>14</sup> Her heir was her grandson John Speke, son of her son John, who succeeded to the moiety of the manor on her death in 1462.<sup>15</sup> The property remained with the Spekes for a considerable period, eventually passing to the Sydenhams on the marriage of Joan daughter and sole heir of William Speke of Dowlish Wake (co. Somers.) with Thomas Sydenham of Wynford Eagle (co. Dors.<sup>16</sup>), and from its connexion with the latter family it became known in the latter part of the 16th century as the manor of SYDENHAM'S TANGLEY. In 1569 Thomas Sydenham and his son and heir Richard obtained licence to alienate their manor of Tangley to a certain John Welsted,<sup>17</sup> who by his will, dated 29 August 1574, bequeathed it to his brother Simon Welsted in tail-male, with contingent remainder to his brother William.<sup>18</sup> Almost immediately, however, after the death of John, which took place on 7 September 1574,<sup>19</sup> Simon must have sold his inheritance of Facombe and Tangley by the service of two parts of one knight's fee (Testa de Nevill, 235a).

Wallop and Upper Wallop, to his son and heir Innocent in tail-male, with contingent remainder in tail-male successively to his youngest son John, and his brother's sons Thomas and Nicholas Reade.<sup>31</sup> Three years later Innocent, John and Nicholas gave up their right in the manor to Thomas,<sup>32</sup> who died in 1577, leaving as his heir a son John.<sup>33</sup> John died while still under age two years later, his heir being his brother Thomas,<sup>34</sup> who sold it for £45 to George Kingsmill, justice of the Common Pleas, in 1599.<sup>35</sup> Sir George died without issue in 1606, when the manor passed to his nephew, Sir William Kingsmill, kt., son of his eldest brother, Sir William,<sup>36</sup> who was already seised of the other original portion of Tangley, the history of which previous to this time is as follows. It passed, as has been already said, on the death of John Wake in 1348 to his grandson, John Tyrell,<sup>37</sup> who died seised of the moiety of four messuages, 4½ virgates of arable land and 6 acres of meadow in Tangley in 1360, leaving as his heir his brother Hugh, aged eighteen.<sup>38</sup> Hugh died without issue in 1381.<sup>39</sup> Before his death he had conveyed his property in Tangley to John Chitterne and other trustees, who in 1384 received pardon for entry without licence into the so-called manor of Tangley, together with permission to grant it in fee simple to Richard Holm and others.<sup>40</sup> It was in the hands of trustees for over twenty years,<sup>41</sup> eventually passing to Richard Milbourne, who held a court at Tangley in conjunction with Sir John Speke in 1439.<sup>42</sup> He died seised of the manor of Tangley in 1451, being followed by his son and heir Simon,<sup>43</sup> on whose death in 1464 it passed to his son Thomas, aged fifteen.<sup>44</sup> Thomas was succeeded on his death in 1492 by his son Henry, aged eleven,<sup>45</sup> who died in 1519, leaving a son Richard, aged twelve.<sup>46</sup> Richard died seised of the manor of Tangley in 1532, his heir being returned as his second cousin William Fauconer of Drayton (co. Bucks.), son of Eleanor, daughter of Elizabeth, daughter of his great-grandfather, Simon Milbourne.<sup>47</sup> In 1539 the manor was settled on Edward Twynghoo and Edith his wife, for the life of the latter, with remainder to William Fauconer,<sup>48</sup> but it seems impossible to ascertain exactly when it reverted to the Fauconer family. It ultimately passed, however, to the Kingsmills by the marriage of Alice sister and co-heir of Sir Richard Fauconer with Richard Kingsmill of Highclere, attorney of the Court of Wards to Queen Elizabeth, the elder brother of the above-mentioned Sir George Kingsmill, justice of the Common Pleas.<sup>49</sup> Richard left a daughter and sole heir Constance, but this manor, being probably settled in tail-male on Richard, passed on his death to his nephew, Sir William, who also inherited Sydenham's Tangley. The two manors consequently merged, and from this time there is no further mention of Sydenham's Tangley. Sir William died seised of the manor of Tangley in 1619, leaving a son and heir Henry,<sup>50</sup> who died five years later, leaving a son and heir, William, under age.<sup>51</sup> Sir William Kingsmill,<sup>52</sup> son of the latter, who died in 1698,<sup>53</sup> left by his first wife Frances two sons, William and Henry, and one daughter, Frances, who married Hugh Cony of Newton (co. Down), and by his second wife Rebecca a daughter, Penelope, who became the wife of John Waterman of Barkham, near Reading.<sup>54</sup> Robert Brice, afterwards Admiral of the Blue, M.P. for Tregony (co. Cornwall) and commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships on the coast of Ireland, married Elizabeth daughter and eventually sole heiress of Frances and Hugh Cony, while Rebecca, sole daughter and heir of Penelope and John Waterman, became the wife of Laurence Head Osgood of Winterton (co. Berks.).<sup>55</sup> On the death, unmarried and intestate, of William, last surviving son of Sir William Kingsmill, in 1766, Elizabeth and Rebecca succeeded to their grandfather's estates,<sup>56</sup> and in that year, in conjunction with their husbands, dealt by fine with the respective moieties of the manor, conveying them to Thomas Ward,<sup>57</sup> probably for purposes of settlement on Laurence Head Osgood and Rebecca. Rebecca afterwards married a member of the Brickenden family<sup>58</sup> and brought the manor to her husband. Richard Brickenden, by his will dated 30 May 1789, left his estates in Hampshire, including the manor of Tangley, to his brother, William John Brickenden, D.D., in fee-tail, with contingent remainder to his cousin, John Fisher,<sup>59</sup> and died in 1793. On the death of his brother without issue eight years later Tangley passed to John Fisher, on whom it was settled in 1801.<sup>60</sup> Later in the century the manor passed to the Merceron family,<sup>61</sup> and Mr. F. H. Merceron is the present lord of the manor.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

In the 13th century Andrew Wake, lord of the manor of Tangle, granted £5 rent in that vill in free marriage to Alan Plukenet, who married his daughter Joan.<sup>52</sup> Alan claimed part of the fines of the assize of bread and beer in Tangle in 1280,<sup>53</sup> and died seised of the rent in 1298.<sup>54</sup> His heir was his son Alan, who died without issue towards the end of the reign of Edward II, when his property in Tangle passed to his sister and heir, Joan de Bohun.<sup>55</sup> The escheator delivered up to Sybil, widow of Alan, a third of certain lands in Tangle of the yearly value of £1 3s. 8d. in 1325,<sup>56</sup> and three years later Joan de Bohun died seised of two-thirds of certain rents in Tangle with reversion of the other third after the death of Sybil, leaving as her heir her cousin's son, Richard de la Bere.<sup>57</sup> The later history of this property in Tangle has not been traced, but it probably merged again with the manor of Tangle during the 14th century.

The church of ST. JOHN THE CHURCH BAPTIST consists of a small apsidal east end, and a nave 45 ft. 4 in. by 14 ft. 4 in. with a north vestry, west tower and a south porch.

In the 12th century there was a building on this site consisting of a nave, which probably did not extend as far westwards as the present one, but had an apse to the east as at present, the foundations having been discovered when the present apse was built. The chalk arch to the apse and the two small lights over are all that remain of 12th-century detail, and these were reconstructed in 1872, when nearly the whole of the church was rebuilt and the vestry and south porch were added. For some years before this date there was a rectangular chancel. The west tower was added in 1898.

The apse contains two very small modern windows and on the south side there is a sedile, divided into two bays by a shaft with moulded capital and base. The two-centred arch opening to the apse is of one slightly chamfered order and has a grooved and chamfered label on the west face. The chamfered abacus at the springing is either modern or has been retooled.

All windows of the nave and vestry are modern, of 14th-century style, and there is a plain south door of a single wave-moulded order.

Near the east end of the south wall of the nave is a small modern priest's doorway.

The tower arch is of two moulded orders, the inner one resting on corbels. The tower has a two-light west window of 14th-century style; its walls are of squared stone with a stair turret at the south-west angle, and it is finished at the top with a shingled octagonal spire.

There is a circular lead early 17th-century font, enriched with three fleurs de lis, two Tudor roses, and two crowned thistles.

The tower contains five bells and a small bell, the treble, third, fourth and tenor of the five being by Mears & Stainbank, 1900.

The plate consists of a silver chalice (secular) and two plated alms plates used as patens.

The registers are contained in three books, the first one having mixed entries from 1680 to 1756, and one entry dated 1762. The second book contains marriages for 1752 and 1753 and baptisms and burials from 1751 to 1812. The third book contains marriages only from 1781 to 1812.

There is a very large hollow yew tree to the north of the church.

The chapel of Tangle was consecrated by Henry Woodlock, Bishop of Winchester (1305-16), a petition having been presented to him by his parishioners of the hamlet of Tangle praying for a priest to minister to their spiritual needs and complaining of delay in a certain funeral at the mother church of Facombe.<sup>58</sup> He did not, however, consecrate the churchyard, and accordingly the inhabitants of Tangle presented a petition to William of Wykeham in 1390, complaining of the difficulty of carrying the bodies of the dead for interment from Tangle to Facombe. A commission was held to inquire into the truth of this statement and also to ascertain whose duty it was to provide books, vestments and ornaments for the chapel.<sup>59</sup> The result of the inquiry, however, is not given on the bishop's register. Tangle continued to be a chapelry dependent upon the mother-church of Facombe<sup>60</sup> until on the destruction of the ancient church a new church was built in 1872. The living is at the present day a rectory, net income £250, with 2 acres of glebe in the gift of the lord of the manor, Mr. F. A. Merceron.

Poor's Land.—The parliamentary CHARITIES returns of 1786 mention land belonging to the poor of the parish, the donor of which was unknown, consisting of about an acre in the common field.

VERNHAM'S DEAN.

Ferham, Ferneham, Farenham (xiii cent.) ; Farenham, Firnham, Fiernham, Vernhams, Vyrnham (xiv cent.) ; Farnhamsdean, Ferinhamsdeane (xvi cent.) ; Vernansdeane, Vernamsdeane (xvii cent.).

Vernhams Dean is a parish with an area of 3,920 acres, situated on the Wiltshire borders of the county, 9 miles south from Hungerford station on the Great Western Railway, and about 9 miles north from Andover. It contains several stretches of high downland, the highest point—769 ft. above the ordnance datum—being reached on its northern boundaries. The village lies to the west of the parish along the road from Hurstbourne Tarrant to Great Bedwyn, but the church, vicarage and the two manor farms, recalling the fact that the manor fell into moieties in the 13th century, lie some distance to the east. There are other small collections of houses at Woodside on the county boundary half a mile west, at Vernhams Bank half a mile north-west, at Lower Conholt one and a-half miles south-west, at Vernhams Street and Little Down a mile north-east, and at Vernhams Row about a mile north-west. Upton, two miles south-east, is situated partly in this parish and partly in that of Hurstbourne Tarrant.

The parish contains 2,355½ acres of arable land, 558½ acres of permanent grass and 157 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is clay, while the subsoil is chalk. The chief crops are wheat, oats and sainfoin.

By Local Government Board Order 22250, dated 24 March 1888, a detached portion of Hurstbourne Tarrant was added to Vernhams Dean.

The following place-names occur in a 16th-century deed :—Closes called 'Clapperiscroft, Gardeynclose, Purtockes,' pasture called 'Botisdone' and a wood called 'Thornenycombe.'<sup>2</sup>

There is no mention of the manor of MANORS VERNHAM'S DEAN in Domesday Book, and, as in the 13th century it was still a member of the neighbouring manor of Hurstbourne,<sup>3</sup> it is probably included in the entry under 'Esseborne.'<sup>4</sup> It continued to form part of that manor until circa 1177, when it was granted by Henry II to Henry de Bernevall<sup>5</sup> and his heirs to hold by the service of one knight.<sup>6</sup> This grant was confirmed by King Richard I and by King John, the latter confirmation being dated 25 August 1203.<sup>7</sup> In 1213 Roger de Bernevall undertook to pay the king 200 marks for the lands of his uncle Henry in Hampshire.<sup>8</sup> Possibly this payment fell into arrears, as in 1216–17 Henry III granted the manor to Thomas Basset the younger to hold during the royal pleasure.<sup>9</sup> Some time afterwards Roger de

Bernevall recovered possession of the manor,<sup>10</sup> and was seised of it at his death in battle in 1226, when the custody of his lands was granted to Robert Haget, his wife's brother.<sup>11</sup> Six years later, however, on 2 October 1232, the sheriff of the county was ordered to give seisin of the manor to Reginald de Bernevall, brother of Roger, on condition that he recompensed Robert for the loss of his chattels, and in addition paid him £5 a year for the support of the heirs of Roger until they attained their majority.<sup>12</sup> However, on 27 October in the same year Robert Haget recovered his right of custody.<sup>13</sup> The manor from this time continued in the Bernevall family until 1277, when, on the death of Gilbert de Bernevall, it was divided between his daughter Cecily and his grandson, Gilbert de Cundy, son and heir of his daughter Aubrey.<sup>14</sup> Cecily subsequently married Gilbert de Nevill, who in 1280 claimed to have the fines of the assize of bread and ale in Vernhams Dean.<sup>15</sup> She died in 1300,<sup>16</sup> having survived her husband six years,<sup>17</sup> and her moiety of the manor passed to her son and heir, John Nevill, aged twenty-six. The latter died seised of a moiety of the manor in 1334, leaving a son and heir, Gilbert,<sup>18</sup> who died in 1359, his heir being his daughter Elizabeth, the wife of Simon Symeon.<sup>19</sup> Soon after the death of Simon without issue in 1387,<sup>20</sup> Elizabeth married John de la Warre, and in 1389 the moiety of the manor was settled on them in fee-tail with contingent remainder to feoffees.<sup>21</sup> Elizabeth died in 1395,<sup>22</sup> and, on the death of her husband without issue five years later, the moiety of the manor passed to the feoffees,<sup>23</sup> who in 1399 obtained licence to grant it in free alms to Winchester College.<sup>24</sup> This was done by fine two years later,<sup>25</sup> and in 1428 the warden of Winchester College was returned as holding half a fee in Vernhams Dean.<sup>26</sup> At the present day the governors of Winchester College are lords of the manor and the principal landowners in the parish.

But to return to the other moiety of the manor, sometimes known as WEST VERNHAM or BOTES.<sup>27</sup> It passed in 1277, as has been mentioned above, to Gilbert de Cundy, son of Aubrey, daughter of Gilbert de Bernevall. By an undated charter Gilbert de Bernevall granted this manor to Gilbert de Botes in consideration of homage and services and a white palfrey and 1*d.* yearly rent and a pair of white gloves at Easter.<sup>27a</sup> It is just possible that this Gilbert de Botes who gave his name to West Vernham was identical with Gilbert de Cundy, who in 1303–4 was called 'Lord of the Botes manor.'<sup>27b</sup> At that date he obtained licence from the king to grant it to Walter de Romsey,<sup>28</sup> a member of a family which owned considerable property in Wiltshire and Somerset. The terms of the grant were that Walter should pay Gilbert an annuity of two marks and should board respectably (honorifice) in his own or a religious house Geoffrey the brother of Gilbert and should allow Gilbert every year a furred gown such as Walter himself wore as 'valet,' and whensoever he should be dubbed a knight he should allow Gilbert 20s. or a gown of that price, and in alternate years a gown of cloth and fur like that worn by his own wife or 20s. in lieu thereof.<sup>28a</sup> Soon afterwards Gilbert and his wife Eleanor acquired from Walter de Romsey a life interest in the moiety. It was then seized by the Crown, since it was said to be acquired without licence, but in 1318 Eleanor was pardoned and received permission to retain the premises for life in return for a fine paid by her second husband, Thomas Heryngawd.<sup>29</sup> Before 1333 the moiety had reverted to the Romsey family, a Walter de Romsey, possibly a son of the first-named Walter, dying seised of it in that year. He left a son and heir, John,<sup>30</sup> who died soon afterwards, and was succeeded by his son Walter, who was holding in 1346.<sup>31</sup> Walter, who was by this time a knight, obtained licence in 1381 to convey his moiety of the manor of Vernhams Dean to his son Thomas and Eleanor his wife in fee-tail.<sup>32</sup> Thomas died seised of the moiety in 1400, during the lifetime of his father, leaving a son and heir, Thomas, aged ten,<sup>33</sup> who died some twenty years later, leaving an infant daughter Joan as his heir.<sup>34</sup> Joan, the mother of the last-named Joan, died in 1440 seised of a third part of the moiety, which she had held in dower,<sup>35</sup> and the next year the whole moiety was settled upon the daughter, Joan, and her husband, Thomas Payne.<sup>36</sup> On the death of Joan Payne her estates were divided between her two next heirs—(1) her father's cousin, Joan wife of Roger Wyke, who was the daughter of Mary Byngham, daughter of Sir Walter Romsey, and (2) William Horsey, the son and heir of her father's cousin, Eleanor, the sister of Joan Wyke.<sup>37</sup> The moiety of Vernhams Dean was assigned to the former,<sup>38</sup> who in 1461, in conjunction with her husband, Roger Wyke, dealt by fine with half the manors of 'Vernham, Vernhamgreen and Botysplace.'<sup>39</sup> Joan had married as her first husband a certain Thomas Keileway,<sup>40</sup> whose descendant John Keileway in 1517 granted a forty years' lease of the manor of East Vernham and Botes to Thomas Hellier, husbandman.<sup>41</sup> John died seised of half the manor of Vernhams Dean in 1547, his heir being his son William,<sup>42</sup> who in 1567, in conjunction with his son, Francis Keileway, and Anne his wife, conveyed to George Burley premises described in the fine as the manors of Vernhams Dean and Botes.<sup>43</sup> Three years later Thomas Keileway, son and heir of Francis Keileway, gave up all his right in the premises to the same George Burley,<sup>44</sup> who in his turn alienated them to Thomas Larke, John Attwood and Robert Watton in 1575.<sup>45</sup> These persons were probably trustees for Winchester College, which at this date acquired the manor as an investment<sup>46</sup> and are still lords.<sup>47</sup> The manor was from time to time conveyed to new feoffees.<sup>48</sup> The two Manor Farms mark the sites of the moieties of the original manor of Vernhams Dean, while Boats Copse, to the south of the village in the extreme west of the parish, still preserves the name of the manor of Botes.

A mill, almost in ruins, is mentioned as an appurtenance of the manor in 1277.<sup>49</sup> All trace of it has now been lost.

UPTON (Optune, xi cent.; Uptonia, xiii cent.), which is a tithing situated partly in this parish and partly in that of Hurstbourne Tarrant, formed part of the possessions of Edith, the queen of Edward the Confessor, and on her death at Winchester in 1075 passed to King William I, by whom it was held at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>50</sup> It remained with the Crown for a considerable period, but was finally split into two portions, one being probably included in the grant of Hurstbourne to John de Lyons in 1198,<sup>51</sup> while the other part was granted with Vernhams Dean to Henry de Bernevall by Henry II.<sup>52</sup> The history of the former portion is given under Hurstbourne Tarrant (q.v. supra). The other part continued to form part of the manor of Vernhams Dean and was included in the moiety assigned to Cecily on the death of her father, Gilbert de Bernevall, in 1277, as appears from a statement made on the occasion of the levying of a subsidy in 1316.<sup>53</sup> A portion of it, however, remained with the Bernevall family, and was granted by the name of a messuage and 14 acres of land in Upton to the Abbot and convent of Beaulieu by Roger Bernevall in 1312.<sup>54</sup> In the 14th century the ninths of the temporalities of the abbey in the parish were assessed at 6s. 8d.<sup>55</sup> At the time of the dissolution of the monasteries the grange or manor of Upton was farmed out for a term of thirty years to Roland Layton and Joan his wife on the understanding that the latter should, when necessary, destroy the old hall there and build another with room and kitchen of the same length as the old hall at their own expense except for the great timber.<sup>56</sup> However, in 1544 the king granted the grange or manor of Upton with other of the late possessions of Beaulieu Abbey to Thomas Lord Wriothesley.<sup>57</sup>

VERNHAM'S DEAN CHURCH : THE WEST DOORWAY

Within a few years the Bernevall estate in Upton became merged in the manor of Vernhams Dean and passed with it to Winchester College. At the present day it is represented by 70 or 80 acres of land parcel of the manor of Vernhams Dean.<sup>58</sup>

CHURCH of ST. MARY
consists of a chancel 20 ft. by 15 ft. 5 in., with a small vestry on the north side, and a nave 41 ft. by 21 ft. 5 in.

The north wall of the nave, which is 3 ft. 1 in. in thickness, is the only part of an early building on this site which is left, and probably belongs to the end of the 12th century; the west doorway is also of this date. All other traces of old work were swept away in 1851, when practically the whole church was rebuilt and new windows were inserted throughout.

The east window is composed of five lancets, and the one north and two south windows of the chancel are single trefoiled lights. The vestry has a small two-light north window and an east outside doorway. The chancel arch has moulding continued from the jambs and is two-centred in form.

The nave has three windows on each side, each having two trefoiled lights.

The west doorway has jambs of two orders with small attached shafts in each, having moulded bases and very pretty foliated capitals, each of different design with hollow-chamfered square abaci. The arch is of two semicircular orders with horizontal and vertical zigzag and a label enriched with dog-tooth ornament. There are two modern lancets and a quatrefoil over the doorway. On the apex of the west gable is a stone bell-cote containing one bell inscribed 'S K 1681.' The initials are those of Samuel Knight.

BEAULIEU ABBEY.
Gules a king's crown enfiled with a crozier or in a border sable billetty or.

All the walls are of flint and stone, the nave with a good deal of modern red brick, and the roofs are tiled. The internal fittings are all modern. On the floor in the centre of the nave are two late 17th-century grave slabs.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, undated, a paten of 1774 and a secular flagon of 1780.

The registers begin in 1598, the first book containing baptisms, marriages and burials thence to 1628; this is followed by a gap of twenty-six years, as the second book dates from 1654 to 1700; the others continue on to the present day.

Vernhams Dean was a chapelry ADVOWSON dependent on the mother-church of Hurstbourne Tarrant until<sup>59</sup> 1871, in which year the Ecclesiastical Commissioners endowed the newly-constituted vicarage of Vernhams Dean with a stipend of £111 payable out of the common fund,<sup>60</sup> and voted £1,500 towards the building of a parsonage-house.<sup>61</sup> The living is at the present day a vicarage, yearly value £299, with 46 acres of glebe and residence in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester.

There are Wesleyan and Primitive Methodist chapels at Vernhams Dean. Littledown has a Primitive Methodist chapel. The schools at Vernhams Dean were built in 1860 for 100 children.

Among property forfeited for superstitious uses in the reign of Edward VI were lands of the annual value of 3s. 4d. in the occupation of John Hart, which had been left by a certain Thomas Canon to maintain an obit and to repair the church.<sup>62</sup>

In 1864 Thirza Bull by will CHARITIES bequeathed a sum of £100, the income to be applied in the purchase of bread or clothing for the aged poor. The legacy was invested in £112 16s. 8d. consols, which is held by the official trustees.

WOODCOTT

Odecote (xi cent.); Wudecote (xii cent.); Wodecote, Woodcote (xiii cent.).

Woodcott is a remote parish, distant about 2 miles west from Litchfield station on the Didcot, Newbury and Winchester line of the Great Western Railway, and 5 miles north-west from Whitchurch. It contains two farm-houses—Upper Woodcott Farm and Lower Woodcott Farm—and a few scattered cottages. There are 1,444 acres of down-country within the parish, sloping from south to north. The highest point, viz. 818 ft. above the ordnance datum, is reached at Sidown Warren in the north-eastern corner of the parish. The church of St. James is near Upper Woodcott Farm to the west of the road coming from Crux Easton. There is no vicarage, the vicar, the Rev. Charles De Havilland, being also rector of, and residing at, Crux Easton. The children attend the school at Crux Easton. The parish contains 449 acres of arable land, 103 acres of permanent grass and 144 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is rather heavy, the subsoil is chalk. The chief crops are wheat, oats and turnips.

Among place-names mentioned in the 16th century are the following:—Bitfanger Copp, Frith Copp, Innerst Copp and Sudgarston Copp.<sup>2</sup>

WOODCOTT was held by Ansfrid of MANOR the king in the reign of Edward the Confessor.<sup>3</sup> William I bestowed it on one of his thegns, William Belet by name, and at the time of the Domesday Survey it was held of him by Faderlin and his daughter.<sup>4</sup> The overlordship continued with the descendants of William Belet until

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

as late at least as 1302, in which year the manor was said to be held of William Belet,<sup>5</sup> but subsequent to that date there is no further mention of the Belets in connexion with Woodcote. To return to the actual holders of the manor. All Faderlin's property<sup>6</sup> passed to Ruald de Woodcote, who, in the beginning of the 12th century, made a grant of lands in Kingsclere to Godstow Abbey.<sup>7</sup> He was succeeded by his son, Henry Fitz-Ruald, who was holding Woodcote in 1167,<sup>8</sup> and was probably the ancestor of Henry de Woodcote, who in 1276 granted the reversion of the manor after the death of himself and his wife Sanchea to Richard de Cardeville.<sup>9</sup> By the beginning of the 14th century Richard de Cardeville had succeeded to the manor, and was desirous of granting it to the Prior and brethren of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England. However, by an inquisition taken on 17 February 1301-2 it was ascertained that such a grant would be to the damage of the king, since the manor owed suit at the king's hundred court of Pastrow.<sup>10</sup> Finally the difficulty was overcome by a payment of £10 on the part of the prior,<sup>11</sup> and in 1303 Richard de Cardeville granted the manor to the prior and brethren,<sup>12</sup> who in the next year bestowed a life interest in the manor on Richard and Eugenia his wife in return for an annual payment of a rose.<sup>13</sup> The prior and brethren were lords of the manor of Woodcote until the Dissolution,<sup>14</sup> when it became Crown property, and so remained until 1544, in which year Henry VIII granted it to John Kingsmill, together with Bitfanger Copp, Frith Copp, Innerst Copp and Sudgarston Copp.<sup>15</sup> John died seised of the manor in 1556, leaving a son and heir William,<sup>16</sup> who conveyed it in 1579 to Richard Lee.<sup>17</sup> It subsequently reverted, however, to William Kingsmill, who died

seised of Woodcote in 1619, leaving a son and heir Henry.<sup>18</sup> From this date the history of Woodcote is identical with that of Tangley<sup>19</sup> until the later half of the 18th century, when it was purchased by the Herberts and descended to the present Lord Carnarvon.<sup>20</sup>

The church of ST. JAMES, a small CHURCH building of flint and stone, erected in 1704, consists of a single rectangular chamber 40 ft. 10 in. by 19 ft. 7 in., with a small north vestry and a south porch. It has an east window of three lancets, two north windows each of two lancets, two south windows, the first a single light and the other of two lights. The entrance is at the south-west.

The roof is gabled and covered with tiles. Over the west wall is a stone bell-cote with an arched opening in which hangs a small modern bell. The furniture is modern; the pulpit contains a little 18th-century carving worked up in it.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1571 and a plated paten.

The only old book of the registers is one containing baptisms, marriages and burials from 1578 to 1762; the others appear to be missing.

In the churchyard west of the church stands a fine yew tree.

The church of Woodcote was ADVOWSON appropriated to the use of the Prior and brethren of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England in 1303.<sup>21</sup> The advowson of the vicarage has throughout followed the descent of the manor<sup>22</sup> (q.v.), the patron at the present time being the Earl of Carnarvon.

There are, it appears, no endowed charities in this parish.

<sup>6</sup> This comprised, besides Woodcote, 1 hide in Clere (afterwards the manor of Clere Woodcote), 3½ virgates in Knowle, 1 hide 1 virgate in Tidgrove, all in the parish of Kingsclere, and 3 hides in Litchfield (V.C.H. Hants, i, 481b 487a).

Alterations have been made in this hundred since 1831. Upper Clatford and Thruxton are now in Pastrow Hundred, while Tangley, then in Pastrow, and Shipton Bellinger, then in Thorngate, have been added to this hundred.

Part of Abbots Ann—the tithing of Little Ann—was as well in Domesday<sup>2</sup> as now in the hundred of Wherwell, but is described under Andover. In Domesday the total hidage was 70 hides, 3 virgates, 90 acres, as against 111 hides, 1 virgate, 62½ acres in the time of Edward the Confessor.<sup>3</sup> This does not include Andover itself, of which the extent is not given. Neither Grately nor Appleshaw occurs, the latter apparently being included in one of the holdings in Cholderton in Amport. Grately cannot with certainty be referred to any of the entries. One of the three South Tidworth holdings is entered under Thorngate Hundred,<sup>4</sup> where it continued to be included for some time.<sup>5</sup>

By his charter of 1213<sup>6</sup> John granted the out-hundred to the men of Andover, who ever afterwards held it of the king, paying fee-farm rent as for manor, hundred and vill.

A court was held every Monday at Andover. The heading 'Curia tenta die Lune,' &c., alternates in the rolls with 'Hundredum tentum die Lune,' &c. In some rolls 'Hundredum forinsecum' is substituted for the former, 'Hundredum intrinsecum' for the latter.<sup>7</sup>

In 1280 William de Valence made good his claim that the manor of Thruxton was quit of suits of shires and hundreds under charter of Henry III,<sup>8</sup> and about the same date John de Evinely successfully urged a like franchise for his land which he held of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem.<sup>9</sup>

ABBOTTS ANN

Anna (x, xi cent.); Anne Abbatis (xiii cent.); Abbotesanne (xiv cent.); Abbots Aunt, Abbas Aunt (xviii cent.).

The parish of Abbots Ann, which is partly in the hundred of Andover and partly in the hundred of Wherwell, covers an area of 3,396 acres. It lies 3 miles south-west of Andover in the Anna Valley, from which it takes the name that, unlike several of its neighbours, it has kept unchanged. The average height above the sea-level is about 300 ft., but the land on either side of Pillhill Brook, a tributary of the Anton running through the parish, lies low and is liable to be flooded. The soil is loam, the subsoil chalk,<sup>1</sup> and there are several chalk-pits. The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats and swedes. There are 2,637½ acres of arable land, 211½ acres of permanent grass and 288 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>2</sup> The principal woodland is the Great Wood in the west of the parish and Eastover Copse, Cossical Copse and Stonehanger Copse, which form a continuous strip in the south. Several woods in Abbots Ann are specified in the grant of Henry VIII to Lord St. John in 1542, namely, 'Estover Coppes, Duncross Coppes, Woodstile Coppes, Handley Coppes and Grovecorris Coppes.'<sup>3</sup>

The main road from Andover to Salisbury passes through the east of the parish. The village is situated some distance west of the main road along the right bank of Pillhill Brook. Little Ann lies to the east and St. John's Cross half a mile south.

In Minster Field, on an elevation about a mile and a quarter south-west of the village, a villa was discovered and partly explored in 1854.<sup>4</sup>

In 1775 1,259 acres were inclosed in this parish by Private Act of Parliament.<sup>5</sup>

The manor of ABBOTTS ANN was MANORS among the earliest possessions of Hyde Abbey, for long known as the New Minster at Winchester. In 901 Edward the Elder granted 15 hides of land at Ann to the abbey that daily prayer and intercession might be made for him and his ancestors, the land to be held free except for the trinoda necessitas.<sup>6</sup> In King Edward's 'golden charter' of 903 the manor of Ann, containing 15 hidas cassatas and a church, is included.<sup>7</sup> Less than half a century later Ælfsige, a bishop, probably to be identified with Ælfsige, Bishop of Winchester, who died in 959, bequeathed his land in Ann to his nephew for life with reversion to New Minster.<sup>8</sup> The manor remained in the possession of the abbey until the Dissolution. At the time of the Domesday Survey it was paying geld for 8 hides as against 15 in the Confessor's day.<sup>9</sup> In 1291 it was assessed at £15 8s. 8d.,<sup>10</sup> and in 1310 it was one of nine Hampshire manors out of which the Abbot and convent of Hyde granted an annuity of £60 to Master Jordan Moraunt, king's clerk.<sup>11</sup> The abbey had a grant of free warren over its demesnes of Abbots Ann and elsewhere from Edward III.<sup>12</sup> In 1388 Richard II granted that on all voidances of the abbey this manor and other premises should be exempt from seizure and be enjoyed by the prior and convent, saving only the advowsons to the Crown,<sup>13</sup> since it had been found by inquest that the premises had from time immemorial belonged to the convent as distinct from the portion of the abbot.<sup>14</sup> At the time of the Dissolution £32 19s. 8d. was yearly paid for the farm of the manor.<sup>15</sup>

By letters patent<sup>16</sup> of 3 March 1542 various lands of the dissolved monastery of Hyde were granted to that rising statesman William Paulet Lord St. John, afterwards created Earl of Wiltshire and Marquess of Winchester. These included the manor of Abbots Ann and its appurtenances with the advowson and rectory and certain woods in the parish.<sup>17</sup> In 1572 John Paulet second Marquess of Winchester mortgaged this manor with a number of others to the chancellor of the Exchequer, the attorney-general and the solicitor-general, as security for a debt to the queen, contracted by his father, the great lord treasurer.<sup>18</sup> The third marquess died seized of the premises in 1598.<sup>19</sup> By a fine dated 3 February 1610<sup>20</sup> the manor and advowson of Abbots Ann and other premises were conveyed to the Earls of Salisbury, Northampton and Exeter, Lord Burghley, Lord Danvers and Sir Thomas Denny, who covenanted to stand seized in the same to the use of Lord Edward Paulet, youngest son of William fourth Marquess of Winchester, and his heirs male, with remainder to Lord Charles Paulet, another of the marquess's younger sons, and his heirs male, with remainder to William Lord St. John, eldest son of the marquess, and his right heirs for ever.<sup>21</sup> In 1606 William fourth Marquess of Winchester had leased the manor to Walter Neale of Warnford (co. Hants) for thirty-one years, and in 1630 Lord Edward Paulet brought an action against Sir Francis Neale and others who had entered the premises, made secret estates and otherwise violated the agreement.<sup>22</sup> In 1634 another bill was filed in Chancery, this time by John fifth Marquess of Winchester, Lord Henry Paulet his brother and the tenants of Abbots Ann, asserting that one William King had got an unjust lease of the premises from Lord Edward Paulet, to the complainant's prejudice.<sup>23</sup> How long the property remained to the Paulets is uncertain.<sup>24</sup> Nothing is known of the fate of Lord Edward, that treacherous brother of the 'loyal marquess,' who would have betrayed Basing House to the Parliamentarians. It is probable, however, that he died unmarried. Some time before the end of the 17th century the manor and advowson of Abbots Ann came into the hands of Peter Blake of Andover, who died about the beginning of 1692, leaving his estates to his son and namesake.<sup>25</sup> Peter Blake the younger only survived his father a year, and the property, heavily mortgaged,<sup>26</sup> passed by bequest<sup>27</sup> to his sister Sarah, wife of Edmond Lambert of Boyton (co. Wilts.), with remainder to her heirs.

Early in the 18th century Abbots Ann was the property of Thomas Pitt, governor of Madras, who purchased Little Ann in 1710,<sup>28</sup> and probably acquired the neighbouring manor about the same date.<sup>29</sup> Governor Pitt died in 1726, having by his will, dated 18 July 1721,<sup>30</sup> confirmed an entail of the manor previously made. In 1763 Sir Brian Broughton Delves of Broughton (co. Staffs.), bart., acquired various estates in Hampshire, including the Abbots Ann property, which he contracted to purchase from 'the Honourable Thomas Pitt, esquire,' great-grandson of Governor Pitt and afterwards first Lord Camelford. Dying in 1766 he left all his real estate in Hampshire to his wife Mary daughter of Thomas Hill of Tern (co. Salop) and sister of the first Lord Berwick.<sup>31</sup> The result of this disposition was a suit in Chancery. Sir Thomas Broughton, Sir Brian's brother and heir-at-law, thought that this substantial legacy should make void an annuity of £1,000 settled on Lady Delves at her marriage; so he ceased paying the annuity. Lady Delves, who had meanwhile become the wife of Henry Errington, of the Northumbrian Erringtons, claimed both legacy and jointure and commenced equity proceedings against her brother-in-law. A verdict was given in her favour 28 January 1772 and the decree was affirmed by the House of Lords 8 March 1773.<sup>32</sup> Henry Errington died in 1819, having survived his wife nearly seven years,<sup>33</sup> and the property came to her nephews, the Hon. William and the Rev. the Hon. Richard Hill,<sup>34</sup> afterwards Noel-Hill, who succeeded in turn as third and fourth Lords Berwick.<sup>35</sup> Thence the manor passed by sale in 1841 to the Rev. Thomas Best of Redrice House. He was succeeded by his son Thomas Best, whose son Captain Thomas George Best is the present owner.<sup>36</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey there were three mills, worth 37s. 6d., in Abbots Ann.<sup>37</sup> At the beginning of the 13th century Geoffrey de Ford was holding half a hide of land and a mill in Abbots Ann from Hyde Abbey,<sup>38</sup> and in 1272 a messuage, a mill and other premises there were settled upon John de Ford and his heirs.<sup>39</sup>

In 1692, and again in 1760, 1762 and 1823, two mills went with the manor and advowson.<sup>40</sup> At the present day there are two mills on Pillhill Brook, the Upper Mill and the Lower.

The tithing of LITTLE ANN (Anna, xi cent.; Anne, xiii cent.) lies within the hundred of Wherwell, and comprises a separate manor. At the time of the Domesday Survey and before<sup>41</sup> it was held by the abbey of Wherwell, in whose possession it remained till the Dissolution. In 1245 Henry III granted to the Abbess Eufemia and her nuns that their assarts and purprestures in 'Everhanger, Uppinne and Ann' should remain arable land, saving to the king his regards in the eyre of his regarders.<sup>42</sup> In 1291 the manor was valued at £9 3s. 4d.<sup>43</sup>

In November 1539 Wherwell Abbey surrendered its possessions,<sup>44</sup> and on 24 March following Little Ann, with the site of the monastery and several neighbouring manors, was granted to Thomas West ninth Lord De La Warr,<sup>45</sup> who had already written urgent letters to Cromwell to that end.<sup>46</sup> For more than a century and a half the manor was held by the Lords De La Warr,<sup>47</sup> although in 1605, with the other Wherwell estates, it was seized into the king's hands by reason of the non-payment of a bond given thereon<sup>48</sup>; and in 1615 a licence to sell was granted to Thomas third baron of the new creation.<sup>49</sup> John sixth Lord De La Warr sold the manor in 1695 to Edmond Boulter of London,<sup>50</sup> who in 1698 sold it to Cornelius Cornwallis of Earlstone (co. In 1086 there were in Little Ann two mills worth 30s.,<sup>53</sup> and later John the miller of Ann quitclaimed to the monastery and nuns of Wherwell his lands and mill there.<sup>54</sup> consists of a chancel 25 ft. by 16 ft., nave 49 ft. 6 in. by 24 ft., and a west tower 12 ft. square. It was rebuilt in 1716 by 'Governor' Pitt, and nothing of the earlier building appears to have been preserved except the bells and a small brass. It is of plain style, in red brick with stone cornices and angle pilasters and low-pitched roofs, and is lighted by large round-headed windows, some of which are now filled with modern tracery.

The chancel has three round-headed windows, one in each wall, each now divided into two lights with quatrefoils over. Each side wall has a doorway, that on the south opening into a small vestry. The chancel arch is round-headed. The nave has four windows a side, the eastern pair in each wall being treated like those of the chancel, and the others being left in their original condition with iron frames. A gallery runs across the west end, the front being carried on oak posts. Round-headed doorways open into the tower above and below the gallery. The tower is in three stages with a projecting stair turret on the south side up to the second stage. The bottom stage serves as a porch, and the belfry stage is lighted by segmental-headed windows. The parapet is embattled, and at the corners are crocketed pinnacles of Gothic character.

The altar table, pulpit, font—a small one of oak—and the seats are all contemporary with the building. The only old monument is a small brass inscription in the chancel floor to Elizabeth wife of John Johnson, doctor of divinity, rector of this church, archdeacon of Worcester and treasurer of St. David's; she died in 1613. She was the only child of Richard Monday of Derbyshire, and by her mother descended from the family of Stewkeley of Huntingdonshire.

The ancient custom of hanging funeral chaplets in the church in memory of maids and unmarried men is still practised here, and the parish is probably unique in this matter. The chaplets are made of card, more or less like a crown with arches, and covered with paper rosettes. From this are suspended imitation gloves cut out of a special paper on which are inscribed the names of the deceased, or verses from a hymn, texts, &c. These are carried at the funeral, afterwards remain a week suspended from the gallery, and then are hung from iron stays projecting from the cornice of the nave, with a small shield behind bearing the name and date of each person. There are now some thirty-nine in position, some in a ruinous condition, whilst in five places they have gone altogether; the earliest remaining is one dated 1740 to John Marrant.

The tower contains five bells: the treble inscribed 'Fear God, honour the King 1729,' by John Corr of Aldbourne; the second inscribed 'Hope well'; the third 'Love God'; and the tenor 'Feare the Lord'; all by John Wallis of Salisbury, 1607. The fourth is by Robert Wells of Aldbourne, 1764.

The plate consists of a cup, paten and alms dish of 1801 and a flagon of 1793, all of silver.

The first book of the registers contains baptisms, marriages and burials from 1561 to 1739, the second marriages 1740 to 1754 and baptisms and burials 1740 to 1812, and the third marriages from 1754 to 1812.

In King Edward's charter of 903 ADVOWSON a church is mentioned with the 15 hides in Ann granted to the New Minster.<sup>55</sup> The advowson belonged to the monastery until the Dissolution, though in 1386 there was a dispute between the king and the abbot as to the right of presentation, and Wykeham was forbidden to institute until it was settled.<sup>56</sup> John (Morton), Bishop of Ely (1479–86), presented once during the episcopacy of William Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester (1446–87).<sup>57</sup>

At the Dissolution the advowson was granted to William Paulet Lord St. John<sup>58</sup> and continued to descend with the manor until the close of the 18th century. On 25 August 1716 Governor Pitt wrote to his son Robert, 'I would have the work required in the chancel of Abbots Anne done with all the good husbandry imaginable'<sup>59</sup>; and a fortnight later he wrote, inclosing an estimate of the cost of rebuilding the chancel, 'I return Grist's paper, of which I can form no judgment; but desire that all may be done with good husbandry, and no more of the usual profuseness and carelessness. Grist must be well looked after.'<sup>60</sup>

In the early 19th century the advowson belonged to John Burrough,<sup>61</sup> and successively to his sons Thomas and Sir James Burrough, passing to the heirs of the last named; it is now in the hands of the trustees of his grandson, the Rev. James Burrough Fenwick, sometime rector of the parish.<sup>62</sup>

A mandate was given at Marwell 11 September 1395, and sealed 27 January 1403, which changed the feast of the dedication from the Sunday after the Assumption of the Virgin (15 August) to the Sunday after the Exaltation of the Holy Cross (14 September), with forty days' indulgence to all who should attend the feast.<sup>63</sup>

The schools were built in 1831, destroyed by fire in 1899, and rebuilt in 1900 for 140 children.

Thomas Criswick, as appeared on CHARITIES a monument in the church, gave £3 yearly in 1727 for educating poor children. The annuity is paid by Captain Thomas Best, the lord of the manor, and carried to the school account.

AMPORT

Anne (xi cent.); Anne de Port (xiii cent.); Andeporte (xiv cent.); Anneport (xv cent.).

Amport is an irregularly-shaped parish, one of the largest in the hundred, containing 3,962 acres, of which 2,408 acres are arable land, 753 acres permanent grass and 522 acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is very light and the subsoil chalk.<sup>2</sup> The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats, sainfoin and turnips. The average height above sea level is rather over 300 ft. Towards the west, however, the ground rises considerably, reaching 544 ft., its highest point, on Cholderton Hill. In the southern part of the parish there are considerable stretches of woodland, the principal being Sarson Wood, Upper and Lower Amport Woods, Gollard Copse, Great and Little Vinels Copses and Hurst Copse. In Gollard Copse grounds of 60 acres, and is at present occupied by Mr. Henry Charles Stephens, J.P. It was formerly the seat of Rev. W. Knatchbull.

The road from Andover to Amesbury follows the northern border of the parish and the site of the Port Way, to which a modern road keeps more or less closely, passes through Amport Park.

The manor of AMPORT, called simply MANORS Anne in Domesday Book, was held before the Conquest by Edric. In 1086 it was held by Hugh de Port<sup>3</sup> and formed part of the barony of Basing (q.v.). In 1241, for 6 silver marks, Robert St. John, the overlord, the descendant of Hugh de Port, quitclaimed to the mesne lord Thomas de Port and his heirs the suit which they owed every three weeks at his court of Basing.<sup>4</sup> The overlordship and Gollard Farm, hard by, is no doubt preserved the name of the tenement, La Goldhorde, which the priory of Ogbourne once owned here (vide infra).

Amport House, a seat of the Marquess of Winchester, built half a century ago in the Elizabethan style, stands in a park of 200 acres. The village lies to the north of the park, with the church at its west end. A little to the east, adjoining Monxton, is Sarson, while East Cholderton lies northward on the road to Thruxton. Northward again is Dancy, a hamlet included in the tithing of Sarson but partly in Appleshaw. Middlecot tithing is 3 miles west of Amport, while Cholderton Lodge is on the Wiltshire border, a mile further on. It is a building of red brick and flint standing in wooded of Amport followed the descent of the barony,<sup>5</sup> passing in 1349 to Luke de Poynings and Isabel his wife on the apportionment of the possessions of Hugh St. John among his sisters and co-heirs,<sup>6</sup> and to Sir John Paulet in 1429 on the death of Thomas Poynings, Lord St. John, whose granddaughter and co-heir he had married. It is interesting to note that the direct descendant of these early overlords now holds the manor.

The earliest mesne lords of Amport were presumably a younger branch of the Port family, holding from the head of their house. It was from them that the manor derived its distinctive name of Ann de Port or Amport. In 1228 John de Port claimed an assize of novel disseisin against Henry de neither the advowson of the church with a carucate and 4 acres of land appurtenant nor a carucate called 'Golhord'<sup>8</sup> which the Prior of Ogbourne held.<sup>9</sup> In 1236 Philip de Port, evidently the elder brother just mentioned, quitclaimed this fee to Thomas and his heirs.<sup>10</sup> It was doubtless this same Thomas who is entered in Testa de Nevill as holding Ampport as one knight's fee of the old feoffment of Robert St. John, the tenant in chief,<sup>11</sup> and to whom in 1241 Robert St. John gave quittance of making suit at Basing.<sup>12</sup> Thomas de Port mortgaged land of the value of £10, which seems to represent the manor, to Beletoun the Jew, who in 1263 demised it to William de Apelderford.<sup>13</sup> William was doubtless succeeded by that Stephen de Apelderford who is mentioned in the 'Aid' of 1346 as having formerly held 2 hides in Ampport.<sup>14</sup> For some reason, however, the manor had escheated to the overlords before 1306. In that year John St. John, the first of the name to be summoned to Parliament, assigned his right therein to Thomas de Quarley, clerk, and John de St. Manifeo,<sup>15</sup> who consequently appear as lords of the vill in the Nomina Villarum ten years later.<sup>16</sup>

The manor was still in the hands of these tenants in 1325 when they fined with John Roger of Tidworth and Thomas de St. Manifeo for the purpose of entailing it on John de St. Manifeo and his heirs, with remainders to his brother Thomas, his sister Alice, and Maud daughter of Hugh Angot of Quarley and their heirs.<sup>17</sup> Shortly after this, at least by 1342 (vide infra), the manor passed into the hands of the Carews of Mohun's Ottery (co. Devon). Joan Carew was returned as the holder in 1346.<sup>18</sup>

There was a Joan Carew living at this date, viz. Joan Talbot, the second wife of John Carew, who died in 1324.<sup>19</sup> But the probability is that 'Johanna' is a mistake for 'Johannes,' for John Carew, the son of John Carew and Joan his wife, was in possession of the manor in 1342,<sup>20</sup> and was returned as holding the St. John fee of Ampport in 1349.<sup>21</sup> He died seised in 1362.<sup>22</sup> Subsequently an inquiry was made as to whether dower therein had been correctly assigned to Elizabeth, his widow, seeing that Leonard, his son and heir, said that the manor had been granted by feoffees to John and Margaret, his first wife, whose son the said Leonard was. The jury found that the alleged enfeoffment had been made in 1342.<sup>23</sup>

Leonard Carew died in 1369, having conveyed the manor to feoffees before going abroad in the train of the Earl of Pembroke,<sup>24</sup> presumably in the same year, when the earl went to France for the first time. In 1431 his son Sir Thomas Carew died seised jointly with his wife Elizabeth,<sup>25</sup> who in the 'Aid' of the same year figures as Elizabeth Carew of 'Mones Otrei (Mohun's Ottery, in Luppit, co. Devon), gentilewoman,' holding one quarter of a knight's fee in Ampport.<sup>26</sup> In 1437 this and other manors were settled on her for life, with remainder to her son Nicholas Carew and Joan his wife.<sup>27</sup> Ampport continued to be held by the Carew family until 1497,<sup>28</sup> when Sir Edmund Carew, great-grandson of Nicholas, sold it to Bartholomew Reed, citizen and goldsmith of London,<sup>29</sup> who died seised thereof in 1505, having by his will settled his new property on his wife Elizabeth for life, with an estate of ten years after her death to the Goldsmiths' Company, and remainder to his nephew William, younger son of his brother John Reed, and his male issue.<sup>30</sup> In 1572 another Bartholomew Reed sold the manor to Alexander Irton,<sup>31</sup> a cadet of the Cumberland house of Irton. At the Wiltshire visitation of 1623 was registered the pedigree of George Irton of Britford and Amport son of Alexander Irton of Amport,<sup>32</sup> and the family also appears in the Hampshire visitation of 1634.<sup>33</sup> George Irton had a son Richard, aged twenty-three in 1623, and a daughter Joan, wife of Thomas Goldston of Alderbury (co. Wilts.).<sup>34</sup>

At the Wiltshire visitation the pedigree of Goldston was also recorded, which shows Thomas Goldston and Joan Irton to have had a son and heir Richard, then aged two months.<sup>35</sup> This Richard may perhaps be identified with the Richard Goldston of Amport who was compounding for delinquency in 1649.<sup>36</sup> His fine—assessed at one-sixth of his estate—amounted to £150. Shortly after this the manor became the property of the house that still owns it. Lord Henry Paulet, fourth son of William fourth Marquess of Winchester and a younger brother of the 'loyal marquess,' was lord of Amport in the reign of Charles II. He died in 1672,<sup>37</sup> and was succeeded by his son Francis, and his grandson Norton Paulet.<sup>38</sup> On the death in 1794 of Harry sixth and last Duke of Bolton and eleventh Marquess of Winchester George eighth and youngest son of Norton Paulet of Amport succeeded to the marquessate,<sup>39</sup> and from him is descended Henry William Montagu (Paulet) sixteenth Marquess of Winchester, now lord of the manor of Amport, where is his chief seat.

There was a mill at Amport in 1086 worth 20s.<sup>40</sup> In 1328 Thomas de Quarley and John de St. Manifeo, the lords of the manor, granted to John de Cormeilles, lord of Thruxton, and his heirs the water flowing from the mill-wheel in Amport as far as the way which lay on the west of the wheel by the said vill with the right of digging and dredging (fodere et mundare), and making a fish-stew, in return for which John de Cormeilles granted them and their tenants the right of pasturing their cattle on the grass which grew in the water and gathering the said grass for the strawing of their houses.<sup>41</sup> A water-mill is mentioned in an extent of the manor in 1451.<sup>42</sup> Sir George Philpot, lord of Thruxton, who died in 1624,<sup>43</sup> and his son Sir John were both seised of a water-mill in Amport,<sup>44</sup> and in the deed of sale of Thruxton Manor to George Paulet (1783) there is mention of a close of meadow called Millhamby in Amport, near the old mill there.<sup>45</sup>

There are four entries of CHOLDERTON (Cere-wartone, xi cent.; Chelewarton, Schilwareton, Chule-wirton, xiii cent.) in Domesday Book. Gilbert de Breteville held 4 hides and 3 virgates of the king, of which one Ralf was his under-tenant. This had formerly been held as an alod by four freemen as four manors.<sup>46</sup> Either this or the holding of William son of Baderon, consisting of 1 hide and 2½ virgates, which had been held as an alod of the Confessor by three freemen, is to be identified with the later manor.<sup>47</sup> The history of the overlordship of the manor is not clear, but it seems probable that the knight's fee which Henry de Columbers held in 1208<sup>48</sup> and Thomas de Cholderton held later in the 13th century of Matthew de Columbers<sup>49</sup> was held by the Columbers of the Marshals of England<sup>50</sup> and was represented by the half-fee held in 1280 by Matthew de Columbers of the Earl of Gloucester of the heirs of the Marshal.<sup>51</sup> Moreover Roger Bigod Earl of Norfolk and Marshal of England was overlord of Cholderton at his death in 1306<sup>52</sup> (when the office became vested in the Crown),<sup>53</sup> and Roger Norman was holding of John de Cobham the Marshal half a century later.<sup>54</sup> However, there was another three-quarters of a fee in Cholderton held by Thomas de Cholderton of the Earl of Hereford, as Mr. Round has discovered, at the time of the Testa de Nevill,<sup>55</sup> but this overlordship apparently merged in the other at a later date.

Henry de Ann appears to have been lord of the manor, holding of Henry de Columbers, in 1200.<sup>56</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Within the next few years he acquired a hide of land in Cholderton from Richard Murdac and another from Henry de Stratfield,<sup>57</sup> the first of which probably, and the second possibly, represented the Domesday estate of 2 hides and  $\frac{1}{2}$  virgate which Robert son of Murdac held in chief.<sup>58</sup> The lords of Cholderton throughout the 13th century are sometimes spoken of as 'de Ann,' sometimes as 'de Cholderton,' but these designations seem to refer to the same family. In the middle of the century Thomas de Cholderton was holding of Matthew de Columbers and the Earl of Hereford.<sup>59</sup> In 1278 a moiety of the lands of Thomas de Cholderton in Cholderton and in Ann Savage was assigned to Benedict, a Jew of Winchester, to whom he was indebted,<sup>60</sup> and two years later, the Jew having been hanged for felony, the premises, together with the debts and arrears of Thomas, were given to Hugh son of Otto in

In 1321 Philip son of John de Ann conveyed to Ingram Berenger two messuages, land and rent in Cholderton, which William de Shuldeleye held for life.<sup>61</sup> This appears to have ended the de Ann connexion with Cholderton, and in 1329 Sir Ingram Berenger conveyed a messuage and land there to Roger Norman and Joan his wife.<sup>62</sup> In 1337 Norman was granted free warren in Cholderton,<sup>63</sup> and in 1346 he appears as holding there a quarter of a fee, which had formerly belonged to Philip de Sancto Austolo and other coparceners.<sup>64</sup> Except here and in the 'Aid' of 1428 there is no mention of this Philip de Sancto Austolo. A possible solution is to identify him with Philip de Ann. Roger Norman died seised of the manor of Cholderton in 1349,<sup>65</sup> leaving a grandson and heir Giles, during whose minority it was in the custody of Peter de Bridges at a rent of £23 6s. 8d.<sup>66</sup> On the death of Giles in 1363 Richard Cavendish and Julia compensation for the custody of the dies of London and Canterbury.<sup>61</sup> In 1287 John Maude sought to replevy to Thomas de Cholderton his lands in Cholderton and Appleshaw, which had been taken into the king's hands for his default against Roger de Leckford and Emma his wife.<sup>62</sup> This Thomas is to be identified with the Thomas de Ann who was at this date holding in Ann Savage of the honour of Wigmore.<sup>63</sup> John de Ann held three-quarters of a fee of the Marshal of England in 1306,<sup>64</sup> and ten years later the vill was found to be divided between John de Ann, Philip de Ann, Philip Wasprai and John de Romsey.<sup>65</sup> his wife, John de Glemsford and Beatrice his wife, and William Chamberlayne and Christine his wife granted the manor<sup>73</sup> to the same Peter de Bridges.<sup>73</sup> It is possible that the three ladies named in this deed were co-heirs to Roger Norman's estates as daughters of Margaret wife of John Chamberlayne and heir of her cousin Giles Norman. However that may be, in 1391 Richard Becket and Alice his wife, kinswoman and heir of Roger Norman, obtained an inspeximus and confirmation of a charter of free warren which had been granted to Roger Norman,<sup>74</sup> and Alice Becket was daughter and heir of Richard Cavendish.<sup>76</sup> Richard Becket, who died lord of the manor of South Tidworth in 1411, was not then seised of Cholderton. The latter had probably passed by sale from Peter de Bridges to Sir Walter Sandys, who in 1428 held the quarter fee which had belonged to Philip de Sancto Austolo.<sup>76</sup> His son Thomas Sandys died seised of the manor in 1442,<sup>77</sup> and it descended to the Lords Sandys of the Vyne,<sup>78</sup> who were holding at the end of the 16th century. No later record of the existence of a manor in Cholderton has been discovered, but in 1742 the site is mentioned in a recovery of the manor of Amport,<sup>79</sup> to which it had doubtless become attached.

John Leland in his Itinerary thus refers to Cholderton:—‘The auncient house, as far as I can lerne, that the Sannes hath possessed is Choldretoun, a mile and a half from Andover in Hamptonshire, where yet remainith a fair manor place buildid for the most part of flint.’<sup>80</sup>

A mill is mentioned in a fine of a hide of land in Cholderton in 1205,<sup>81</sup> and is probably the water-mill which is noted in an extent of the manor made in 1349.<sup>82</sup>

At Domesday Hugh de Port held 3 hides in Cholderton, which Edric had held of the Confessor as an alod and a manor.<sup>83</sup> A certain Ralf held of Hugh de Port as under-tenant. In the Testa de Nevill Geoffrey de Cundy is entered as holding half a fee of the old enfeoffment of Robert de Brayboef, who held of Robert St. John.<sup>84</sup> At the death of William de Brayboef in 1283 Gilbert de Cundy held of him one fee in Cholderton and Appleshaw, rendering 40s. scutage and doing suit at the court of Cranborne Manor, which Brayboef held of Sir John St. John.<sup>85</sup> In 1337 Hugh de Brayboef was a fee-holder under Hugh St. John.<sup>86</sup> With regard to the mesne lordship it is probable that Gilbert de Cundy was succeeded here as at Vernhams Dean (q.v.) by Walter de Romsey; for Walter de Romsey had a son John, and John de Romsey was one of the holders of the vill of Cholderton in 1316.<sup>87</sup> Shortly after this, however, the premises passed to Roger Norman, who thus united the two main Cholderton estates (see supra) and died in 1349 seised of the manor with its members of Appleshaw and Fyfield held (except Fyfield) of John de Cobham, the Earl Marshal, and John de Brayboef.<sup>88</sup>

Two estates existing in the parish at the time of the Domesday Survey formed the later manor of SARSON (Anna Savage, xiii cent.; Saveston, xv cent.; Savageston alias Saveiston alias Anne Savage alias Sareson)—one at Ann and the other at ‘Soredene.’ The former, which paid geld for 5 hides, was held by Ilgeramus of Ralf de Mortimer. Edric had held it under the Confessor.<sup>89</sup> The latter, which was assessed at 1 virgate (vide infra), was held by Ralf of Waleran the Huntsman. His predecessor was Godric, who had held it as an alod of King Edward as a manor.<sup>90</sup>

The Mortimers continued overlords of the former estate until the failure of their line on the death in 1425 of Edmund last Earl of March.<sup>91</sup> The earl’s heir was his nephew, Richard Duke of York, father of Edward IV, on whose accession in 1461 the fee in Sarson came to the Crown.<sup>92</sup> The manor was parcel of the honour of Wigmore,<sup>93</sup> and in 1429 it was found to be held of the Duke of York as of the manor of Stratfield Mortimer.<sup>94</sup>

At an early period the manor was held of the Mortimers by the Savages, but the only evidence of their tenure beyond the fact that for some time the manor was called Ann Savage is a reference in the Testa de Nevill to a fee of Thomas Salvag' in Ann.<sup>95</sup> By the middle of the 13th century the Savage family was succeeded in possession of the manor by Geoffrey de Wyncleford, who was returned as holding two parts of a fee in Ann Savage of the ancient feoffment of Ralf de Mortimer.<sup>96</sup> In 1280 Thomas de Ann held three parts of a fee of the honour of Wigmore,<sup>97</sup> and in 1316 John de Ann was lord of Ann Savage.<sup>98</sup> In 1324 a messuage, a mill, a carucate of land and 30s. rent were settled in remainder on John de Ann and Sybil his wife.<sup>99</sup> The holding passed before long to Roger Norman, lord of Cholderton, who granted it for life to Sybil Loveray. Sybil died seised in 1361, when it reverted to Margaret Chamberlayne, niece of Roger Norman (vide supra).<sup>101</sup> Two years later a toft, a carucate of land, 6 acres of meadow and 5 marks rent in Ann Savage and Andover were conveyed with Cholderton (q.v.) Manor by Julia wife of Richard Cavendish, Beatrice wife of John de Glemsford and Christine wife of William Chamberlayne to Peter de Bridges.<sup>101</sup> The latter was evidently still seised of the estate in 1368,<sup>102</sup> when he endowed a chantry in the parish church of Andover with 53s. 4d. rent in Sarson held of the Earl of March.<sup>103</sup> Peter de Bridges probably conveyed the manor to Robert Kyngesham, who died seised of the same in 1429, leaving as his heir a daughter Alice, aged six years.<sup>104</sup> After this follows a break of nearly a century, during which time there is no record of the holders of the manor. In 1511 John Kybbell died seised of it, leaving a son and heir George Kybbell.<sup>105</sup> By 1554 it had come to the hands of the Lises,<sup>106</sup> who continued to hold until 1598,<sup>107</sup> when Anthony Lisle sold it to Arthur Swayne.<sup>108</sup> Edward Swayne died seised in 1615,<sup>109</sup> his heir being his brother Robert, who was holding in 1641,<sup>110</sup> when he conveyed the property to Ralph Knapton. At some subsequent date, presumably in the late 17th century, the manor passed to John Duke, a younger son of John Duke of Lake (co. Wilts.), who died in 1671.<sup>111</sup> The Dukes held, apparently, well into the 19th century.<sup>112</sup> William Duke of Chichester was holding lands in Hampshire in 1873,<sup>113</sup> which presumably included Ann Savage or Sarson. However, all manorial rights have long ceased to exist.

The virgate of land in 'Soresdene,' which Ralf had held of Waleran the Huntsman, had soon become merged in the 5-hide estate in Ann which Ilgeramus had held of Ralf de Mortimer, being in the possession of Thomas de Ann or de Cholderton towards the end of the 13th century.<sup>114</sup> It was from this land that Maud widow of Robert Waleran was demanding 17s. 9d. rent in dower in 1274.<sup>115</sup> Robert Waleran, son of William Waleran, was Sheriff of Gloucester, and possibly descended from the Huntsman. He died in 1272, leaving a minor as his heir. Maud, his second wife, was daughter of Ralph Russell of Dedham (co. Glouc.).<sup>116</sup> In 1277 the Sheriff of Hampshire was ordered to cause Joan, late the wife of Walter de Langford, tenant in chief, to have seisin of a third of 4 marks yearly of rent in Ann Savage, to hold for life as her dower of the said rent.<sup>117</sup> There is obviously some connexion between these two assignments of dower. The amounts are the same, 17s. 9d. being the precise equivalent of a third of 4 marks. Some light may, perhaps, be thrown on this connexion by the fact that Walter de Langford had granted his moiety of West Tytherley Manor to Robert Waleran for life in exchange for the manor of Little Winterbourne (co. Wilts.).<sup>118</sup>

There was a mill at Sarson worth 25s. in 1086,<sup>119</sup> and one is mentioned in a fine between John de Ann and Edward de Escote in 1324.<sup>120</sup> In 1489 Sir Richard Darell died seised of a water-mill there which he held of Sir Nicholas Lisle, his grandson John Awdley being named his heir.<sup>121</sup> Two mills are mentioned in a recovery of the manor in 1641.<sup>122</sup>

The priory of Ogbourne (co. Wilts.), which, as English representative of the abbey of Bec Hellouin, held the neighbouring manors of Monxton and Quarley (q.v.), owned a carucate of land in Ampport and Over Wallop called GOLHORD or LA GOLDHORDE, which had formed part of Hugh de Port's holding in Ann in 1086.<sup>123</sup> This estate is first mentioned in 1226, in which year Richard and Edith, respectively son and widow of Henry de Stratfield, granted the reversion after their death to Henry, Abbot of Bec.<sup>124</sup> Some fifty years later Peter,

Abbot of Bec, made a life grant to William de Wanetyng of a carucate and  $2\frac{1}{2}$  virgates of land in Amport and Monxton.<sup>125</sup>

From an Assize Roll of 1280 it appears that at one time the holder of Golhord owed suit at the hundred of Andover, but that Henry III, by a charter dated 1252-3, freed the Abbot of Bec and his successors of that and other obligations.<sup>126</sup> In 1331 Richard son of Richard de Golhord died seised of a messuage, 184½ acres of land and 4 acres of wood in Amport, together with 13s. 4d. rent in Wallop, leaving a son John,<sup>127</sup> of whom the king took fealty for the premises, as being held of the heir of John St. John, a minor, by the service of the sixteenth part of a knight's fee and suit of court every three weeks at the hundred of Andover.<sup>128</sup> Upon this, however, came Brother Richard de Beausevall, attorney-general in England for the Abbot of Bec, and asserted in Chancery that the abbot held the tenements by virtue of a fine levied in 1226 between Henry, then abbot, and Richard son of Henry de Stratfield, and by quitclaim from Richard son of Richard. The disputed premises were then resumed into the king's hands, and John de Golhord was summoned to make good his claim in Chancery. Since he did not appear, and Brother Richard produced both fine and deed of quitclaim, the escheator was ordered to deliver the lands and all issues received therefrom to the abbot or his attorney.<sup>129</sup> In 1346 the Prior of Ogbourne is bracketed with Joan Carew as holding 2 hides in Amport and Golhord.<sup>130</sup> This holding was doubtless included in the grant of Ogbourne property to John of Lancaster in 1404, and its subsequent separate history cannot be traced, though the name is preserved in Gollard Copse and Gollard Farm.

The church of ST. MARY consists of a chancel 32 ft. 7 in. by 18 ft., with a north vestry and organ chamber, crossing under the central tower 13 ft. 9 in. square, north transept 12 ft. 10 in. by 10 ft. 8 in., south transept 12 ft. 7 in. by 10 ft. and a nave 52 ft. 9 in. by 18 ft. 9 in., with a small porch at the north-west corner. All the measurements are taken within the walls.

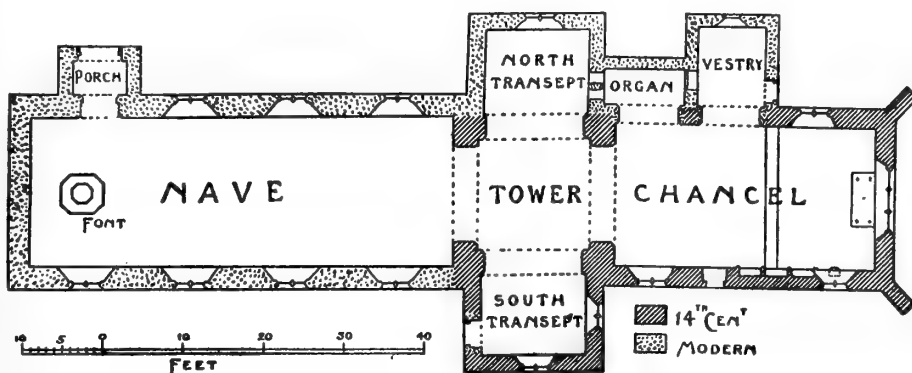

The history of the building is confined to the 14th century and modern rebuilding. The chancel, tower and south transept are the only complete parts of the old church, and these date from about 1320-30. The main walls of the nave were of the same date, but little was left of these when the new north and south windows were put in in 1866, at which date the north transept was also rebuilt and the north porch and vestry were added. The organ chamber is a later addition still.

The 14th-century east window of the chancel has three trefoiled lights with additional smaller foils to the centre light, and the tracery above is composed of two trefoiled spandrels and a circle containing three flowing foils. The label outside is of scroll section returned at the springing.

The north window of the chancel and the easternmost one in the opposite wall are of the same date as the east window, having two trefoiled lights each, with a circle of three flowing foils over and a scrolled label. The second window in the south wall, also of the 14th century, has two lights with trefoiled ogee heads, and a foiled spherical triangle in the spandrel.

Beneath the first window of this wall is a piscina with octagonal basin, chamfered shelf, moulded jambs and moulded trefoiled ogee head with a plain roll label stopping on small crouching animals. The drain is in the form of a rose. To the west of this are the sedilia with projecting moulded jambs and divisions, and ogee heads enriched with foliage; the whole is original work, but much scraped down. The priest's doorway between the sedilia and the second window has plain chamfered jambs and two-centred arch without a label.

The vestry has a modern east doorway and a single-light window on the north. The opening from the chancel has chamfered jambs and two-centred arch of two chamfered orders, all apparently of old stonework. The four arches supporting the tower, and the opening to the organ chamber, are similar, the latter being modern.

The north transept contains a two-light north window, which is a copy of the second window in the south wall of the chancel. In the east wall are two small pointed openings towards the organ chamber.

The south transept, used as the Marquess of Winchester's pew, has an east and a south window of 14th-century date, both similar to the second window on the south side of the chancel. In the west wall is a plain modern doorway.

The nave contains three windows on the north side and four on the south, all modern copies of those of the south transept. In the gable of the west wall is a large modern circular window with tracery.

The modern north doorway is placed near the west end, and has plain chamfered jambs and two-centred arch.

The tower has plain plastered walls with a projecting stone parapet at the top, below which is a hollow moulding enriched with four-leaf flowers and ball flowers. In each face just below this parapet is a small window of two trefoiled ogee-headed lights with a quatrefoil over.

Within the chancel rails are five marble slabs to the Paulet family, and a number of 17th-century slabs in the chancel floor, and on the south wall are tablets to Mary wife of Robert Swayne, 1635, and to her niece, Katherine Young, 1638. In the Paulet pew is a beautiful white marble tablet to the fifteenth Marquess of Winchester, killed at Magersfontein, 1899.

All the roofs are modern with plaster between the rafters. The east and west faces of the tower show the weathering of the original chancel and nave roofs, which were of slightly steeper pitch than the present ones.

All the furniture of the church is modern with the exception of a carved chair in the south transept, bearing the date 1688. There is a little 17th-century Flemish glass in the south window of this transept, and at the bottom of the lights the Paulet motto 'Ayez Loyauté.'

The tower contains a ring of six bells, the treble being by Mears & Stainbank, 1895; the second is inscribed 'Clement Tosier cast me in the year of 1717,' and the names of the churchwardens. The third was also cast by the same founder in 1686. The fourth is by I. D. 1703. The fifth and tenor are by William Purdue of Salisbury, 1662.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1798 and two patens, one undated, the other of 1878; also a plated chalice and paten given by Archdeacon Webber in 1830, and a plated and a pewter flagon.

The earliest book of registers contains baptisms from 1665 to 1722, marriages from the same date to 1754, and burials also from the same date to 1681. Next to these are entries of burials on loose paper sheets from 1680 to 1760. The third book continues the baptisms and burials up to 1812, and the fourth book contains marriages from 1754 to 1812.

Consent was given by the bishop in 1744 for burials of this parish to take place at the chapelry of Appleshaw.

Richard le Poor, Bishop of ADVOWSONS Chichester (1215-17), acquired the church of Ampport,<sup>131</sup> no doubt from Adam de Port, in whose gift it was, in 1209,<sup>132</sup> and appropriated it to the dean and chapter. The Dean and Chapter of Chichester have continuously presented the vicars from that date.<sup>133</sup> In 1291 the church with chapel and pension was valued at £26 13s. 4d., but the vicarage was not assessed, as the vicar received all and paid a pension of £40 (sic) to the patrons.<sup>134</sup>

There was a chapel in Cholderton at least as early as the 12th century, and in 1200 Henry de Ann, lord of the manor, acknowledged it to pertain to the church of Ampport, and consequently to be in the gift of Adam de Port.<sup>135</sup> A few years later, however, Henry de Columbars was claiming the right of presentation against Adam de Port, on the plea that the chapel was founded on his fee. Both disputants alleged that their ancestors had presented, but the verdict has not been preserved.<sup>136</sup> The result, however, is of little consequence, as within a very short time of this date the advowson had been acquired by Chichester Cathedral (vide ante).

There is a Primitive Methodist chapel in Ampport, built in 1846.

The school was built and endowed in 1815 from the Sheppard charity. It was enlarged in 1892, and again in 1898, and will now accommodate 190 children.

The School and Almshouses Charity CHARITIES was founded by the will of the Rev.

Thomas Sheppard, D.D., dated 30 June 1812, and proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury in 1814, and augmented by his widow, Sophia Sheppard, by deed of 25 July 1844. The trust estate consists of (1) the land and buildings used as a schoolhouse; (2) £9,000 consols standing in the corporate name of the president and scholars of Magdalen College, Oxford; (3) £1,208 6s. 8d. like stock standing in the like name, being the gift of Mrs. Sophia Sheppard. By an order of the Charity Commissioners of 23 February 1904, made under the Board of Education Act, 1899, it was determined that the part of the endowment which constituted 'Sheppard's Educational Foundation' consisted of the schoolhouse, £3,000 consols, part of the £9,000 like stock, and £136 2s. 3d. consols, part of the £1,208 6s. 8d. like stock.

Under the trusts the income of £6,000 consols, being £150 a year, is applicable in the maintenance of six poor widows upwards of fifty years of age, residing in six almshouses erected by Mrs. Sophia Sheppard, and out of the income of £1,208 6s. 8d. consols £20 per annum is payable to the rector of Quarley for fuel and comforts for the poor of that parish.

ANDOVER WITH FOXCOTT CHAPELRY

Andefera (x cent.) ; Andovere (xi cent.) ; Andewra, Andeura (xii cent.) ; Andevre, Andever (xiii cent.).

The parish of Andover is by far the largest in the hundred to which it gives its name. It extends over 8,663 acres, of which 5,173 acres are of arable land, 884½ acres permanent grass and 29 acres woodland.<sup>1</sup>

The town lies towards the south-west of the parish, on either side of the River Anton. The High Street runs north and south, being continued northwards past the cemetery towards Charlton, and southward becoming the Winchester road. Bridge Street cuts it at right angles and runs west to Devizes. The Salisbury road branches from it just outside the town. Other principal roads are those which run northward to Newbury and eastward to Basingstoke. The church, with the vicarage hard by, is in the north of the town to the east of High Street. The Town Hall, a stone building in the Classic style, was built in 1825 on the site of one built in 1725. Across the river lies the Andover Union workhouse with a fever hospital adjoining. There is another fever hospital outside the town to the north-east, not far from the site of St. John's Hospital. The New Town lies in the angle formed by the Salisbury and Devizes roads.

Andover station on the main line of the London and South Western Railway is the junction of the Andover and Redbridge branch. The junction of the Midland and South Western line to Swynnerton, Cirencester and Cheltenham is also here.

Andover has never been a place of much historical prominence. Though under royal lordship, it was never a dwelling-place of kings, and King John's fish-stew<sup>2</sup> seems to be the chief manifestation of personal interest on their part. Its principal interest is derived from the fact that it stood on the high road from London to the West,<sup>3</sup> and thus came fleetingly into touch with many an event of national importance.

Many kings since Edgar and Ethelred (vide infra) have made Andover a halting place, as the dating of royal letters testifies.<sup>4</sup> In the 17th century the town was repeatedly brought into such indirect and transient prominence. James I was here in 1623,<sup>5</sup> and five years earlier the place marked a stage of Raleigh's last journey to London.<sup>6</sup> Andover's share in the Irish rebellion of 1642 was to draw a complaint from the Sheriff of Hampshire for giving no assistance in conveying prisoners to the capital.<sup>7</sup> During the Civil War the town was a Royalist commissariat station. The Sheriff of Berkshire was required to send provisions there to the value of £200 every week,<sup>8</sup> but means of conveyance were hard to come by.<sup>9</sup> In February 1645 three regiments of horse were quartered there.<sup>10</sup>

In April 1653 fifty Dutch prisoners taken in the war were sent to Andover,<sup>11</sup> and in the following June Philip Borde, the bailiff, was petitioning the Navy Commissioners to refund him £70 for their maintenance.<sup>12</sup> On 24 and 25 November 1688 James II stayed at Andover on his way from Salisbury, where he had thought to face his son-in-law,<sup>13</sup> and thence Prince George of Denmark, the Duke of Ormonde and others stole away in the night to join William of Orange.<sup>14</sup> 'I shall never forget the confusion the Court was in,' wrote Dr. George Clarke.<sup>15</sup> Two days later the bailiff and magistrates wrote to the king to profess their duty and loyalty, and James replied through Lord Preston, thanking them for the signal proof they had given of both in suppressing the late disorder and tumult in their town.<sup>16</sup> Andover has been the birthplace or dwelling-place of few famous men. Isaac Chauncy, that prolific Nonconformist writer, took charge of the Congregational church in 1662.<sup>17</sup> William Howley, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, was vicar from 1802 to 1811.<sup>18</sup>

Foxcote is situated 2 miles north-west from Andover town. The agricultural returns show for it an area of 1,290 acres of arable land, 373 acres of permanent grass and 63 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>19</sup> The village consists mainly of the church and the buildings of Foxcote Farm.

By an Order in Council dated 7 May 1858 all parts of the parish of Andover north of the main line of the London and South Western Railway were formed into an independent district chapelry of Christ Church Smannell with Hatherden.<sup>20</sup> In 1874 Smannell and Hatherden were separated and constituted ecclesiastical parishes.<sup>21</sup> Hatherden is situated 3 miles north of Andover. Hatherden House, which has been for over thirty years the seat of Mr. Alfred Butterworth, stands in a considerable park. Wildhern is in the same district.

Smannell is situated 2½ miles north-east of the town, it contains the hamlets of Woodhouse, East Anton, Little London and Finkley. Finkley House is the seat of the Rev. Robert Finch. The north-eastern part of the parish is well wooded, including the southern portion of Doles Wood, which was parcel of Finkley Park or Finkley Forest. A survey of this park, taken by order of the Parliamentary Commissioners in 1652, exists at the Public Record Office.<sup>22</sup> At that date it contained 841 a. 1 r. 17 p., together with a lodge standing therein. There were

7,149 timber trees and saplings growing in it, and there were also various copses in the park,<sup>35</sup> usually fenced in, and containing 620a. 2r. The 150 deer in the park were valued at £100 and the rabbits at £50. 'The wood and woody ground called the Ridges,'<sup>36</sup> which was parcel of Finkley Forest, contained 5,120 trees, and the underwoods there were worth £40. Richard Cromwell was then the chief ranger, and William Cooke the keeper. The inhabitants of King's Enham, Knight's Enham and East Anton had certain rights of common of pasture in Finkley Park, and 20s. yearly and 9s. yearly were paid to the ranger and the keeper respectively towards the making of fences by the tenants of King's Enham farm, under Magdalen College, Oxford, who from time immemorial had had common of pasture there for seventy cows and one bull from Mayday to Michaelmas. Four years after his accession Charles II granted Finkley Park to George Duke of Albemarle and his heirs for ever.<sup>37</sup>

In May's Wood is preserved the name of an ancient manor. Charlton is further south, a mile from Andover on the Hungerford road.

The sites of the Roman roads from Old Sarum to Silchester and from Winchester to Cirencester both pass through the parish, crossing one another near the hamlet of East Anton. Barksbury Camp is near the Upper Clatford boundary. There are two barrows near Finkley. Though little has been discovered within the parish itself, Andover is the centre of a district extraordinarily fertile in Roman remains.<sup>38</sup>

An inclosure award was made in 1740<sup>39</sup> and in 1784 the common lands comprising Andover Great or East Field, Andover West Field, Andover Down, Andover Marshes, Enham Heath and Finkley Down were inclosed by a Private Act of Parliament.<sup>40</sup>

The borough of Andover is co-BOROUGH extensive with the parish, which in 1835 comprised the six tithings of Alderman-le-Grand, Priory, Winchester Street, Charlton, Hatherden and Enham Regis, together forming the in-hundred. Of these the first three were specifically designated 'the borough,' and possibly indicate its original extent. Charlton, Hatherden and Enham Regis formed the 'out in-hundred.'<sup>45</sup>

According to the document which purports to be his will, King Edred left the 'ham' of Andover to the New Minster at Winchester<sup>46</sup>; and in the story of William's confiscations for the part played by the abbot and his monks on Hastings field Andover is named among the escheated lands.<sup>47</sup> This story has been elsewhere disposed of,<sup>48</sup> and the fact that none of the three 'hams' bequeathed to the abbey by Edred belonged to it in the time of the Confessor throws doubt on the authenticity or the effectiveness of the will. Apart from this, all pre-Conquest references to Andover tend to show that it was always in royal hands. Edgar, who came to the throne in 959, held a Witenagemot there at which, seeking to avert the plague, he enjoined a greater piety and more careful payment of tithes and church shot.<sup>49</sup> It was the 'royal vill' of Andover whereat in 994 Ethelred concluded that treaty with Olaf Tryggvason which put a period to the harrying of England by the Norseman.<sup>50</sup> In 1086 the Conqueror held Andover in demesne, as had the Confessor before him.<sup>51</sup> Of the history of the town during the next century nothing has survived beyond that it was burnt in 1141, when Maud the Queen was besieging Maud the Empress in Winchester.<sup>52</sup> What damage was done is unknown, but it may have been in acknowledgement of the renewed vigour of the town that Henry II granted the men of Andover a gild merchant with freedom from toll, passage and custom, as the burgesses of Winchester who were of a gild merchant were free.<sup>53</sup> The date of this charter is approximately fixed by an entry in the Pipe Roll of 1175-6, which states that the men of Andover paid 10 marks for having the same liberty in their gild as the men of 'Wilton' and Salisbury had in theirs.<sup>54</sup> To the 'Aid' of the following year Andover, like Portchester, contributed 10 marks as against the £7 of Basingstoke.<sup>55</sup>

The granting of charters was to the impecunious John a ready source of revenue, and so in 1201 he is found, for 20 marks and a palfrey,<sup>56</sup> confirming to the burgesses of Andover their vill at the ancient farm and £15 of increment.<sup>57</sup> At the beginning of May 1205 the king confirmed his father's charter of gild merchant,<sup>58</sup> and the end of the same month saw another charter couched in the terms of that of 1201, except that the burgesses were to pay £10 more yearly, and that they were to have in return a fair, to commence on the vigil of St. Leonard (5 November) and to last four days. From this charter it appears that the ancient farm was £80 'blanch.'<sup>59</sup> It was, however, cancelled, because broken, but in 1213 came a further grant of the manor and out-hundred.<sup>60</sup> The increment was given as £20, at which with slight variations it remained.

In 1215 John gave the manor of Andover to his half-brother, William de Longespée Earl of Salisbury,<sup>61</sup> to whom Henry III confirmed it on his accession.<sup>50</sup> The exact status of the earl as regards the townsmen is doubtful, but he received the fee-farm rent of £90,<sup>51</sup> and was able to disseise a certain John de Bosco of his free tenement—an act of severity of which he subsequently repented.<sup>52</sup> Salisbury died early in 1226,<sup>53</sup> and Henry immediately regranted the men of Andover their vill at fee-farm during his pleasure, and ordered Hugh de Nevill to give them seisin of the pasture belonging to the town as they had had it in the time of King John, before the war.<sup>54</sup> In 1228 the king formally confirmed both the charter of Henry II and the charter of 1213.<sup>55</sup>

A charter of 1256 gave the good men privileges in respect of debt, forfeiture, inheritance and the hambling of dogs, and imposed a penalty of £10 on any who should hinder them in their liberties, and another charter of the same date granted them the return of all writs touching the vill and hundred.<sup>56</sup> All the previous charters were inspected and confirmed by Henry VI in 1446,<sup>57</sup> Edward IV in 1466,<sup>58</sup> Henry VIII in 1510,<sup>59</sup> Edward VI in 1548,<sup>60</sup> Philip and Mary in 1555,<sup>61</sup> and Elizabeth in 1588.<sup>62</sup>

The fee-farm rent of the manor, town and hundred of Andover, due to the king as overlord, was continually granted out. Various queens held it in dower. Such an assignment was made to Eleanor of Provence in 1236.<sup>63</sup> In the following year, however, the farm was given to Hubert Hussey for life, unless and until the king should provide him fifty pounds worth of land elsewhere.<sup>64</sup> In 1278 Henry de Glastonia quit-claimed to Edward I £20 a year granted him by Henry III out of the farm of Andover, due compensation having been made.<sup>65</sup> In 1281 the town was reassigned to Queen Eleanor,<sup>66</sup> and five years later her dower was assured to her in the event of her entering a religious order.<sup>67</sup> She died a nun of Amesbury in 1291. In 1299, on her marriage with Edward I, Andover was assigned in dower to Margaret of France,<sup>68</sup> and was confirmed to her by Edward II both as Prince of Wales and after his accession.<sup>69</sup> Margaret was holding Andover in 1316,<sup>70</sup> but died in 1318, and in the following year the rents since her death were given to Queen Isabel.<sup>71</sup> In November 1319 the farm and increment, then amounting in all to £104 1s., were granted to Edmund of Woodstock, the king's brother, afterwards Earl of Kent,<sup>72</sup> who died seised in 1330.<sup>73</sup> Maurice de Berkeley then received a life grant for his better maintenance in the king's service and in consideration of his agreement to stay always with the king with fourteen men at arms at the king's charge in time of war.<sup>74</sup> Something must very shortly have terminated this arrangement, for later in the same year the farm was granted for good service to Oliver de Ingham,<sup>75</sup> while in December it was restored to Margaret, the earl's widow.<sup>76</sup> In 1338 the countess, in satisfaction of the earl's debts, leased it to Raymond Seguin for three years at a rent of £24 11s. 8d. for the whole period.<sup>77</sup> In 1341 the farm was in arrears, the bailiffs urging as pretext of non-payment a royal ordinance that all money of farms and issues was to be brought to the receipt of the exchequer.<sup>78</sup> Margaret's petition, however, obtained a mandate for payment. John Plantagenet third Earl of Kent, younger son of Edmund of Woodstock, died seised of the farm of Andover in 1352,<sup>79</sup> and his widow Elizabeth died holding in dower in 1411.<sup>80</sup> Her heirs were the five daughters of Thomas (de Holand), second Earl of Kent of that house, son of Joan, the Fair Maid of Kent, sister and heiress of John, Elizabeth's late husband. These were (1) Eleanor Countess of March, represented by her son Edmund Mortimer last Earl of March; (2) Joan Duchess of York, who died in 1434 with no surviving issue,<sup>81</sup> her heirs being the heirs of her sisters; (3) Margaret wife of John Beaufort first Earl of Somerset; (4) Eleanor wife of Thomas de Montagu fourth Earl of Salisbury; (5) Elizabeth wife of Sir John de Nevill and mother of Ralph second Earl of Westmorland.

Eleanor Countess of March was represented after the death of her son<sup>82</sup> by her daughter Anne Countess of Cambridge, grandmother of Edward IV,<sup>83</sup> and by her two daughters by her second husband, Edward Cherleton, Lord Cherleton of Powis, viz. Joan, who married John Grey Lord Grey of Powis and Earl of Tankerville, and Joyce wife of Sir John Tiptoft and mother of John Tiptoft Earl of Worcester. Salisbury and mother of the Kingmaker, whose granddaughter and eventual heir Margaret Countess of Salisbury, with her son Henry Pole Lord Montagu,<sup>85</sup> sold her portion of the fee-farm rent of Andover to William Paulet, afterwards Marquess of Winchester, in 1538.<sup>86</sup> From the portion that came to the Crown dower was assigned in 1495 to Elizabeth queen of Henry VII,<sup>87</sup> in 1509 to Catherine of Aragon<sup>88</sup> and in 1540 to Anne of Cleves.<sup>89</sup> In 1549 Edward VI granted to Henry Nevill fifth Earl of Westmorland, descendant of Sir John de Nevill and Elizabeth, Thomas de Holand's fifth daughter,<sup>90</sup> the reversion of the manor and hundred of Andover,<sup>91</sup> which the earl in the same year granted to William Paulet.<sup>92</sup> The future Marquess of Winchester thus became possessed of the portions that had belonged to the Crown, Salisbury and Westmorland. These have remained to his descendants and are now paid to Lord Bolton.<sup>93</sup> This leaves only the parts held by the two daughters of Lord Cherleton and the elder Eleanor de Holand. That held by John Grey Earl of Tankerville and his wife Joan was carried by Anne Ludlow, their great-granddaughter, to Thomas Vernon of Stokesay.<sup>94</sup> Henry Vernon, grandson of this match, died in 1606 seised of £12 10s. rent issuing from Andover, which passed to his cousin and heir, John Curzon of Kedleston, son and heir of Francis Curzon and Eleanor Vernon daughter of came to an end in 1485 on the death of Edward third and last Earl of Worcester, whose barony fell into abeyance among his aunts. The fee-farm rent of Andover passed to Philippa Tiptoft, wife of Thomas Lord Ros, and with their daughter Eleanor to the family of Manners. In 1525 Thomas Manners Earl of Rutland gave quittance for £6 for one year.<sup>97</sup> In 1894 the holder, with Lords Bolton and Scarsdale, was Mr. Duncan,<sup>98</sup> who bought his share from a Mr. Reeves in 1887 or 1888.<sup>99</sup> It is now paid to Mrs. Duncan. This annual payment must have been a heavy burden on the men of Andover, and in spite of some commercial activity their town seems often to have been in financial straits. In 1227<sup>100</sup> and again in 1234<sup>101</sup> the king remitted a substantial proportion of the tollage as originally assessed, and the burgesses were in arrears with their fee-farm rent.<sup>102</sup> The desire for better conditions must have lured the bailiffs into an excess of zeal, for in 1234 the king sent them a mandate on behalf of the local clergy, for whose buyings and sellings in the town toll and custom had been exacted as though they were merchants plying for gain.<sup>103</sup> Two centuries later either poverty or privilege made Andover almost free of the burden of tenths and fifteenths which other towns had to contribute towards the expenses of the French war. In 1435<sup>104</sup> and 1437<sup>105</sup> the borough was wholly exempt, while in 1439<sup>106</sup> and 1444<sup>107</sup> it was only expected to contribute half the normal sum. This indulgence may have been due to the burning of the town about this time, for it was on that account that Lord Tankerville remitted his share of the fee-farm rent with all arrears, and allowed a deduction of 100s. for twenty years.<sup>108</sup>

The gild merchant was granted, as already stated,

by Henry II,<sup>109</sup> and the gild rolls, of which Andover has a particularly rich collection, date from 1262.<sup>110</sup> They throw much interesting light on the early government of the town. The fraternity at Andover was divided into the upper and the lower houses, and there were two classes of brethren, those who had the freegild and those who had the villein or hansegild. The highest in rank were the 'forwardmen,' a term apparently peculiar to Andover,<sup>111</sup> while the 'customarii' had but restricted rights. There were certain dues known as 'scot-pennies,' 'hanse-pennies,' and 'sige-pennies.' The chief business at first transacted at the meetings—known as maneloquium or 'morrow-speech'—was the admission of new members. The gildship could be transferred, with the permission of the brethren and on payment by the recipient, and it was heritable, except when specifically granted only for life. In 1296 it was ordained that no one should sell or give away his gild except to a relative within the third degree. Those thus admitted were to pay half a mark to the gild, except in the case of father to son, when the payment was to be 2s.<sup>112</sup> The usual admission sum was 60s. 'For very serious offences the gildsmen of Andover fulminated a decree of excommunication against the erring brother, commanding that no one receive him, nor buy and sell with him, nor give him fire or water, nor hold communication with him, under penalty of the loss of one's freedom.'<sup>113</sup> Such a decree was passed in 1327 on one Robert le Kyllere, who had endeavoured to sow discord by alleging that fifty-five members of the community were intending to rob and destroy certain magnates.<sup>114</sup>

Besides admissions and amercements, a good many entries refer to trade regulations. In 1279, for instance, the butchers were accused of dividing their carcasses among different stalls, a practice deplored by the 'good men,' and they were ordered, whether several of them bought several animals or one animal, to sell at one stall only, under a penalty of 12d. At the same time the fishermen were forbidden, under a like penalty, to take any partner but a fellow-townsmen.<sup>115</sup> At a 'morrow-speech' held on the vigil of the Annunciation, 1301, it was ordered that all bushels and gallons of wine and ale should be sealed with the king's seal in Easter week at latest, on pain of heavy amercement.<sup>116</sup>

Another function of the 'morrow-speech' was the election of bailiffs. In 1329 an election took place on the Friday after St. Matthew (21 September),<sup>117</sup> but later, in the reigns of Henry VI, Edward IV and Henry VII, the Sunday before Michaelmas was the usual day.<sup>118</sup>

Side by side with the morrow-speech, and quite distinct from it, was the court held every Monday at

Andover, dealing in alternate weeks with the affairs of the in-hundred and the out-hundred. The gild is never referred to in the rolls of this court, and the bailiff is the only officer mentioned. The entries refer for the most part to pleas concerning debt, land, transgressions, bloodshed, trespass, battery, theft, breaking the assize, carrying off the toll (pro tollonio asportato), raising hue and cry, &c.<sup>119</sup>

In the reign of Edward IV admissions to the gild grew rarer<sup>120</sup> and in the 16th century almost wholly disappear.<sup>121</sup> Thus on a gild roll of 1415 there is the following significant entry:—'It was ordained at the said morrow-speech with the consent of the whole community of the same vill that the twenty-four shall be elected there, and shall have the government of the said vill with the supervision of the stewards and bailiffs for the time being.'<sup>122</sup> The gild was merging in the borough,<sup>123</sup> and in the business of the morrow-speech the regulation of trade was gradually giving way to the supervision of corporation property.<sup>124</sup> The town was thus at this period under the control of the stewards,<sup>125</sup> bailiffs and chamberlains, and the twenty-four forwardmen or aldermen sometimes styled the twenty-four, the twenty-four good men or the twenty-four of the corporation. It is possible<sup>126</sup> that in the 15th and 16th centuries, as often later, more than one office was held by the same man, and that, for instance, the bailiffs were sometimes the chamberlains also. After the middle of the reign of Henry VIII the good men, no longer called 'forwardmen,' were reduced from twenty-four to thirteen or eighteen, and later in the century were sometimes no more than five.<sup>127</sup> Two constables now appear among the officers elected, but there was only one steward at this time.

A case tried in the Court of Requests throws interesting light on the constitution of the town not long before the great charter of 1599. It is undated, but appears to be of the reign of Henry VIII. William Redyng complained that whereas the chamberlains and twenty-four aldermen of Andover had granted one John Hakker, junior, clerk, a barn and a close next the town 'pynfold,' to hold to him and his heirs and assigns at a yearly rent of 3s. 4d., Hakker had left the premises by will to the plaintiff, but the chamberlains and aldermen would not suffer him to enter. The town of Andover was 'an auncient borough and all landes there devisible by will.' The defendants replied that they had been seised of the premises as parcel of the manor of Andover, and that Richard Harold, fuller, to whom they had descended as Hakker's cousin and heir, had released his right to the grantors, 'w<sup>out</sup> that the seyd towne of Andever ys a borowe towne.'<sup>128</sup> The issue of this suit is unknown, but it was doubtless such controversies as these twenty-four forwardmen that the tenement called St. John's House with all the lands thereunto belonging shall be taken as part of the chamber-lands of Andover, and the chamberlains of the said town shall receive the rents of the same and give account thereof' (Gross, op. cit. ii, 345; Wilt. Arch. and Nat. Hist. Mag. xxi, 304-5). The defendants in the suit in the Court of Requests mentioned below were styled 'the Chamberlains and Aldermen of Andover.'

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

that, at the end of the 16th century, made some revision of their organization seem desirable to the burgesses of Andover.

With the waning of the influence of the gild and the general progress of civic life the old charters had lost their significance and, of necessity, become fruitless of dissension. So appeal was made to Elizabeth, and she, considering that Andover was an ancient and populous town and on the thoroughfare to the west, moved too by the humble petition of Robert Earl of Essex, granted an entirely fresh charter in 1599, making the townsmen 'a certain and undoubted corporate body politic.'<sup>129</sup> This became the governing charter of the town, and the rules it laid down were still adhered to almost to the letter when the commissioners visited Andover in 1835.<sup>130</sup>

The Corporation of Andover, then, duly empowered to possess a common seal, consisted of a bailiff, a steward, a coroner, an escheator, a clerk of the market, four justices, two chamberlains,<sup>131</sup> two constables and two sergeants-at-mace, with ten 'good men' to assist the bailiff and twelve chief burgesses. The steward had a deputy, the town clerk, whom he elected subject to the approval of his fellows. There was also a high steward, an entirely honorary official, however, and always a person of rank. Thus in 1599 the Earl of Essex became the first high steward. This seems a goodly list of governors for a town of no great dimensions, but it must be remembered that one man could hold more than one office. The bailiff, who was elected on Monday before Holy Cross Day and took up his duties at Michaelmas, while he might also occasionally be the chamberlain, was always by an unwritten law both coroner and escheator, until the latter office, in due course, fell into abeyance. He and the steward were also ex officio justices, the other two usually being the outgoing and prospective bailiffs. Moreover, in later times, the ranks of the good men and capital burgesses were not invariably kept filled. Hence, in fact, the Common Council consisted only of the bailiff, the steward or his deputy, and as many of the good men as had been chosen.

The election of the bailiff was in the hands of the bailiff, steward, a majority of good men and a majority of capital burgesses. The wording of the charter is, however, ambiguous, and for many years it was considered that with the bailiff and steward any eleven others, that is to say, half of the whole chartered number of good men and capital burgesses, formed a legal assembly. In 1830 this method of procedure was called into question and a mandamus was obtained by which it was established that a majority of each body should take part in all elections.<sup>132</sup> The good men were elected from among the capital burgesses, and these from the inhabitants of the borough. There were no other burgesses, and the charter of 1599 specifies no way in which the freedom might be obtained.

Among the privileges granted by Queen Elizabeth, besides the courts and fairs to be dealt with later, may be mentioned the borough gaol, of which the bailiff was warden, goods and chattels of fugitives, felons and outlaws, return of writs, exemption from suit to county or hundred of the sheriff, assize of bread, ale and other victuals and fines for false weights and measures.

Just as, a little later, the morrow-speech gave way to the Common Council,<sup>133</sup> so, by the charter of 1599, the old hundred court was superseded by a court of record, held every Monday in the gild hall before the bailiff or his deputy. By 1835 this had fallen into total disuse, no action having been entered since 1812. The ceremony of opening and adjourning the court was still, however, performed from time to time.<sup>134</sup>

Elizabeth also granted a yearly view of frankpledge with court leet and law days for the inhabitants of the borough, town and hundred. The leet was held at Easter and Michaelmas. At Easter there were two separate courts, one at Andover for the in-hundred, the other at Weyhill for the out-hundred. At Michaelmas one court held at Andover was deemed sufficient.<sup>135</sup>

In August 1682 the men of Andover surrendered their charter, receiving a new one in the following month.<sup>136</sup> The reason for this was scarcely a laudable one. By the charter of 1599 they had five fairs, commencing (1) the day before Michaelmas at Weyhill, (2) the eve of St. Leonard (5 November),<sup>137</sup> (3) Thursday in the third week in Lent, (4) the eve of St. Philip and St. James (1 May),<sup>138</sup> (5) 29 August, each to last three English working days, with court of pie-powder, tolls, pickage and stallage. The first of these fairs was none other than the celebrated Weyhill Fair, from which the lord of the manor of Weyhill and others drew substantial profits. On these the good burgesses cast a covetous eye and by the new charter obtained permission to move the fair into their own grounds. This they promptly did, and the stalls were set up at Cholderton.<sup>139</sup> The long and wearisome litigation which was the inevitable consequence of this action is sufficiently described under Weyhill (q.v.). Andover lost the day, and the charter of Charles II never superseded that of Elizabeth as the town's governing charter. In 1792 fairs were kept up on Mid-Lent Saturday, 12 May and 16 November<sup>140</sup>; in 1888, as now, there were only two: on the last Friday in June for wool and 17 November for sheep.<sup>141</sup>

Elizabeth's charter further provided for a weekly market on Saturdays; that of Charles provided for <sup>131</sup> These are not mentioned in the charter. They are, however, found before this grant, and early in the 17th century afterwards. The Commissioners on Municipal Corporations were of opinion that the charity chamberlain was first elected in 1622. They were uncertain as to the date of the first appearance of the town chamberlain. Chamberlains are, however, mentioned on the gild roll of 1481 (vide supra).

another, for cattle, to be held every other Wednesday.

About the date of the charter of Elizabeth the gild was replaced by three companies—Leathermen, Haberdashers and Drapers<sup>142</sup>—to one of which every other trade was affiliated. In 1625 the Common Council agreed 'that the style and orders made for the government of the thre Companies of the Towne shalbe perused and made accordinge to our nowe Charter, whereby the penalties, fynes and amerciaments therein set may be levied for the better order and government of the said companies.'<sup>143</sup> The last entry in the Haberdashers' Book is dated 17 March 1807, and it shows the old order again changing. Persons have lately set up their trade in the town and have 'contemptuously neglected and refused' to become free of the company.<sup>144</sup> Counsel's opinion is to be taken. This may be considered the 'death gasp' of the companies. The commissioners of 1835 reported that the gilds had been extinct for at least forty years.<sup>145</sup>

In the year following the commission an alteration was made in the constitution of Andover, the first mayor, Mr. Robert Dowling, being elected in 1836.<sup>146</sup> The modern corporation consists of a mayor, a recorder, four aldermen, twelve councillors and the usual officers.

Cloth-making was the principal industry of Andover. In 1273 licence was granted to five Andover merchants to export 124 sacks of wool.<sup>147</sup> Centuries later the Royalist garrison of Winchester managed to take £10,000 worth of cloth from the neighbouring town, and Colonel Massie had strict injunctions from the Committee of Both Kingdoms to see that it was not sent abroad by way of Bristol.<sup>148</sup> A wool fair is still held here in June.

There was an iron market at Andover in the 14th century,<sup>149</sup> and when, in 1471, the quire and bell furniture in the church needed restoring ironmongers were at hand to do the work.<sup>150</sup> Tanning also was a local industry,<sup>151</sup> and the town appears to have supplied parchment to the royal chancery at an early date.<sup>152</sup>

There are deeds in the town chest in connexion with lime burning, which seems to have been an industry of some extent.<sup>153</sup> The tradesmen of Andover issued tokens, and they were also issued by Andover in its corporate capacity. Boyne, in his list of Andover tokens, describes three which were issued for the payment of the poor. The one dated 1658, and having the legend 'Remember the poor,' with the figure of a cripple, is very rare.<sup>154</sup>

In 1295, and from 1302 to 1307, Andover returned two burgesses to Parliament.<sup>155</sup> In 1298, 1299, 1300, 1309 and 1311, however, writs were received, but no returns made, and from the last date the privilege remained unused until 1586. Thence onward two members were regularly sent up until 1867, when by schedule A of the Representation of the People Act the number was reduced to one.<sup>156</sup> In 1885 Andover ceased to exist as a parliamentary borough, but now gives its name to the western division of the county.<sup>157</sup>

In 1689 it was resolved in committee, and agreed to by the House, that the right of electing lay with the bailiff and a select number, and not with the general populace.<sup>158</sup> This decision was confirmed in 1703.<sup>159</sup> In 1700 a charge of bribery was brought against Samuel Sheppard, member for Newport (Hants). As a result Julius Samborn, bailiff of Andover, and others, were taken into custody, brought to the bar of the House, reprimanded and discharged.<sup>160</sup>

The manor of ANDOVER, which is MANORS co-extensive with the parish, has no history separate from that of the borough. Except during the few years in which it was in the hands of William Longespée it was always held by the burgesses, the bailiff being ex officio lord of the manor<sup>161</sup> and the town clerk steward. The king is lord paramount.

At Domesday there were six mills in Andover worth 72s. 6d.,<sup>162</sup> one of which was the object of a fine in 1202.<sup>163</sup> In 1539 William Williams of Salisbury died seised of a water-mill which he held of the bailiffs of the town,<sup>164</sup> while a mill was the cause of a suit in the Court of Requests between Richard Gilbert and John Ashton.<sup>165</sup> The latter was possibly the mill belonging to Cricklade Manor, held by the Gilberts about this date. The Cricklade mill, Mayes Mill and the mill in 'Ayliffes' were certainly among those mentioned in Domesday Book. Sir John Philpot, the recusant, had a mill in Andover, which was granted with other of his property to Sir Thomas Stukeley in 1627.<sup>166</sup> Rooksborough Mill belonged to Michael Cooke, who died in 1619.<sup>167</sup> Twenty years later William Sotwell of Seymour's Farm died seised of it.<sup>168</sup> It still stands to the south of the town. There are two other mills now in existence.

In the time of the Confessor FOXCOTT (Fulescote, xi cent.; Wexkot, xiii cent.; Fosscote, xiv cent.) was held as two manors. It paid geld for 3 hides both then and in 1086, when the whole was held by Ralf under Waleran the Huntsman.<sup>169</sup> The overlordship descended to the heirs of Waleran, William Fitz Waleran confirming a charter of the mesne lord in the reign of William I or William II.<sup>170</sup> At the beginning of the 13th century it belonged to Joan de Nevill,<sup>171</sup> daughter and heir of Sir William de Nevill, and Isabel Waleran, daughter and co-heir of Walter Waleran, the great-great-grandson of Waleran the Huntsman.<sup>172</sup> From her it passed to her son, William de St. Martin, who was overlord in 1280.<sup>173</sup> The place gave its name to the early lords of the manor, being held by Edward de Foxcott at the end of the 11th century,<sup>174</sup> and by Herbert de Foxcott in 1167.<sup>175</sup> In the reign of Richard I Edulf and Walter de Foxcott, Adam the younger and Adam the elder and . . . (sic) de Foxcott and Geoffrey, son of Ralf, Miles de Foxcott and Robert de Foxcott were impleaded for building a wall on the common pasture of Foxcott since the king's first coronation to the damage of the free tenement of Michael son of Luke in 'Clepton.' The wall was ordered to be taken down and all the builders were amerced.<sup>176</sup> In the Testa de Nevill Henry de Foxcott is entered as holding half a fee in Foxcott of the old enfeoffment of Joan de Nevill,<sup>177</sup> and in 1280 this same Henry or his son was summoned to show why he took the ameracements of the assize of bread and ale in Foxcott which belonged to the king. Answering through his attorney he disclaimed the assize of bread, but said that he and his ancestors had had that of ale since the days of King Richard. Asked if he had a tumbrel for the effective observance of this liberty,<sup>178</sup> he replied in the negative, and the prosecutor sought judgement for the king on that account.<sup>179</sup> In the Nomina Villarum of 1316 the vill is assigned to Thomas de Foxcott,<sup>180</sup> and at the Aid of 1346 Henry de Foxcott and John de Wynton held the quarter fee in Foxcott which had belonged to Thomas.<sup>181</sup> The share of John de Wynton is to be accounted for by the fact that Thomas de Foxcott and his wife Margaret had in 1324 granted land in Foxcott to Henry de Harnhill,<sup>182</sup> who in 1342 granted it in remainder to John de Wynton and his wife Joan.<sup>183</sup> This tenement afterwards passed with the manor of Penton Mewsey to the Stonors.<sup>184</sup> In 1405 Thomas de Foxcott granted the reversion of the manor, which Nicholas Bray and Alice<sup>185</sup> his wife were holding for the life of Alice, to William Stokes and his heirs.<sup>186</sup> Two years later William Stokes regranted this reversion to Thomas and the heirs of his body with remainder to John son of William and the heirs of his body, with remainder in default to the right heirs of Thomas.<sup>187</sup> Thomas de Foxcott, who was the son of Robert de Foxcott, married Philippa daughter and heir of William Stokes,<sup>188</sup> who, although he cannot well have been the William just mentioned, was probably closely related. Whatever the precise import of the second of the above fines, William Stokes died seised of the manor in 1427,<sup>189</sup> his son John being named as his heir. Nevertheless, in 1428 William Dyneley, who had married Margaret daughter and heir of Thomas de Foxcott,<sup>190</sup> was found to hold Henry de Foxcott's quarter fee.<sup>191</sup> Peter Carvanell, who died in 1500, had a life interest in the manor by reason of his marriage with Sanchea widow of Edward Dyneley grandson of William.<sup>192</sup> After his death it reverted to Thomas Dyneley, Edward's son and heir, who died seised of the manor in 1502, holding of the king in chief by fealty.<sup>193</sup> He left an infant daughter and heir Elizabeth Dyneley, subsequently the wife of George Barrett of Aveley (co. Essex), who had livery of this and other lands in 1517.<sup>194</sup> Edward son of George Barrett died seised of the manor in 1586,<sup>195</sup> his heir being his infant grandson Edward Barrett, created Lord Barrett of Newburgh (co. Fife) in 1627.<sup>196</sup> The history of Foxcott Manor during the 17th century is obscure. Lord Barrett died without issue in 1645, leaving his Hampshire lands, after payment of debts and legacies, to his half-brother Sir Richard Leveson, and his heirs, with remainder to Richard Lennard (ancestor of the Barrett-Lennards Lords Dacre), who was to inherit the bulk of his estates.<sup>197</sup> In 1652 Henry Mitton, Frances his wife, and John Mitton quitclaimed the manor to Edmond Arnold.<sup>198</sup> By 1686 it had come to the possession of Joseph Hinxman,<sup>199</sup> sometime M.P. for Christchurch, with whose heirs it has continued.<sup>200</sup> It is now in the hands of the trustees of the late Rev. John Henry Gale, son of Thomas Hinxman Gale.

There is mention of another manor of the same name as the preceding in a fine of 1352, whereby John le Crepe and Margaret his wife granted their manor of FOXCOTT to Ralph de Clatford, Alice his wife and Roger their son.<sup>201</sup> It may perhaps be identified with the lands and tenements in Knight's Hatherden which were leased for life by Ralph and Alice to John atte Grove, Joan his wife and Adam their son in 1355, for in the lease these lands are said to have descended to Alice on the death of John le Crepe and Margaret his wife.<sup>202</sup> Nothing further has been learnt concerning the history of this estate.

The vill of HATHERDEN was in the possession of Thomas de Foxcott in 1316,<sup>203</sup> and in 1324 Thomas de Foxcott and Margaret his wife granted land in Hatherden to Henry de Harnhill (vide supra).<sup>204</sup> When their descendant Thomas de Foxcott in 1405 relinquished the manor of Foxcott to William

Stokes, he also gave up his claim to a messuage, a carucate of land and 8 acres of wood with appurtenances in Hatherden.<sup>205</sup> This estate, which followed the same descent as Foxcott (q.v. supra), is called a manor in the inquisition taken on the death of Edward Barrett of Aveley in 1586.<sup>206</sup>

In 1293 Nicholas Durdent died seised of other land in HATHERDEN (or KING'S HATHERDEN) belonging to the fee-farm of Andover, in which Agnes Durdent had dower.<sup>207</sup> He left a son and heir John, but nothing more has been traced as to this holding until 1502, when Robert Johnson and Joan Durdent, calling to warrant Thomas Fish, conveyed the manor of Hatherden to Edmund Dudley, Andrew Windsor and John Caryll.<sup>208</sup> In 1568 Ralph Cawley alias Calley sold it to Edward Thurman,<sup>209</sup> who in 1574 sold it to Robert Noyes.<sup>210</sup> Robert Noyes dealt with the manor by fine in 1604<sup>211</sup> and 1628,<sup>212</sup> and another of the same name conveyed it in 1655 to John Mundy.<sup>213</sup>

The WOODHOUSE from an early date pertained to the bailiwick of Finkley Forest held with that of Chute, of which it was the eastern walk, and was held by Avice de Columbers at her death in 1258,<sup>214</sup> no doubt as heir of her father Ellis Croc.<sup>215</sup> Her son and heir Matthew de Columbers gave the bailiwick of the forest of Chute to John de Lisle and his wife Nichola daughter of Michael brother of Matthew.<sup>216</sup> With this grant doubtless went Woodhouse, of which John de Lisle died seised in 1304,<sup>217</sup> holding, it was stated, of Clarice de Sackville. His son John died seised in 1331,<sup>218</sup> and in 1340 Edmund de la Beche, king's clerk, was pardoned for acquiring a life interest in the messuage called the Woodhouse and the bailiwick of the forestership of Chute Forest from Bartholomew de Lisle, son of the last-mentioned John.<sup>219</sup> Five years later Bartholomew died seised,<sup>220</sup> leaving an infant son John, and in the same year the escheator, who had taken the premises into the king's hands, was ordered to intermeddle no further, since Elizabeth the widow had done fealty for the same.<sup>221</sup> About 1370 Sir John de Lisle died abroad,<sup>222</sup> leaving a son and heir John, who was seised in a messuage and 30 acres called Woodhouse and died in 1407<sup>223</sup> holding by the service of keeping Chute Forest. About this time the Lisles acquired the manor of Thruxton (q.v.), with the descent of which that of Woodhouse is henceforth identical. It is first spoken of as a manor in the reign of Henry VIII,<sup>224</sup> and the last mention of it as such is in 1684, when George Philpot and Mary Philpot dealt with it by fine.<sup>225</sup>

In 1591 a deponent in a suit as to the right to the office of forester of Chute Forest said that the house called Woodhouse was down before he came into the county.<sup>226</sup>

CHARLTON MANOR is first mentioned at the end of the 15th century,<sup>227</sup> when it was in the hands of the lords of Foxcott (q.v.), with whom it continued throughout the following century, eventually no doubt becoming completely merged in the Foxcott estate.<sup>228</sup>

In 1537 George Gilbert and John Gilbert his son and heir sold the so-called manor of CRICKLADE (Cryklade, xvi cent.) to Thomas White,<sup>229</sup> who dealt with it by fine in 1580<sup>230</sup> and died seised in 1590, having also the royalty of all the waters in Andover and Charlton.<sup>231</sup> In 1602 his son Thomas White the younger sold the manor to Arthur Swayne,<sup>232</sup> and in 1615 Edward Swayne sold it to Richard Blake,<sup>233</sup> who died some eight or nine years later, leaving a son and heir William.<sup>234</sup> On the death of Peter Blake of Andover about 1693 the manor passed to his sister Sarah wife of Edmond Lambert of Boyton (co. Wilts.).<sup>235</sup> The Lamberts held during the 18th century,<sup>236</sup> and perhaps joined the estate to their neighbouring manor of Abbots Ann (q.v.). To-day the name of Cricklade has entirely disappeared from the map.

A water-mill always went with the manor of Cricklade.<sup>237</sup>

The Sandys family, who at the beginning of the 15th century acquired much land in this part of Hampshire, held a manor in Andover, sometimes called SANDYS MANOR. This is first mentioned in the inquisition on Sir Walter Sandys' property in 1435.<sup>238</sup> It is not called a manor after the deaths of his son Thomas<sup>239</sup> and Sybil his wife,<sup>240</sup> but they held much land in the parish, and their son Sir William Sandys died in 1496 holding Sandys manor of the free men of Andover.<sup>241</sup> Thenceforth it remained in

Soc. passim). He was succeeded by his son Ellis Croc, who was returned in the Testa de Nevill as holding 1 virgate of land in Andover by serjeanty (Testa de Nevill [Rec. Com.], 235b). During the reign of Hen. III there were frequent mandates to Michael de Columbers, husband of Avice, to give the same family until the middle of the 17th century, when much of their property was dispersed.<sup>242</sup> In 1649 William Lord Sandys and Mary his wife conveyed the manor of Andover to John Fielding.<sup>243</sup> Its later history has not been traced.

The estate known as AYLIFFE'S MANOR was apparently acquired by the Sandys family about the same date as the foregoing.<sup>244</sup> It is last mentioned in 1496, as being held of the freemen of Andover.<sup>245</sup> No doubt both this and the Mottisfont Priory property in Andover granted to William Lord Sandys, the chamberlain, in 1536,<sup>246</sup> were afterwards considered parcel of the manor last described. A water-mill belonged to this manor.

In 1509 John Seymour died seised of a messuage in Andover, leaving as his co-heirs four sisters, Agnes wife of Richard Forde, Isabel wife of George Berenger, Margery wife of Thomas Sotwell and Joan Seymour.<sup>247</sup> This was probably the so-called manor of SEYMOUR'S PLACE which John Bennet and Edith his wife conveyed to Thomas Cordrey and William Sotwell in 1546.<sup>248</sup> It seems to have remained with the Sotwells for nearly a century, and at William Sotwell's death in 1639 was known as Seymour's Farm alias Sotwell's Farm.<sup>249</sup> It eventually came to John Pollen, who in 1702 gave it as endowment to an almshouse which he founded in Dog Pole Street.<sup>250</sup>

MAYES MANOR or the manor of KING'S ENHAM originated in the lands in the Enhams and Charlton, which were held in early days by the families of Wilekin, Ingulf, le Poer, May and Goode, and in the 15th century became concentrated in the hands of Robert May.<sup>251</sup> In 1443 May granted all his property in King's Enham, Knight's Enham, Charlton, Hide, Woodhouse and Andover to feoffees, who reconveyed it to him and his wife Felicia, with reversion to themselves on the death of Robert and Felicia without issue.<sup>252</sup> In 1452 the feoffees conveyed their reversionary interest, Felicia May having died in the meantime, to John Audley, eldest son of James Lord Audley, who three years later conveyed it to William Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester, and others.<sup>253</sup> It was discovered, however, in 1460 on the confession of Robert May that Thomas Whiteway was the true heir by entail of all the premises after the deaths of Robert and Felicia.<sup>254</sup> May's conveyances must therefore have been of no effect. A memorandum dated 1473 shows that Thomas Whiteway's interest was then vested in Alice wife of Thomas Warren.<sup>255</sup> In 1477 Thomas Warren and Alice conveyed Mayes Manor to Bishop Waynflete,<sup>256</sup> and he in 1481 granted it to the president and scholars of Magdalen College, Oxford,<sup>257</sup> who still hold it, though the manorial lands have been reduced to about 20 acres in Charlton.<sup>258</sup>

There was a mill which went with the manor.

In the conveyance of Hampshire lands by William

Lord Sandys to John Fielding in 1649 a manor of King's Enham was included.<sup>259</sup> This, however, seems merely to have been a courtesy title, although Sir William Sandys, who died in 1496, was found to have held the manor of King's Enham of the president and scholars of Queen's College, Oxford.<sup>260</sup>

The church of ST. MARY THE CHURCHES VIRGIN was built between 1840 and 1844 in place of an old church of which nothing now remains except a round-headed doorway in the tower with shafted jambs and zigzag in the arch, of late 12th-century date but much repaired.

A painting of the south view of the old church hanging in the clergy vestry shows that it had a central tower, a chancel and north chapel, and a nave lighted on the south by five windows, four of two lights of late 13th-century character to the east of the south porch and one of three lights to the west. The other windows seem to be of 16th-century date and the upper part of the tower looks late.

The present building consists of a nave and chancel with an apsidal east end in all about 102 ft. by 22 ft., north and south aisles 12 ft. 6 in. wide, and transepts 22 ft. deep by 18 ft. 6 in. wide; a south porch and a west tower of three stages 16 ft. square inside with vestries to the north and south of it. The details are modelled on Salisbury, and though rather lanky the general internal effect is very good. There are arcades of six bays a side, those opening to the transept being wider than the others; the clearstory is lighted by pairs of lancet windows, and the whole church is ceiled with quadripartite ribbed vaults in plaster. The aisle windows are pairs of tall lancets, and in the apse the windows are of three lights with geometrical tracery, and an inner plane of tracery carried on slender banded shafts. On the chord of the apse is a row of three arches on pairs of tall and slender shafts, and above in the gable a group of five lancets.

The church stands very well, with a fine flight of steps from its west door in the tower, and the other entrances are through the south porch and south transept. The exterior is not equal to the interior, the tower being very weak and drawn out, but the original is pretty faithfully copied in the elevations of the aisles, and the whole building in spite of the pooriness of its materials must be considered a very meritorious performance for the time. None of the fittings are old, but there are a good many mural monuments preserved from the old church. The best is that at the east end of the south aisle to Anne second wife of William West first Lord De la Warr. She, who was married first to Thomas Oliver, was daughter of Henry Swift of Andover and Elizabeth his wife, and married thirdly Richard Kemish of Andover. She survived her third husband, who died 6 October 1611.

On the monument is the seated figure of Richard Kemish dressed in a long furred gown, and with his hand resting on a skull on his knee, and to the left of him the kneeling figure of Lady De La Warr, and behind her are the kneeling figures of her two sons and four daughters. All the armory appears to have been repainted with the usual disastrous results. Shields above and below the monument display the arms of West. At the back are two shields, apparently for Kemish and Oliver, each impaling Swift, Party or and vert a chevron between three running harts with three pheons on the chevron all counter-coloured and a chief azure with three scallops or therein.

On the other side—at the east end of the south aisle—is another Renaissance monument to Richard Venables, 1621, and Dorothy his wife, 1612, with their kneeling effigies on either side of a desk. Above are the arms of Venable, Azure two bars argent with the difference of a martlet gules and painted on a corbel between the figures appear the same arms impaling Brooke of Whitchurch, Checky or and azure a bend gules with a lion passant or thereon. This monument was formerly placed above the west gallery in the tower.

By the side of this monument is a small brass with shield and inscription to Nicholas Venables, died 1602. On the south wall adjacent is a painted board on which is represented a classic monument; it is to Mr. Nicholas Venables 'gentleman and merchant of London,' died 1613. On it is the quaint rhyming epitaph: 'A hundred pound he gave ye poore—w<sup>ch</sup> as a stock should still remaine,—To buy them bread for evermore,—Theire hungrie bodies to sustaine.—His gift, our good, abides with us,—His soule wth God in heav'n hath place,—God gaunt (sic) you all may pittie us,—And follow him in the like race.'

In the south transept is a board set up by Edward Warham, gent., bailiff 1692, with the names of the benefactors of the town of 'Andever' and their 'guifts' from 1569 to 1690. Another board brings the list up to 1849.

There are eight bells by Lester & Pack, 1758, and a clock by Thwaites & Reed of London, 1846.

The plate consists of a silver-gilt chalice and paten cover of 1611, the gift of Richard Kemish in 1711, and another silver-gilt chalice and paten cover of 1632; a pair of chalices, a pair of patens, another paten, and a flagon, all of silver, and dated 1874.

The registers before 1812 are contained in fifteen books. The earlier ones are somewhat torn, but they have now been most carefully restored and bound by the British Museum.

The first book begins in 1587 and contains baptisms to 1636, marriages to 1633, and burials to 1634; the second, mixed entries, 1636 to 1642; the third, baptisms 1642 to 1684, marriages 1642 to 1686, burials 1642 to 1681; the fourth, burials 1678 to 1713; the fifth, baptisms 1685 to 1700; sixth, baptisms 1700 to 1713, marriages 1700 to 1714; seventh, baptisms, marriages and burials 1714 to 1746; eighth, baptisms 1746 to 1783, marriages to 1754 and burials to 1782; ninth, marriages 1754 to 1769; tenth, banns 1754 to 1760; eleventh, banns and marriages 1769 to 1781; twelfth, the same 1781 to 1812; thirteenth, baptisms and burials 1784 to 1798; fourteenth, baptisms 1798 to 1812; and fifteenth, burials for the same period.

At Foxcott, in this parish, was a modern chapel of ease (rebuilt c. 1830), but this has now been all pulled down, excepting the tower, which is retained as a mortuary chapel. The rest of the material has been re-used to build a small church at the more populous village of Charlton. The only old piece of stonework retained is a small 15th-century canopy head to a niche which belonged to the former building at Foxcott, and has been reset on the north side of the Charlton chapel.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, paten and flagon of 1839, 1852 and 1851 respectively.

CHRIST CHURCH, Hatherden, is of flint and stone in 13th-century style, consisting of apsidal chancel, nave and north and south porches, and turret with two bells.

CHRIST CHURCH, Smannell is a similar building of apsidal chancel, nave, north aisle, south porch and turret containing one bell.

The church of Andover, which ADFOWSONS is not mentioned in Domesday, was granted to the alien priory of Andover<sup>261</sup> by William I and remained in its gift, under the abbey of St. Florent, Saumur, until 1414,<sup>262</sup> the year of the dissolution of the alien priories, when the last prior was permitted to alienate his house to Winchester College.<sup>263</sup> Ever since that date the college has held the rectory and the advowson of the vicarage.<sup>264</sup>

In 1291 the church and chapel (presumably Foxcott, vide infra) were assessed at £73 6s. 8d. and the vicarage at £6 13s. 4d.<sup>265</sup> In 1535 the vicarage was worth £17 4s. 4d.<sup>266</sup>

There was a chantry called Our Lady Chantry founded in 1368 by Peter de Bridges.<sup>267</sup> In the 16th century it was valued at £12, of which £10 16s. was paid to the chantry priest.<sup>268</sup> On its abolition the people of Andover prayed to have assistance for ministration, saying that they had no other aid than the chantry priest.

There is also reference to a stipendiary priest in the certificates of Henry VIII and Edward VI. In the former it is stated he had no foundation, but was appointed by the bailiffs and corporation and was removable at their will and pleasure; in the latter that he was supported by the 'devotion of the inhabitants' and was to continue for ever. The appurtenant lands were valued at £3 13s. 4d.

At the same time a barn in Andover given by one Whood for the maintenance of a yearly obit, worth 10s., was forfeited for superstitious uses.<sup>269</sup> consideration of a debt, was granted to Francis Barker and Thomas Blackway and their heirs.<sup>270</sup>

Foxcott is a chapelry of Andover. At some date in the reign of William I or William II Edward de Foxcott granted the tithes of his demesne and 8*d.* from the villeins to St. Mary's, Andover, which belonged to the Abbey of St. Florent, Saumur, on condition that the church should find a priest to serve the chapel of Foxcott at various feasts and seasons. This grant appears in a charter of William I or William II, which was confirmed by Edward II.<sup>271</sup>

The living of Hatherden is a vicarage in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester. The living of Smannell is a vicarage annexed to the rectory of Knight's Enham, also in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester.<sup>272</sup>

There are in Andover a Baptist chapel, built in 1886, a Congregational chapel, built in 1700 and enlarged in 1879, and Wesleyan and Primitive Methodist chapels. At Charlton there are a mission hall and a Primitive Methodist chapel, and at Wildhern a Primitive Methodist chapel. There is also a Baptist chapel at Smannell.

The hospital of St. John the Baptist at Andover received a royal charter in 1247,<sup>273</sup> and in the same year the men of Andover granted 50*s.* yearly from the gild merchant for the maintenance of a chaplain.<sup>274</sup> In 1250 the brethren and sisters had licence to inclose a piece of land belonging to the king opposite their hospital, wherein the bodies of the deceased were buried at the time of the interdict, and to build a chapel thereon for the celebration of divine service for the souls of the faithful departed.<sup>275</sup> The burgesses usually appointed the chaplain,<sup>276</sup> but on several occasions a king's clerk was put in by royal letters.<sup>277</sup> In the 16th century the rents of the hospital and its lands were appropriated to the corporation of Andover, to be taken by the chamberlains,<sup>278</sup> and in 1574 it was agreed that £10 yearly for life should be paid by the chamberlains to the Earl of Leicester and 20*s.* to Richard Inkpen for his fee.<sup>279</sup>

There was also in the 13th century a leper hospital dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.<sup>280</sup> The editors of Dugdale, following Tanner, speak of St. John the Baptist and Mary Magdalene as one hospital,<sup>281</sup> so presumably the two were united at some date.

Tradition says that the site of the hospital was at the bottom of New Street, on the east side of the road going north. Tytheridge, in his report on the archives, says:—'A person named Richard Steele, born in 1706, used frequently to say when in his ninetieth year that he had often rung the bell in the old Market House, which was built (of timber) previous to the one in 1725, and that the bell therein was the identical one that came from the Spital chapel.'<sup>282</sup>

The Municipal Charities.—By order of the Charity Commissioners, dated 17 July 1906, a scheme was established for the administration of the following charities, formerly under the administration of the Corporation, viz.:—

(a) The Spital Almshouses, an ancient foundation, formerly consisting of four almshouses in the Western Road and land adjoining, sold in 1902, and the proceeds invested in £985 3*s.* 5*d.* Metropolitan 3 per cent. stock;

The Acre Almshouses, being four tenements erected on land known as the Common acre, containing 1a. 2*r.* 14*p.*, given in 1570 by Catherine Hanson for the recreation of the inhabitants;

The charities of Thomas Cornelius (will, 1610), Richard and Joan Blake, George Pemerton (deed, 1634), Nicholas Fishbourne, and Thomas Westcombe (deed, 1622), the endowments of which are now represented by two shops at the corner of Winchester Street, let at £40 a year; £325 2*s.* 5*d.* Metropolitan 3 per cent. stock, £828 5*s.* 3*d.* consols, and £109 3*s.* 7*d.* consols (belonging to Thomas Westcombe's Charity).

(b) Charity of Ambrose Massey, founded by will, 1843, consisting of £300 consols, and Richard Kemish's eleemosynary charity, the trust fund of which consists of £533 6*s.* 8*d.* India 3 per cent. stock.

(c) Charity of the Rev. Richard Widmore, rector of Lasham, founded by will, proved in the P.C.C., 1764, the trust fund being £250 consols.

By the scheme the charities enumerated under (a) were consolidated and directed to be administered under the title of 'The Consolidated Almshouse and Pension Charity.' The scheme provides 'that the net income of the charities under (a), amounting to about £100 a year, should be applied for the maintenance of four almspeople, who should be widows, and for the payment of pensions, the pensioners to be persons of either sex, qualified as therein mentioned, the almspeople to receive not less than 3*s.* 6*d.* a week, and the pensioners not less than 4*s.* a week.'

That the income of the two charities under (b), amounting to £23 10*s.* a year, should be applied for the benefit of deserving and necessitous persons bona fide resident in the borough, Kemish's eleemosynary charity being given in sixpences.

That the yearly income of the charity under (c), 'The Rev. Richard Widmore's,' amounting to £6 5*s.*, should be applied to the relief of aged and impotent poor persons resident in the borough, and in binding out as apprentices poor children belonging to the borough, or otherwise for the benefit of the poor thereof.

The poor also received an annuity of £5, devised by the will of Christian Hinxman, 1689, and a further annuity of £5 under the will of her son, Joseph Hinxman, 1691.

Henry Smith's Charity.—The poor are entitled to a share of the Thurlaston estate, amounting on the average to about 18s. a year, which in 1906 was applied in the distribution of blankets.

In 1624 Peter Blake by will charged his lands in Andover, among other payments, with £3 a year for the poor of Andover. The annuity is paid by Mr. M. S. Brooke, the owner of 82 High Street, which is applied in gifts of overcoats.

In 1686 John Pollen erected an almshouse in Dog Pole Street for six poor ancient men with provision for their maintenance. The trust property now consists of six almshouses on Church Hill, occupied by six old men, appointed by Sir Richard Hungerford Pollen, bart., who also pays the inmates 2s. 6d. a week each, and a cloak of the value of 20s. is also given by him annually.

The same donor also by his will, proved in the P.C.C. 1719, devised a messuage and garden for a school and an annuity of £10, which was paid to a schoolmistress.

In 1845 the Rev. William Stanley Goddard, by will, proved in the P.C.C., bequeathed to the vicar and mayor a legacy, now represented by £899 8s. 1d. consols, the income to be distributed in clothing, food or fuel to the poor of the town, those attending church to have a preference. The dividend amounting to £23 15s. is usually distributed in coals.

The same testator bequeathed to the vicar and churchwardens a legacy for the repairs and preservation of the parish church. The trust fund, with accumulations, in 1892 amounted to £1,648 3s. 10d. consols, with the official trustees, when a sum of £698 3s. 10d. stock was sold out to meet extra expenditure, leaving the sum of £950 consols.

The official trustees also hold a sum of £824 9s. 3d. consols, producing yearly £20 12s., representing the proceeds of the sale in 1896 of land in Winchester Road and Watery Lane, a house in East Street and a house in New Street, vested in the churchwardens as church lands, the origin of which was unknown. The income is carried to the general account of the churchwardens for church repairs, &c.

They also hold a sum of £584 5s. 4d. consols, producing yearly £14 12s., which is applied for the salary of the organist and the repair of the organ.

In 1862 Martha Waight, otherwise Gale, by her will, proved 17 December, bequeathed to the mayor and vicar a legacy, represented by £900 consols, the dividends to be applied in the purchase of blankets to be distributed on or about St. John the Evangelist's day amongst the poor, with a preference to those attending the parish church.

The dividend, amounting to £22 10s., was in 1905 used in the distribution of thirty-two half-crowns for Christmas cheer for the poor and sixty blankets.

In 1869 the Rev. Charles Henry Ridding, D.D., by deed (enrolled with the Charity Commissioners), declared the trusts of a sum of £2,000 stock, now consols, the income to be applied by the vicar in providing the necessitous poor with articles in kind.

In 1891 Miss Elizabeth Caroline Etwall, by will, proved 10 January, bequeathed a sum of money, now represented by £390 12s. 6d. consols, the income to be distributed amongst the poor inhabitants of New Street, on or about 11 October yearly, whether in receipt of parochial relief or not. The dividends, amounting to £9 15s. 4d., are usually applied in the distribution of coals.

The same testatrix left £78 2s. 6d. consols for the benefit of the Cottage Hospital in the Junction Road, erected in 1876.

In 1898 William Safe, by will, proved 28 February, bequeathed to the vicar and churchwardens a legacy, represented by £658 4s. 6d. consols, the dividends of which, amounting to £16 9s., are applicable for the benefit of deserving poor, irrespective of religious denomination, preference being shown to the aged and afflicted. The distribution is usually made in coal.

By an order of the Charity Commissioners of 9 July 1897 the Catherine Wheel Inn was authorized to be sold to the Corporation for the purposes of a free library, reading-room, museum and a school of art, also in part as a coffee tavern.

The Grammar School.—John Hanson in 1569 gave £200 to be invested at the rate of £16 per annum for the maintenance of a free school within the town. The schoolmaster was to be a graduate of Oxford or Cambridge. The money was placed in the hands of Bishop Horne, then Bishop of Winchester, to be employed by him as Hanson requested. This money the bishop entrusted to William Blake, senior, and his son, William Blake, junior, and they, in connexion with John Blake, gave a bond to the bishop for payment of the £200 and the £16 yearly at a certain time. The bond was not to be found at the death of the bishop, and some time afterwards William Blake, of East Anton, 'being moved in conscience for that the said sum of £200 was given to so good a use and purpose,' is found 'entering into another obligation unto Walter Wayte, then bailiff of Andover, in the sum of £400 to make good the loss.' Richard Blake gave the site and the Corporation built the schoolhouse. Richard Kemish, by will dated 25 September 1611, left £5 per annum to the school.

The school is now regulated by a scheme under the Endowed Schools Acts dated 16 February 1903. The trust estate consists of the school buildings and master's house, which are endowed with an income of about £100 a year derived from land and stock; and there are certain funds held by the official trustees in trust for exhibitions. Additional school buildings are now in course of erection. By the scheme £16 a year is payable by the governors in respect of Kemish's eleemosynary charity (see under Municipal Charities), and £10 a year in respect of Kemish's Lectureship Charity.

The Industrial School, founded by indentures of 14 February 1849 and 24 March 1852, is regulated by a scheme of the Charity Commissioners of 14 April 1899. The trust estate consists of the school, matron's residence, and infants' school, which were endowed by the will of Miss Martha Gale, 1862, with the sum of £10,000, which has been invested in £3,020 Great Western Railway 5 per cent. rent-charge stock, and £6,000 Midland Railway 2½ per cent. preference stock, producing yearly £301.<sup>283</sup>

Hatherden School, founded by will of James Samborne, proved in P.C.C. 1725. The official trustees hold a sum of £1,100 2½ per cent. annuities in trust for this school, producing a yearly income of £27 10s.

In 1872 George Chandler, by will, left £100

APPLESHAW

Appelsawe, Appelleshaghe (xiii cent.); Appulshawe (xv cent.); Appulsha (xvi cent.).

Appleshaw has the Wiltshire border for its northern boundary, and is a small parish comprising only 713 acres, of which 467 acres are arable land, 209 acres permanent grass and 11½ acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is gravel, the subsoil chalk,<sup>2</sup> and both have been worked. The principal crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips. The level of the land above the ordnance datum varies from over 400 ft. to under 300 ft.

The village is situated near the Fyfield border, with the church and the manor-house hard by, the vicarage lying a little to the south. The road from Andover to Devizes passes through the south of the parish.

The hamlet of Lower Appleshaw is on the Weyhill boundary, and partly in that parish.

In 1812 680 acres, mostly in Weyhill, but partly in Appleshaw, were inclosed.<sup>3</sup>

APPLESHAW is not mentioned by MANOR name in Domesday Book,<sup>4</sup> but part of it was probably included in the holding of Hugh de Port in Cholderton,<sup>5</sup> which may be identified with the knight's fee in Cholderton and Appleshaw held by the Brayboefs under the heirs of the Ports.<sup>6</sup> The history of the subinfeudation of the fee by the Brayboefs has been traced in detail under Cholderton (q.v.). It was held in 1284 by service of 40s. scutage, and suit of court twice yearly at William de Brayboef's court of Cranborne, in the parish of Wonston (co. Hants).<sup>7</sup> In the inquisition on the lands of Roger Norman, who died in 1349, it is called a member of the manor of Cholderton, which Roger held in demesne.<sup>8</sup> Here, as elsewhere, the heirs of Roger Norman were succeeded by the Sandys family in the first half of the 15th century,<sup>9</sup> and Sir Walter Sandys, his son Thomas, and Sybil wife of Thomas died within a few years of one another, each seised of four messuages, 5s. rent and land in Appleshaw.<sup>10</sup> In 1486 John Wallop died seised of lands and tenements held of Sir William Sandys,<sup>11</sup> and ten years later Sir William himself died, holding, according to the inquisition, of John Sifrewast.<sup>12</sup> Sir John Wallop died seised of the manor of Appleshaw in 1551, holding of the king as of his hundred of Basingstoke.<sup>13</sup> He left a brother and heir Oliver, whose son, Sir Henry Wallop, died seised in 1599.<sup>14</sup> Sir Henry Wallop the younger, son of the last named, had a grant of free warren in 1617,<sup>15</sup> and dealt with the manor in 1627.<sup>16</sup> He was succeeded by his son, Robert Wallop, a staunch Parliament man, who was attainted at the Restoration, his possessions being given to Thomas Earl of Southampton, Anthony Lord Ashley, Sir Orlando Bridgeman and Sir Henry Vernon.<sup>17</sup> In 1667 these grantees sold the manor of Appleshaw to Sir William Courtney of Crabbet (co. Suss.) and Katherine his wife.<sup>18</sup> Their successor was John Smith, who, having in 1688 been granted two fairs in Appleshaw,<sup>19</sup> sold the manor in 1699 to George Rumbold,<sup>20</sup> who dealt with it by a recovery in 1727.<sup>21</sup> From the Rumbolds the manor shortly descended to the Butchers, with whom it continued until 1809,<sup>22</sup> when Catherine Butcher, then owner, married James Edwards. Mr. Edwards died in 1841 and left the manor to his nephew John Edwards, whose sons, Mr. Frederick Charles Edwards and Mr. James Cecil Edwards, now hold it. Appleshaw and Redenham (see Fyfield), which have descended together since the time of the Wallops, are now regarded as one manor.

The fairs above mentioned were still held in 1792 on 23 May, 4 November and the Friday and Saturday before the great Weyhill fair (q.v.). In 1888

there were fairs on 6 and 7 October and 4 November.<sup>23</sup>

Besides the fee in Cholderton and Appleshaw there was also one in Drayton and Appleshaw, held likewise by the Brayboefs of the St. Johns. The mesne lordship, however, was different. In 1284 it was held by Herbert de Canne,<sup>24</sup> and the part that lay in Appleshaw is represented later by a rent of 10s., which went with the manor of Drayton Cannes<sup>25</sup> (see Barton Stacey).

Some part of Appleshaw also belonged to the estate which Thomas de Cholderton and his kin held in Cholderton and Ann Savage.<sup>26</sup> In the Nomina Villarum of 1316 Appleshaw is described as a hamlet and bracketed with Cholderton, which was at that date divided between John de Ann, Philip de Ann, Philip de Wasprai and John de Romsey.<sup>27</sup>

Although there is no mention of such a holding in any charter, it appears that Mottisfont Priory had some small possessions in Appleshaw, for in 1536 the 'manor' of Appleshaw was granted with the rest of the priory possessions to Sir William Sandys, K.G., chamberlain to the king, and Margery his wife.<sup>28</sup> This estate, which was certainly not a real manor, was dealt with in 1550 by a fine levied between William Paulet Earl of Wiltshire and Thomas Sandys, which appears to entail the property on the latter and his heirs.<sup>29</sup> It is probably Lord Sandys' farm of Appleshaw, mentioned in 1591.<sup>30</sup>

APPLESHAW CHURCH, which has no known dedication, is cruciform on plan and consists of a continuous chancel and nave with a west porch, and north and south transepts, the total length being 64 ft. 9 in. and the width across the transepts 55 ft. 3 in. Over the west end of the nave is a small wooden bell-turret containing one modern bell. The building was erected in 1836 and is extremely plain, with rough-cast walls, slate roofs, and wooden frames to all the windows.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten cover of 1742 inscribed, 'Ex dono Edwardi Gale de Novo Hospitio in comitatu Middlesexii, gent, guar-diani ecclesiae de Appleshaw 1743'; and a silver paten probably of 1679 inscribed, 'The gift of Edward Gale of Appleshaw, gent, to the church there for the use of the Sacrament Bread there for ever 1772.' There is also a plated tankard-shaped flagon.

The registers are contained in three books. The first has baptisms and burials from 1739 to 1812, with baptisms from 1718 to 1739 copied from the Amport register, and marriages from 1726 to 1753. The second book has marriages only, 1756 to 1812, and the third baptisms from 1783 to 1812 and burials 1744 to 1759 and 1783 to 1816.

Appleshaw was formerly a chapelry ADVOWSON attached to Amport, but was in 1866 declared a vicarage in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Chichester.<sup>31</sup> Since 1901, however, the advowson has been in the hands of the Lord Chancellor.

There is a Primitive Methodist chapel here, which was erected in 1869.

The school was built in 1870, with accommodation for sixty-five children.

In 1761 Mrs. Frances Offley by CHARITIES will left £50 to be applied towards instructing the poorest children of the parish in reading. The legacy is now represented by £52 8s. 4d. consols.

In 1835 Mrs. Catherine Edwards by will bequeathed a legacy, now represented by £104 14s. 2d. consols, the income to be applied for teaching the poorest children to read, knit and work.

The income of these charities, amounting to £3 18s. 4d., is carried to the school accounts.

In 1904 Mrs. Emma Harrison by will proved 23 March bequeathed £200 to the vicar and churchwardens. The legacy was invested in £229 19s. consols, the dividends of which, amounting to £5 13s. 4d., are applied in accordance with the trusts in the distribution of coal.

The several sums of stock are held by the official trustees.

UPPER CLATFORD

Cladford (xi cent.); Clatford (xii cent.); Upclatford (xiv cent.).

Upper Clatford contains 2,209 acres, of which 9 are covered by water, 1,259½ are arable land, 294½ are permanent grass and 59½ are woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is light loam, the subsoil chalk.<sup>2</sup> The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips. Bury Hill and the extreme north-east corner of the parish are the only parts which rise above 300 ft., and either side of the River Anton, which intersects the north-east of the parish, and Pillhill Brook, which flows into the Anton at Long Bridge, the level is considerably under 200 ft.

The village is long and straggling, lying on both sides of the Andover road, which runs parallel to and west of the Anton and the Andover and Redbridge branch of the London and South Western Railway. The church stands a little away from the village, at its southern extremity, between Sackville Court Farm and Norman Court Farm, both of which perpetuate names notable in Upper Clatford in the 14th century. Redrice House, the residence of Captain Best, the lord of the manor, lies a mile to the south-west in a thickly-wooded park of about 100 acres in extent. The manor-house, which is at present occupied by Mrs. Millman, is situated on the road from the village to Redrice Park. Clatford Lodge, the residence of Rear-Admiral John Locke Marx, M.V.O., lies north of Pillhill Brook.

A detached village formed largely of buildings connected with the Waterloo Iron Works is in the Anna Valley, south of Pillhill Brook and close to the Abbots Ann boundary. It contains a school and a workmen's hall built by Messrs. Tasker, ironfounders, in 1867.

There are the remains of a camp on Bury Hill.

Oakcuts Woods in this parish and Goodworth Clatford were inclosed in 1855,<sup>3</sup> and there had also been an award in 1785.<sup>4</sup>

The following place-names may be mentioned:— 'Lardners' and 'Culverhayes' (xvi cent.)<sup>5</sup>; 'Far-rall's Downe,' 'Plassetts' and 'Alyffes Water' (xvii cent.)<sup>6</sup>.

CLATFORD, which does not occur MANORS specifically as UPPER CLATFORD until the 14th century, was held by Saxi of the Confessor, and in 1086 it was a royal demesne as of the fee of Roger Earl of Hereford,<sup>7</sup> who had forfeited his lands for his part in the conspiracy of 1074.<sup>8</sup> The Abbot and convent of Lire, in Normandy, to whom the advowson belonged, had 3 virgates of land and the tithe of the vill, and Adeline the jester held 1 virgate of the gift of Earl Roger.<sup>9</sup> The possession of 3 virgates by Lire suggests that Clatford had belonged also to the Earl's father, William Fitz Osbern Earl of Hereford, who founded the abbey in 1045 and endowed it with the church of Clatford and its appurtenances.<sup>10</sup> The first recorded lord of Upper Clatford after Domesday is Aumary de Turnebu, who was dead by 1195, when the manor was in the king's hands with his heir.<sup>11</sup> In 1204 King John granted the custody of the manor to Hugh de Nevill,<sup>12</sup> and in June 1205 gave it to William de Huntingfield for £30, saving to Hugh his chattels and corn.<sup>13</sup> In November he pardoned William the £30.<sup>14</sup> The intentions of King John and King Henry III with regard to this manor seem to have been extraordinarily vacillating. On John's rupture with his barons he took it away from William de Huntingfield,<sup>15</sup> and in May 1215 wrote to the sheriff to give John de Harecourt seisin without delay.<sup>16</sup> A month later he restored it to William de Huntingfield,<sup>17</sup> and in the following October gave John son of Henry 20 librates of land in the manor with all William de Huntingfield's chattels and stock found thereon.<sup>18</sup> In December the king wrote to William Briwere, the sheriff, that he had restored to William Turnebu the land in Clatford which had belonged to John Turnebu his father and ordered him to give him seisin<sup>19</sup>; and in March 1216 Hugh de Nevill was instructed to allow

William Turnebu to have the forest liberties which his father had had and which appertained to the manor.<sup>20</sup> About the same time William Turnebu was granted the corn there which had been William de Huntingfield's.<sup>21</sup> In 1217 Henry III granted the vill with its appurtenances to Aumary de St. Amand to hold during pleasure,<sup>22</sup> and in 1219 he gave the manor to William the Marshal, second Earl of Pembroke of that name, since it had been taken into the royal hands by the justices in eyre.<sup>23</sup> On the death of the earl in April 1231<sup>24</sup> Henry III granted Clatford Manor to Waleran the Teuton, promising the new grantee a reasonable exchange when it should be restored to the right heirs of the last Norman holder.<sup>25</sup> In the following month the sheriff of Hampshire was ordered to let Baldwin de Bethune and Henry de Brayboef, who had each held a moiety of the manor of the bail of William the Marshal, have their chattels and the corn which they had sown there.<sup>26</sup> This order was countermanded in July when Waleran the Teuton was to have the corn and Baldwin and Henry only their reasonable costs of cultivation and sowing.<sup>27</sup> In 1232 Waleran surrendered the manor, and it was restored to Richard the Marshal, third Earl of Pembroke.<sup>28</sup> In 1233 it was committed to Jordan de Doe to support him in the king's service during pleasure,<sup>29</sup> and in 1235 Gilbert the Marshal, fourth Earl of Pembroke, granted the issues of Clatford and other manors to Eleanor Countess of Pembroke, his sister-in-law, widow of William the second earl and sister of Henry III.<sup>30</sup> On the death of Anselm the Marshal, sixth Earl of Pembroke, in December 1245, the earldom reverted to the Crown, and the estates were divided among his five sisters and co-heirs or their children.<sup>31</sup> The fee of Clatford fell to the lot of Roger de Mortimer, lord of Wigmore, who had married Maud, one of the four daughters and co-heirs of Eve, one of the aforesaid five sisters and wife of William de Braose.<sup>32</sup> Roger de Mortimer was grandfather of Roger first Earl of March, and the overlordship continued with his descendants<sup>33</sup> until the earldom, with all its fees, merged in the Crown on the accession of Edward IV in 1461.<sup>34</sup>

Early in the 13th century the demesne of Clatford had become divided into three parts, being held by Philip de St. Philibert, Bartholomew de Sackville, and John de St. Quentin of Richard Seward, who held of the new enfeoffment of Richard the Marshal.<sup>35</sup>

In 1245 John de St. Quentin's part of the manor, which had been recovered by judgement of court, was restored to the old holder, Waleran the Teuton, with a further promise that he should have the shares of Philip de St. Philibert and Bartholomew de Sackville when the king should have got them into his hands.<sup>36</sup> This promise was not kept. The Sackvilles and their descendants continued to hold for another two centuries and a half (vide Sackville's Court, infra), and the St. Philiberts (vide Norman's Court infra) held their lands in Clatford for some time longer.

Gilbert de Clare, the Red, Earl of Gloucester, who died in 1295, had free and customary rents in Clatford, which he held of Richard Seward, and it is probable that this holding was identical with the lands of<sup>37</sup> John de St. Quentin, which had been granted to Waleran the Teuton in 1245 (q.v. supra). His son Gilbert, the eighth earl, on whose death at Bannockburn in 1313 the earldom became extinct, had rents in Clatford to the value of £7 10s. 3d.<sup>38</sup> Thus in the Nomina Villarum of 1316, although the title was actually extinct at that date, the Earl of Gloucester is given as one of the three holders of Clatford.<sup>39</sup> In November 1315 the custody of the vills of Petersfield, Mapledurham, Upper Clatford, and Harbridge, the possessions of the late Earl of Gloucester, was committed to Laurence de Rustiton. In December 1316, however, a fresh grant of the custody of all the earl's lands in England until the octaves of Trinity next following was made to Richard de Rodney, Benedict de Cokefeld and William de Aylmer. Somewhat tardy reparation was made to Laurence de Rustiton: in 1320 the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer were ordered to acquit him of 50 marks yearly due on the original grant,<sup>40</sup> and in 1327 to allow him over £22 due to him in the late king's wardrobe, out of £38 7s. 5½d. which he owed for arrears of ferm.<sup>41</sup> Hugh de Audley, who married Margaret sister and heir of Gilbert de Clare, and was created Earl of Gloucester in 1337,<sup>42</sup> died seised of the Clares' rents in Upper Clatford ten years later.<sup>43</sup> His daughter and heir Margaret (de jure Baroness Audley) married Ralph Stafford first Earl of Stafford,<sup>44</sup> whose grandson Thomas the third earl was seised of parcel of the hamlet of Upper Clatford at his death in 1392,<sup>45</sup> as was his brother William fourth Earl of Stafford, who died a minor three years later.<sup>46</sup> The Staffords apparently continued to hold, and in 1485 John Howard Duke of Norfolk was granted the reversion of the lordship and manor of Upper Clatford, with other estates, of which Sir William Huse, chief justice of the King's Bench, and others had a grant for seven years for the payment of the debts of Henry Stafford second Duke of Buckingham,<sup>47</sup> who was attainted and beheaded in 1483.<sup>48</sup> His son Edward, last Duke of Buckingham of that creation, to whom the family honours were restored in 1485, suffered a like fate in 1521.<sup>49</sup> The manor of Upper Clatford is mentioned in the inquisition on his lands.<sup>50</sup>

In 1528 John Bouchier Lord Berners, the translator of Froissart's Chronicle, was granted Upper Clatford and other manors, with the issues of the same, from September 1514.<sup>51</sup> Lord Berners died without legitimate male issue in 1533, and the barony fell in abeyance between his two daughters.<sup>52</sup> Upper Clatford came to the younger, Joan, who on her sister's death about 1550 became de jure Baroness Berners. She was the wife of Edmond Knyvett, sergeant porter to Henry VIII, who died in 1539, and in 1544 she sold the manor to John Scullard,<sup>53</sup> who, or another of his name, died seised thereof in 1590.<sup>54</sup> John Scullard, senior, and Agnes his wife, in 1611 conveyed the manor with its appurtenances in Upper Clatford and Andover and free fishery in the waters of Upper Clatford to George Scullard,<sup>55</sup> who in 1634, with his wife Jane and Brocas Scullard, quitclaimed the same premises to Thomas Coteele.<sup>56</sup> At this date the history of this manor is obscure.

It is known that Thomas Coteele's daughter and heir married Sir Richard Edgcumbe, of Mount Edgcumbe<sup>57</sup> (co. Cornw.), and a manor of Upper Clatford is found in the possession of their descendant George Viscount Mount Edgcumbe and Valletort in 1786.<sup>58</sup> However, in 1731, an estate also known as Upper Clatford, with which it is possible the Coteele moiety fused,<sup>59</sup> was the property of George Tarrant, who conveyed it to William Evans in 1733.<sup>60</sup> In 1747 Maynard Guérin and Thomas Gatehouse obtained a lease from Richard Lord Edgcumbe of a messuage in Upper Clatford called Poors for a term of ninety-nine years 'should George Tarrant now of Abbots Ann, Thomas Gatehouse and Elizabeth Gatehouse happen to live so long.' In 1763 Sir Brian Broughton Delves, bart., contracted to buy the manor of Upper Clatford and several messuages and lands in Upper Clatford for £10,000, from the heirs-at-law of Maynard Guérin and of Sir Thomas Gatehouse.<sup>61</sup> In 1769 Sir Brian's widow married Henry Errington,<sup>62</sup> who was living at Redrice House in 1778.<sup>63</sup> The subsequent descent of this estate is the same as that of Abbots Ann<sup>64</sup> (q.v.), Captain Thomas George Best of Redrice House being the lord of the manor and the principal landowner in the parish.

Owing to the number of contemporary holders and the fact that no distinctive names were at that date applied to the different holdings the descent of the Upper Clatford lands in the 13th and 14th centuries must be to a certain extent conjectural. If, however, one may identify the St. Philiberts with the Spircoks of the Feudal Aids and other records the history of one property, which was later designated NORMAN'S COURT, will be greatly simplified.<sup>65</sup> In 1267 there was a suit as to whether Roger de Mortimer, the overlord, Hugh de Sutton, his bailiff, and others had unjustly disseised William de St. Philibert of his free tenement in Clatford and Andover, comprising a messuage and 2 carucates of land with appurtenances. William had committed felony by killing a man at Lesnes, in Kent, and had afterwards been outlawed for contumacy. Roger, as chief lord of the fee, had fined with the king and entered the premises as his escheat. Such was Mortimer's defence, and St. Philibert, who did not put in an appearance, was amerced.<sup>66</sup> This William de St. Philibert may have been the same who, being on the side of the barons at the defence of Dover Castle but making his submission after Evesham, had his lands restored to him in 1267.<sup>67</sup> Be that as it may, in 1275 Thomas de St. Philibert was making a life grant to Roger de St. Philibert of a messuage and 2 carucates and 10 virgates of land in Clatford, which was to revert to Thomas and his heirs.<sup>68</sup> Thomas Spircok appears in the Nomina Villarum of 1316 as one of the three holders of the vill.<sup>69</sup> Within ten years or so of that date Roger Norman had acquired property there, of which, however, he was not yet to have undisputed possession. At Easter 1330 the claims of John de St. Philibert and Roger Norman were being tried at the King's Bench. According to the plaintiff Thomas de St. Philibert was seised of the manor of Upper Clatford in the time of Henry III and died without issue, his heir being his uncle Hugh, brother of his father Roger; on the death of Hugh de St. Philibert the manor passed to his son and heir Hugh, whose son and heir was the plaintiff John. Norman denied that Thomas de St. Philibert died seised of the manor, but the jury found against him, he was amerced at £40 and John de St. Philibert recovered seisin.<sup>70</sup> What seems to be a sequel to this case occurred in the following September, when various persons, including John son of Thomas Spircok, and Thomas and Hugh his brothers, broke into Roger Norman's houses at Upper Clatford, carried off his goods and assaulted his servants.<sup>71</sup> The identity of the Christian names of these Spircoks with those of the St. Philiberts is noticeable, and the presumption that Norman had succeeded, lawfully or not, to the Spircok holding as he had to the St. Philibert (if the two be not identical) is strengthened by the Feudal Aid of 1346, where Thomas Sackville and he are entered as holding the quarter fee which had once belonged to Thomas Spircok, Clarice Sackville and the Earl of Gloucester.<sup>72</sup> It will be seen that the judgement given in 1330 as to the right of Roger Norman in Upper Clatford must have been reversed. In 1337 he was granted free warren there,<sup>73</sup> and died seised of the manor in 1349.<sup>74</sup> In the following year the manor was committed to the custody of Peter de Bridges during the minority of Giles, heir of Roger Norman.<sup>75</sup> Giles died in 1362 before coming of age,<sup>76</sup> and was succeeded by his cousin Margaret wife of John Chamberlayne and daughter of Agnes Norman, sister of Roger Norman, junior, his father. In 1363 Richard de Cavendish and Julia his wife, John de Glemsford and Beatrice his wife, and William Chamberlayne and Christine his wife conveyed the manor to Peter de Bridges,<sup>77</sup> and in 1391 Richard Becket and Alice his wife, as kinswoman and heir of Roger Norman, obtained an inspeximus and confirmation of the charter of free warren.<sup>78</sup> In the inquisition after Richard Becker's death, in which Upper Clatford is not mentioned, Alice is called daughter and heir of Richard Cavendish.<sup>79</sup> In 1395 Sir John Sandys and Joan his wife were dealing with the manor of Upper Clatford,<sup>80</sup> and in 1406-7 Sir Thomas Skelton was farmer, in the right of his wife, late the wife of Sir John Sandys.<sup>81</sup> In 1428 Walter Sandys, son and heir of John Sandys, held with Thomas Sackville a quarter of a fee which had formerly (i.e. in 1346) belonged to Thomas Sackville and Roger Norman.<sup>82</sup> This seems to indicate that the property of the Normans in Upper Clatford had passed to the Sandys family, probably before Richard Becket's death in 1411. According to the assessment of 1431 Sir Walter Sandys of Andover had a quarter of a fee to himself,<sup>83</sup> and in 1442 his son and heir Thomas Sandys died seised of land, a water-mill and a fulling mill in Clatford.<sup>84</sup> These premises were held by his second wife Sibyl until her death in 1446,<sup>85</sup> when she was succeeded by her son Sir William Sandys, who died seised thereof in 1496.<sup>86</sup> This Sir William was the father of William Sandys, K.G., first Lord Sandys of the Vyne, so created in

1523, whose possessions in Upper Clatford were in 1536 increased by a grant of the lands there that had belonged to Mottisfont Priory.<sup>87</sup> The Sandys family continued to hold their estate in Upper Clatford for another century.<sup>88</sup> In 1601 William third Lord Sandys let his waters, fish and fishing in Upper Clatford, Goodworth Clatford and Andover to Andrew Reade of Facombe for ninety-nine years.<sup>89</sup> On his death in 1623 the manor passed to his son William fourth Lord Sandys, who died without issue in 1629.<sup>90</sup> It was then settled on Richard Atkins, son of his niece Mary, wife of Richard Atkins and daughter of Elizabeth suo jure Baroness Sandys.<sup>91</sup> About 1649 John Trott acquired a lease of the manor from Martha Acheson, wife of Richard Atkins, and his claims to the estate took the Committee for Compounding five years to decide.<sup>92</sup> The final judgement, however, appears to have been in Trott's favour, and the lease was evidently converted into absolute possession. Thus thirty years later the manor was in the hands of Sir Charles Shuckburgh, who had married as his first wife Catherine daughter and heir of Sir Hugh Stewkeley of Hinton, whose wife was daughter and heir of this John Trott, who had been created a baronet in 1661.<sup>93</sup> In 1681 Sir Charles conveyed the manor of Upper Clatford, together with Sackville's Court (vide infra), to Eleanor Rawlinson, widow,<sup>94</sup> who was perhaps the Eleanor Joyce, widow, who called John Rawlinson to warranty in 1721.<sup>95</sup> The Rawlinsons continued holding the two manors at least as late as 1817.<sup>96</sup> They were succeeded by the Lywood family, who resided at Norman Court until the close of last century. The site of the manor is marked by Norman Court Farm in the east of the parish on the left bank of the Anton.

The second of the three holders under Richard Seward mentioned in the Testa de Nevill was Bartholomew de Sackville, whose family continued to hold land in Upper Clatford, known later as SACKVILLE'S COURT, for many generations, and gave its name to a separate manor.<sup>97</sup> In 1245, at which date only one manor was recognized, Bartholomew's portion was promised to Waleran the Teuton.<sup>98</sup> In 1316, however, Clare Sackville had a third share in the vill,<sup>99</sup> and in 1346 Thomas Sackville and Roger Norman held a quarter fee.<sup>100</sup> Another Thomas Sackville was holding in 1428,<sup>101</sup> while three years later John Sackville of Henley-on-Thames was named as having one-eighth of a fee in Clatford.<sup>102</sup> In 1435 Sir Thomas Sackville and Anne his wife were parties to a fine concerning the manor of 'North' Clatford.<sup>103</sup> At some date, which cannot have been very long subsequent, these Sackvilles came to an end with an heiress Margery, who married Thomas Rokes.<sup>104</sup> The son and grandson of this match were sheriffs of Buckinghamshire in 1477 and 1486 respectively.<sup>105</sup> In 1508 Sir Richard Empson recovered the manor of Upper Clatford against Thomas Rokes, senior, and Alice his wife, and in 1511, the year after Empson's attainder,<sup>106</sup> his manor in Upper Clatford, by the name of Rokes' Manor, was granted in fee to Robert Knollys, gentleman usher of the chamber.<sup>107</sup> Peter Compton, who had possibly acquired the manor by a grant from Robert Knollys, died seised of the same in 1545,<sup>108</sup> and was succeeded by his son Henry, created Lord Compton in 1572, who died seised in 1589.<sup>109</sup> His son William, second Lord Compton, sold the manor and free fishery in 1592 to Arthur Swayne,<sup>110</sup> and in 1615 Edward, son of the latter, died seised thereof, leaving a brother and heir Robert, who five years later quitclaimed the manor of Upper Clatford alias Sackville's Court with free fishery, common of pasture and other premises to Thomas Younge, Richard Pope and Nicholas Blake and the heirs of Thomas.<sup>111</sup> There is in the Record Office calendar reference to a fine, of which the original is missing, levied in the Easter Term of 1627 or 1628, between W. Blake and others, demandants, and Sir John Philpott, knight, and others, defendants, the result of which was apparently to convey the manor to Philpott, for two-thirds of this manor were among his possessions escheated for recusancy, and granted in 1628 to Edward Barnes for a term of forty-one years.<sup>112</sup> In 1630 William Goldwyer died seised of 'land in Upclatford, late parcel of the demesne of that manor and called Swayne's manor,'<sup>113</sup> which must have some connexion with the Swaynes who had recently held Sackville Court. William Goldwyer left a son and heir William, who in 1632 with his wife Sarah conveyed the manor of Upper Clatford to John Marke.<sup>114</sup> Sackville Court is next referred to in 1681, when it was in the same hands as the preceding fallen into disuse and during the 16th century there was no special name to distinguish it from the other manors in the parish. However, the name 'Sackville's Court,' which began to be used early in the 17th century, must have been given to the same manor in commemoration of its earlier and more distinguished holders.

manor, with which it continued to descend. The site of the manor is marked by Sackville Court Farm in the village near the church.

In 1086 there were three mills in Upper Clatford worth 57s. 6d.<sup>115</sup> A fulling mill and a water-mill went with the manor held by the Normans and afterwards by the Sandys.<sup>116</sup> When this manor became joined to Sackville's Court two water-mills and two fulling mills belonged to the property.<sup>117</sup> At the present time there are Clatford Mills on the Anton and a windmill in the western border.

The church of ALL SAINTS consists CHURCH of a chancel 14 ft. 1 in. long by 24 ft. wide with a modern sanctuary 15 ft. 10 in. long by 16 ft. wide, modern north vestry, nave 39 ft. 6 in. by 25 ft. 10 in., modern north aisle 10 ft. wide, south porch and west tower, 8 ft. 2 in. deep by 10 ft. 4 in. wide. All these measurements are internal.

The south walls of the nave and chancel probably belong to an aisleless church to which, at the end of the 12th century, a north aisle was added. The west tower seems to have been built, probably on the site of an older tower, in 1578, and early in the 17th circular head, with a double external rebate in the head and jambs.

The older part of the chancel has a 17th-century south window of three round-headed lights, and its north wall, against which the organ is set, is pierced by a modern doorway into the vestry.

The arcade between the chancel and nave has a round column and half-round responds. The bases are either buried or missing; at the springing are grooved and hollow-chamfered abaci with a line of bead ornament in the hollow; the arches are roughly four-centred, of a single order with the angles cut off above the springing to fit them to the circular plan of the abaci.

The arcade between the nave and north aisle has three bays of 14th-century style. The three south windows of the nave are each of two lights with plain unevenly pointed heads and are probably of late 16th-century date, and the south doorway, between the second and third, has a single chamfered round arch, thickly colour-washed and of doubtful age. The oak door is old and plain with old wrought iron strap hinges.

The window in the west wall of the nave north of the tower has three uncusped lights with four-centred heads; the tracery appears to be old, but the inner jambs and arch are modern.

The aisle has two north windows, each of three lights. West of these a late 12th-century doorway has been reset; it has plain chamfered jambs and round arch; the abaci are grooved and hollow chamfered.

The west window of the aisle is also a piece of re-used old work, evidently not in its original form; it has two irregularly trefoiled lights and a trefoiled opening over in a two-centred head.

The tower is divided externally into two stages with low buttresses at the west angles and opens to the south-west corner of the nave by a modern arch set on 16th-century jambs. The west window is a small one of two round-headed lights and probably dates from the end of the 16th century. Over it, before the recent repair, were a small blocked light with jambs made up of the broken pieces of a 12th-century pillar piscina (now taken out and put together again) and parts of the head of a cinquefoiled 15th-century window (now on the sill of the west window below). The walling of the lower part of the tower is of flint with stone dressings, but the upper part has a weathered brick string and square-headed brick windows, doubtless dating from the work of 1578. The inner jambs are in some cases partly of stone, some of which are moulded with a sunk quarter-round. In the north window of the belfry are two century the nave and aisle were thrown into one, the chancel correspondingly widened on the north, and two bays of the north arcade set up between the nave and chancel in place of a single chancel arch. The tie-beams being of nearly 26 ft. bearing are strengthened by octagonal wooden posts down the middle of the nave.

Since its rebuilding the church has been restored more than once; in 1890 the north aisle was also added and the eastern part of the chancel in 1894, while the vestry dates from 1903. The tower was restored in 1908.

The modern eastern part of the chancel has a three-light traceried east window and one of two lights on the south; below the latter are credence and piscina recesses, and to the west of it part of a late 12th-century window, which was in the former east wall. It has splayed inner jambs and a semi-portions of an inscribed stone, apparently recording the building of the top part of the tower in 1578, with the names of the churchwardens.

It reads :—[Repaired in the Year of our]

The chamber is brick lined. The parapet is plain and has small crocketed pinnacles at the angles. The south porch is an 18th or early 19th-century one of brick plastered.

The roof of the nave is gabled and plastered below; it has three 17th-century trusses with moulded tie-beams, on each of which stand three wooden columns supporting the collar above, and moulded principal rafters; a moulded purlin runs down the middle of the ceiling. Two of the trusses are strengthened by octagonal 11 in. posts from the floor of the church. The chancel ceiling is also plastered, with a central ring of raised plaster work.

The font is a very charming piece of work with a shallow round bowl on a slender octagonal stem, of which unfortunately a small piece has been removed, to the great damage of its proportions. On the upper edge of the bowl, in letters inlaid with black composition, is 'Richard Greene of Winterborne Stoke gave this 1629.' The pulpit is of plain 17th-century workmanship with an octagonal sounding-board, and is set in the south-east corner of the nave. Beyond a few plain oak benches the rest of the furniture is modern.

There are no monuments earlier than the 17th century. The churchyard lies to the south and east of the church and has recently been enlarged. A fine avenue of pollard limes leads up to the south entrance from the lych-gate, and there is also a fine yew tree. The lych-gate dates from 1905.

There are four bells; the treble and tenor are by John Stares, 1744, and the second and third by Robert Cor of Aldbourne, 1700 and 1721.

The plate consists of a chalice of 1811 given by Maria Broughton in 1812, a paten of 1631, another of 1654 engraved with an imitation Elizabethan band given by Edward Frowd, rector, in 1852, and a flagon of 1895—all of silver.

The registers begin in 1571. The first book contains baptisms, marriages and burials to 1724, with some gaps; the leaves are of paper and they are now well bound. The second book continues the marriages to 1754 and the baptisms and burials to 1776; this is also all on paper. The third book repeats the last in parchment and continues the baptisms and burials to 1812. The fourth has the marriages from 1754 to 1812, and there is also a banns book for the same period. Two Commonwealth entries record the calling of the banns of two couples in 1656 in the market place of Andover on three several days, after which they were lawfully married; but a third couple who were married the following year had their banns published in the parish church.

The church of Upper Clatford was ADVOWSON given to the abbey of Lire, in Upper Normandy, by William Fitz Osbern Earl of Hereford, the founder.<sup>118</sup> With it, as appears from Domesday Book, went 3 virgates of land there and the tithe of the vill.<sup>119</sup> The Priors of Carisbrooke, as proctors for the Abbots of Lire in England, presented to the rectory, except in war-time, when the temporalities of foreign houses were in the king's hands.<sup>120</sup> In 1414, after the dissolution of the alien priories, Henry V granted practically all the English possessions of Lire, including the impropriation and advowson of Upper Clatford, to the prior and convent of his new foundation, the house of Jesus of Bethlehem at Sheen,<sup>121</sup> who presented until the Dissolution.<sup>122</sup> The patronage during the 16th century has not been discovered, but the rectory and advowson were granted to Edward Downing and Roger Rante in 1591 or 1592.<sup>123</sup> Sir Thomas Jervoise presented in 1627, and his descendants the Jervoises of Herriard had the advowson until the end of the 18th or the beginning of the 19th century.<sup>124</sup> The Rev. Edward Frowd, who became rector in 1830, also acquired the patronage, holding both living and advowson until 1863, when the Rev. Thomas Child became patron and incumbent. From him the advowson passed to the Rev. Alfred Child, and was acquired from Mrs. Child about 1891 by Mr. L. Sebastian. From him it shortly passed to Mr. W. S. Boyd, and is now held by Dr. S. S. Ashmore Noakes.

In 1291 the church was assessed at £10 with a pension of 10s.; while the abbey of Lire took £2 from separate portions, no doubt the 3 virgates mentioned in Domesday.<sup>125</sup> In 1534 it was valued, beyond reprises, at £22.<sup>126</sup>

A Primitive Methodist chapel was erected in 1883 and another in 1903.

In 1880 Mrs. Sally Hall Bradshaw CHARITIES by will, proved 26 August (among other charitable legacies), bequeathed £1,000 consols, the annual income to be distributed amongst poor parishioners on Ascension Day, the aged and infirm poor to be especially considered. The legacy, less duty, is represented by £900 consols, with the official trustees, by whom the dividends, amounting to £22 10s. a year, are remitted to the rector and churchwardens. In 1908 there were 30 recipients.

FYFIELD

Fifhidon (x cent.); Fifhide (xi cent.); Fiffyde (xiv cent.); Fyfhyde, Fifede, Fiffyd (xv cent.); Fiffhed, Fiffeld, Fifeld (xvi cent.).

The parish of Fyfield forms a long and narrow strip running from the Wiltshire border on the north to Thruxton on the south. It has an area of 1,290 acres, of which 820 acres are arable, 215 acres permanent grass and 105 acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is light loam, the subsoil chalk,<sup>2</sup> and there are several old chalk-pits. The principal crops are wheat, barley, oats, turnips, sainfoin and clover.

The average height above sea level is rather over 300 ft., and there is a slight slope from north to south. Fyfield village lies in a slight hollow in the south of the parish and is approached by roads from Kimpton, Weyhill, Thruxton and Redenham. Redenham House, the residence of Mr. Arthur William Fulcher, J.P., which stands in a large park surrounded on all sides by copses, is situated about 1½ miles north of the village. It is now included in Thruxton parish, to which it was transferred by order of the Local Government Board in 1888. Near it is the small hamlet of Redenham. The main road from Devizes to Andover passes south of Redenham Park, following closely the course of the Midland and South Western Junction Railway, on which the nearest station is at Weyhill.

Excavations have been made on Lambourne's Hill in the extreme north of the parish at various times. A Roman hypocaust and pottery, &c., were discovered in 1830, a range of four rooms in 1850, and a detached building in 1899. In Great Copse, east of Redenham Park, traces of a small hut were discovered in 1882.<sup>3</sup>

In King Edgar's grant of Fyfield the boundaries are given in Anglo-Saxon, supplying several place-names:—'Wuresbyrigels,' 'Ælfheres Stapol,' 'Bæhildestoc.'<sup>4</sup>

Like the places of similar designation MANORS in Essex and Wiltshire, FYFIELD owes its name to the original extent of the land comprised in it, the 5 hides of the ideal manor.<sup>5</sup> In 975 King Edgar granted it to his thegn Ælfweard for life, with full liberty to dispose of it as he would after his death.<sup>6</sup> Under the Confessor it was held as an alod by Ulveva, and in 1086, when the geldable area had been reduced to 3 hides, William Mauduit held it.<sup>6a</sup> He was the ancestor of the baronial houses of Hanslope and of Warminster and Holgate, of which the first merged in the Beauchamps and the second in the Greenes of Drayton.<sup>7</sup> Neither of these families, however, appears as overlords, and the Domesday tenant, or one of his immediate successors, must have disposed of it. The overlordship belonged first to the king<sup>8</sup> and later to the Duchy of Lancaster.<sup>9</sup> The manor was afterwards said to be held of the burgesses of Andover.<sup>10</sup>

Hamon son of Meinfelin lord of Wolverton (co. Bucks.) and nephew, by his mother, of William Mauduit of Hanslope,<sup>10a</sup> inherited this manor of which he was lord in 1166-7<sup>11</sup> and gave the church, with its appurtenances, to the nuns of De la Pré (co. Northants.), probably under Henry II.<sup>12</sup> He was succeeded here as at Wolverton first by his son William and then by his son Alan and grandson John, who in 1252 granted it to his mother Julia, widow of Alan, to hold in dower with reversion to himself.<sup>13</sup> In 1280 the possessions of John son of Alan in Fyfield—half a knight's fee, worth 100s. a year, and held in chief—were adjudged to be taken into the king's hands, as they had been given without the royal assent to Matthew Nowell, in free marriage with John's sister, to be held of him and his heirs.<sup>14</sup> Restoration was evidently made, for in 1292 William Nowell was granted free warren over his demesne there.<sup>15</sup> Within the next twenty years the Morewells had made their appearance. In 1309 Hugh Spinney granted Roger de Morewell a messuage, a carucate of land and rent in Fyfield and Redenham to hold for life, with reversion to his son John and Joan his wife.<sup>16</sup> In 1316 John de Morewell appears as holding the vill.<sup>17</sup> Later it became for a time divided among several holders. In 1340 Roger de Cormeilles and Agnes his wife fined with Stephen Malory, clerk, and William Randolph for a messuage, 2 carucates of land, &c., in Fyfield and West Shoddesden.<sup>18</sup> In 1345 Thomas de Wolverton sought against Roger Norman two parts and against John de Ann the third part of the manor.<sup>19</sup> The result of this suit is not given, but it evidently went against Thomas, for in the following year Roger Norman, Thomas de Ann and Hugh de Cormeilles held between them the quarter of a fee in Fyfield which had belonged to Roger de Morewell.<sup>20</sup> On the death of Henry Duke of Lancaster in 1361 his half fee here was said to be held of him by Roger

The entry runs as follows:—'Redenham Hamonis reddit computum de dimidia marca. In perdonā per breve Regis Willelmo Maledocto dimidiam marcam. Et quietus est.' It is not unreasonable to identify Redenham with Fyfield in this entry. (i) Redenham was not a manor at this date nor until spuriously created in the 16th century. It is not mentioned in Domesday. (ii) The name Fyfield does not occur elsewhere in the Pipe Roll, although nearly all the neighbouring manors are mentioned. (iii) The mention of William Mauduit, son probably of the Domesday holder of Fyfield, is significant. (iv) Moreover, the manor of Fyfield covered part of Redenham. There is nothing to explain the precise significance of 'Redenham Hamonis,' but Mr. J. H. Round considers such entries, of which there are many in this roll, to be proof of the possessors of the places referred to at this date. This is confirmed by such evidence as we have of contemporary manorial lords (Genealogist [new ser.], xvi, 11).

Norman, Hugh de Cormeilles, Thomas son and heir of Michael de Ann and Ralf Dankyn.<sup>21</sup> Roger Norman had, however, died twelve years before seised of Fyfield as a member of the manor of Cholderton, and had been succeeded by his grandson Giles.<sup>22</sup> There is no reference to the manor about this date, on account possibly of the number of important holders. By 1428 the Cormeilles had dropped out, and Walter Sandys and Thomas de Ann held a quarter of a fee between them.<sup>23</sup> The Sandys family had replaced the Normans here, as elsewhere, and premises in Fyfield of slightly varying extent occur in their inquisitions until 1445, after which they are no more mentioned.<sup>24</sup> The probability is that these premises subsequently became merged in the manor of Fyfield. Only one quarter of a fee was assessed at the Aids of 1346 and 1428, while the Duke of Lancaster had half a fee.<sup>25</sup> The Morewells may all the time have been seised of the balance, and have been represented at one period by Ralf Dankyn.<sup>26</sup> Be that as it may, in 1431 Joan Morewell held an eighth part of a fee,<sup>27</sup> and in 1484 John Morewell conveyed the manor to William Dale, John Dale, Agnes his wife and the heirs of John.<sup>28</sup> John Dale died seised of the manor in 1514.<sup>29</sup> His heir was his grandson John Dale, who died eight years later seised of the manor, the reversion of which had been conveyed to his brother William.<sup>30</sup> In 1543 the reversion, in default of heirs of his body, was settled on the right heirs of William instead of on Walter Bonham, and Alice his wife, to whom it then belonged.<sup>31</sup> Accordingly, on William's death in 1566, he was succeeded by his first cousin Valentine Dale,<sup>32</sup> a distinguished Elizabethan diplomatist, who died in 1589,<sup>33</sup> and whose daughter and co-heir Dorothy married Sir John North, eldest son of Roger second Lord North,<sup>34</sup> carrying with her the manor of Fyfield.<sup>35</sup> In 1602, five years after her husband's death,<sup>36</sup> Lady North sold this and other property to John Warner and Avice his wife.<sup>37</sup> Warner died in 1615,<sup>38</sup> and two years later Avice his widow and John his son and heir conveyed the manor to Maurice Abbott, Nicholas Kempe and William Baker.<sup>39</sup> In 1621 all the parties to this fine joined in selling Fyfield to Edward Wickham, S.T.P.,<sup>40</sup> who died seised in the same year.<sup>41</sup> In 1640 his son Thomas Wickham, with his wife Winifred, conveyed the manor to George Grobham.<sup>42</sup> There is nothing to show what happened to Fyfield during the next seventy years, but in 1709 it belonged to Sir John St. Barbe, baronet,<sup>43</sup> who in 1717 sold it to Hugh Winckworth.<sup>44</sup> Winckworth conveyed it to George Clarke in 1723.<sup>45</sup> From this date material is again lacking, but the manor presumably passed to Walter Holt of Redenham House, whose daughter and heir Louisa was in 1778 married to Sir John Pollen, first baronet.<sup>46</sup> The Pollens' estate, comprising the manor of Fyfield and land in Fyfield, Thruxton, Kimpton and Andover, has always been known as the Redenham estate and their house as Redenham House. In July 1908 Sir Richard Hungerford Pollen, fourth bart., sold the property, which is now divided into many smaller holdings.<sup>47</sup>

In 1617 Sir Henry Wallop was granted free warren over various Hampshire manors.<sup>48</sup> The inclusion of Fyfield on the enrolment of this grant must have been an error, as the Wallops never held the manor, although they held at that date many in the neighbourhood. Possibly 'East Rednam and Fyfield' should be taken together as describing the Wallops' estate in the parish (q.v. infra).

REDENHAM is not mentioned in Domesday Book and was never a manor. In the Pipe Roll of 1167 Redenham is entered as 'of Hamon,' rendering account for half a mark.<sup>49</sup> The identification of this with Fyfield is discussed above. In 1263 Jordan de Clanville and Sybil his wife quitclaimed half a messuage and 3 virgates of land in Redenham to Roger de Redenham and his heirs,<sup>50</sup> and in 1314 Thomas de Redenham and Joan his wife conveyed a messuage and a carucate there to Michael de Ann.<sup>51</sup> Several undated grants of land in Redenham occur in the Gloucester cartulary. Luke de Clanville entailed on his son William a virgate of land and a messuage which Arnold at one time held in the vill of West Redenham<sup>52</sup>; on his son Robert a virgate and all his capital messuage and one part of his wood 'scilicet per viam quae se extendit versus Westtradeham in australi parte bosci ex opposito capellae'<sup>53</sup>; and on his son Walter a virgate, an acre in East Redenham and half his wood.<sup>54</sup> The same Luke gave to the abbey of Gloucester a hide of land in Redenham, which he had had from Thomas de Cormeilles, his lord, in exchange for a hide of his inheritance in Thruxton; saving, however, a virgate which he (Luke) had given to William le Blund in free marriage with Annora his daughter and the heirs of their bodies, who were to render yearly a pound of pepper to the monks. In the event of the death of Joan daughter of Annora without issue the virgate was to revert to the abbey. The condition of Luke's gift was that the monks should find his three sons Robert, William and Walter 'in habitu religionis sive in habitu saeculari necessaria.'<sup>55</sup> The grant was confirmed by John de Cormeilles.<sup>56</sup> The abbot gave this land to Roger de Cheyne at the rent of a mark, saving to himself and his successors two suits yearly at the court of Littleton.<sup>57</sup> The service due from Roger for Redenham is also mentioned in an extent of Littleton made in 1265-6.<sup>58</sup> In 1486 John Wallop died seised of lands and tenements in Redenham held of the Abbot of Gloucester by fealty.<sup>59</sup> At a later date, perhaps at the Dissolution, this property became the absolute possession of the Wallops. It is first termed a manor in the inquisition taken after the death of Sir John Wallop in 1551.<sup>60</sup> From that date onwards the descent has been identical with that of Appleshaw (q.v.),<sup>61</sup> with which it has come to be considered as one manor.<sup>62</sup>

The manor was sometimes called East Redenham, sometimes perhaps East Redenham and Fyfield, and later Appleshaw and Redenham.

The Sandys family also held land in Redenham in the 15th century.<sup>63</sup>

The church of ST. NICHOLAS CHURCH consists of a chancel 18 ft. 9 in. by 15 ft. 5 in., nave 32 ft. 9 in. by 15 ft. 7 in., north vestry and south porch.

The building is probably of 12th or 13th-century date, but all early details have been destroyed, and such old work as remains does not go back beyond the 15th century. The chancel was rebuilt (and perhaps enlarged) in the 16th or 17th century. Much of the work is now modernized, and the vestry and porch are both of recent date.

The east window of the chancel is apparently 13th-century work re-used. It has three cinquefoiled lights under a traceried head, and the only other window of the chancel, that in the south wall, has three plain square-headed lights, probably of early 17th-century date. The mullions are worked with a small chamfer.

In the north wall is a modern arch to the vestry. The chancel arch is of two chamfered orders and quite modern, and in the nave is a modern north window of two lights, now pointed but formerly square, and a south window, apparently of the 16th century, with two plain four-centred lights. The south doorway is a modern one with a segmental arched head.

The west window is of three cinquefoiled lights under a two-centred traceried head; the inner splayed jambs have old quoinstones; the rest of the window is modern.

The walling to the south and west of the nave is faced with flint, the chancel walls and the north wall of the nave are coated with cement. A modern bell-cote stands above the west gable of the nave, and has a pointed opening containing a modern bell without inscription. The roofs are gabled and of modern date. The font is a modern octagonal one of stone. In the rectory garden stands an ancient bowl with rounded sides and leaves at the angles, which is probably a mortar and not a font. All the other fittings are entirely modern. There are no old monuments.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten of 1773 and 1657 respectively, and a plated flagon given by George Watson Smyth, rector, in 1851.

The registers begin in 1628: the first book contains mixed entries to 1684, and is on vellum; the second book contains baptisms and burials from 1684 to 1764 and marriages to 1756; the third has baptisms and burials from 1762 to 1812 (it was begun by Henry White, the then rector, and brother of the Rev. Gilbert White of Selborne), and the fourth marriages from 1762 to 1810.

There was a church at Fyfield at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>64</sup>

It was given to the abbey of St. Mary de la Pré (co. Northants.) by Hamon son of Meinfelin, and was confirmed to that house by William son of Hamon, as appears from a general confirmation charter of 1328.<sup>65</sup> The abbey held the advowson until the Dissolution,<sup>66</sup> the abbess taking a pension of one-fifth of the fruits of the living,<sup>67</sup> concerning the payment of which the rector was cited during Woodlock's episcopacy (1305-16).<sup>68</sup> The king presented in 1350, the reason being, according to the entry on the Patent Roll, that the lands and heir of Roger Norman, tenant-in-chief, were in his hands.<sup>69</sup> No reason is given why the advowson belonged to Roger Norman rather than to St. Mary's, and a more probable reason is the vacancy of the abbey,<sup>70</sup> although the new abbess, Isabel de Thorpe, had had restitution of temporalities in the previous year. After the Dissolution the Crown kept the advowson of Fyfield in its own hands, the Lord Chancellor presenting, until 1871.<sup>71</sup> It was then acquired by the Rev. C. A. Hodgson, who was appointed rector in that year and held the advowson until 1882, when it became the property of Mr. R. A. Routh, in whose trustees it is now vested.

There was apparently a chapel at Redenham in early times. One is certainly mentioned in the deed entailing property in Redenham on Robert son of Luke de Clanville.<sup>72</sup> Its site is perhaps marked by Chapel Copse situated immediately south of Redenham Park.

In 1672 Henry Rogers, by will proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, left the sum of £300 towards raising a stock and a working house for the poor inhabitants of Thruxton and Fyfield. The principal sum was laid out in the purchase of a farm at Chute Forest (co. Wilts.), now let at £16 10s. a year. The charity is regulated by schemes of the Charity Commissioners of 1865 and 1880; new trustees were appointed by the same commissioners in 1901. The moiety applicable in this parish is applied with the

GRATELY

Greetanlea (x cent.); Greteleia, Grettelee (xii cent.); Gratele, Grateleghe, Gratele (xiv cent.); Grately (xvi cent.).

The parish of Grately at its south-west or narrowest extremity touches the Wiltshire border. Its total area is 1,552 acres, of which 1,018½ acres are arable land, 71 acres permanent grass and 60 acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil varies, part red woodland and part of the secondary chalk formation. The subsoil is chalk.<sup>2</sup> The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats, turnips, sainfoin and clover.

Lower Grately Wood and Upper Grately Wood are the southernmost of those broken patches of woodland which cover a considerable portion of the neighbouring parish of Ampport. The height above sea level varies from 400 ft. to 320 ft., the general rise of the ground being from east to west.

The village lies at the east end of the parish. Three roads run to it: from Quarley in the north, Monxton in the north-east and Over Wallop in the south. The railway station, on the main line of the London and South Western Railway, is three-quarters of a mile to the south-west. There is a corn-mill between the station and Down Barn Farm.

The Port Way runs through the parish from north-east to south-west, and the modern road, which keeps, roughly, to the same course, is known in one part as Grately Drove.

There was an inclosure award here in 1778.<sup>3</sup>

GRATELY is not mentioned in MANOR Domesday Book, but in 1130 the sheriff was farming the manor, which had belonged to Robert de Matteom, who was either dead or had forfeited.<sup>4</sup> William the Chaplain, or as is more probable William the Chamberlain (Camera), that is to say William Mauduit, was holding in 1167<sup>5</sup> and the manor remained with the Mauduit family. Thomas Mauduit is named in the Testa de Nevill as holding a knight's fee in Grately of the Earl of Hertford.<sup>6</sup> As Mr. Round has pointed out under Over Wallop (q.v.) this is clearly an error for the Earl of Hereford, since Grately certainly had the Bohuns for overlords and when the earldom reverted to the Crown the king became overlord.<sup>7</sup> Thomas Mauduit died in 1270, and four years later his manors of Dean and Grately were in the hands of Sir Alan de Plugenet, who granted them, with certain provisoes, to Sir John de St. Walery from the Thursday after the Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul in 1274 until Michaelmas 1279.<sup>8</sup> In 1295 licence was granted to Thomas's son Warin Mauduit of Warminster, tenant in chief, to demise Grately and other manors to Bevis de Knovill<sup>9</sup> for six years.<sup>10</sup> Warin Mauduit died seised of the manor in 1300,<sup>11</sup> leaving a son and heir Thomas Mauduit, who is named in the Nomina Villarum of 1316: sed mater tenet in dote.<sup>12</sup> In 1318 he had a grant of free warren,<sup>13</sup> but being on the Lancastrian side at Boroughbridge in 1322 he was taken prisoner, his estates were confiscated and himself executed.<sup>14</sup> Edward III, however, restored the estates to his son John Mauduit, who was lord of the manor in 1332,<sup>15</sup> and was assessed in the Aid of 1346 as holding half a fee which had belonged to Robert de Bury.<sup>16</sup> John Mauduit died in 1364 seised of Warminster Manor (though the inquisition makes no mention of Grately), leaving Maud daughter of his son Thomas as his heir, then aged nine.<sup>17</sup> Juliana widow of John Mauduit was seised of the manor at her death,<sup>18</sup> after which it passed to the said Maud, then wife of Sir Henry Greene of Drayton (co. Northants.), who had livery of seisin in May 1379.<sup>19</sup> Sir Henry Greene was a privy councillor to Richard II and high in the royal favour, for which when Henry of Bolingbroke was in the ascendant he lost both his estates and his life.<sup>20</sup> In the first year of his reign, however, the new king restored the estates to Sir Henry's son Ralph,<sup>21</sup> who was afterwards knighted and died seised of Grately in 1417.<sup>22</sup> He was succeeded by his brother John Greene, who is named in the Feudal Aid of 1428 as holding half a fee in Grately,<sup>23</sup> and in that of 1431 as holding one-sixth.<sup>24</sup> He died in 1433,<sup>25</sup> and was succeeded by his eldest surviving son Henry, who was twice married, first to Constance Paulet and secondly to Margaret Ros, but left an only daughter Constance. She carried the manor by marriage to the Lord John Stafford (third surviving son of Humphrey first Duke of Buckingham) created Earl of Wiltshire in 1470. Their son Edward second Earl of Wiltshire died without issue in 1499, when the earldom became extinct.<sup>26</sup> Grately and the rest of the property inherited from the Greens reverted to the heirs of Sir Henry Greene's two sisters, Isabel wife of Sir Richard de Vere, and Margaret wife of Sir Henry Huddleston. Margaret was represented by her only daughter Elizabeth wife of Sir Thomas Cheyne; Isabel by the five daughters of her son Sir Henry de Vere of Addington: (1) Constance wife of John Parr, Lord of Horton; (2) Elizabeth wife of John (Mordaunt), first Lord Mordaunt; (3) Anne wife of Sir Humphrey Browne (her second husband) second son of Thomas Browne of Abbess Roding (co. Essex);

The purchasers and their wives dealt with the manor by fine in 1595,<sup>27</sup> but it is mentioned in neither the will nor inquisition of Sir James Mervyn, who died in 1610.<sup>28</sup> From this date onwards the continuous history of the manor cannot be traced. By 1725 it had come into the possession of Richard Carey, who dealt with it by fine in that year.<sup>29</sup> From the Careys (of Carey Street) it was eventually purchased by Mr. Leonard Pickering who left it to his niece, Miss Pickering of Wilcote Manor (co. Oxon.), now lady of the manor.<sup>35</sup>

The church of ST. LEONARD consists of a chancel 24 ft. 5 in. by 17 ft. 6 in., nave 36 ft. 9 in. by 17 ft. with a south porch, and a west tower 12 ft. 1 in. square, all the measurements being internal.

Of the 12th-century building only the nave now remains, and this only retains one of its original windows. The chancel, which was no doubt small, was pulled down in the 13th century and the present one built round it. The tower was added at the same time, but whether on the site of an earlier one or not there is nothing now to show. In 1851 much restoration work was done, including the refacing of the walls and inserting several new windows. The porch is also a modern addition.

The east window is a triplet of lancets, the centre one being higher than the others. The mullions are not flush with the wall inside and the rear arch is double chamfered. In the top of the gable above this window is a small moulded unpierced quatrefoil considerably damaged by the weather. The north wall of the chancel contains two 13th-century lancets which have chamfered and slightly recessed outer jambs and two-centred chamfered rear arches. The south chancel wall contains only a small priest's doorway which has chamfered jambs and pointed arch.

The easternmost window of the north wall of the nave is a small 12th-century light with a semicircular head, and a segmental rear arch which seems a later alteration. Near the west end of the same wall is a 13th-century lancet, wider than those of the chancel. To the east of this is a blocked doorway which has chamfered jambs and a two-centred arch.

There are three modern windows in the south wall of the nave, the easternmost having two plain lights separated by a wide mullion with a large quatrefoil over. The other two are plain lancets and between them is the south doorway which has chamfered jambs and a semicircular head; it seems to be in part of 12th-century date, but a good deal patched with later mediaeval masonry. The south porch has a small window in each side wall and its outer archway has double chamfered jambs and two-

In 1500, however, Sir Thomas Cheyne and Elizabeth, other estates having been assigned them, quitclaimed Grately to Margaret Countess of Wiltshire and others.<sup>28</sup> John Parr and Constance were dead without issue a few years later, and Audrey de Vere died unmarried. The manor of Grately was thus divided into three parts among Lord Mordaunt and Elizabeth, Sir Humphrey Browne and Ann, John Browne and Etheldreda, and their heirs.<sup>29</sup> It was so held until 1577, when George Tuchet twentieth Lord Audley, with his father-in-law, Sir James Mervyn, purchased the whole from the various holders,<sup>30</sup> who were at that date Lewis third Lord Mordaunt; Wistan Browne, grandson of John and Etheldreda; and Mary wife of Thomas Wilford, Christian wife of John Tufton, and Catherine Browne, the three daughters and co-heirs of Sir Humphrey Browne.<sup>31</sup> centred head. In the apex of the gable is a sundial dated 1784.

The tower arch has plain chamfered jambs and pointed arch with a classic abacus at the springing, and in its present state seems to be 18th-century work. In the west wall of the tower is a wide lancet of 13th-century date. The tower is low and finished at the top with a low brick parapet and small pinnacles at the angles. The belfry is lighted by small lancets, two in the east face and one in each of the other faces. On the west face there is another similar lancet lower down and at the same level in the south side there is a small blocked square opening.

The roofs of both chancel and nave are of old timber, that of the chancel having arched braces; both are plastered between the rafters. The weathering of a slightly higher nave roof shows against the east wall of the tower.

The font, which is placed at the west end of the nave, was found at the Manor Farm. It is circular, tapering towards the base, and has been recut. The base is an old stone, but does not appear to belong in this position; it seems to be the base of a cross.

Fixed against the west jamb of the 12th-century nave window is an iron hour-glass bracket. Beneath the cage for the glass is a pendant, and the whole is supported by a scrolled bracket. On the first floor of the tower is a chest which bears the inscription 'PH · 17 17 · ID CHURCH WORDNS' formed by nail heads.

On the top step of the chancel by the altar rails are two patches of old tiles, thirty in each. They are red with slip inlay under a yellow glaze, and the patterns include a fleur de lis, two lions rampant face to face, a lion passant in a circle, a griffin, a six pointed star, and three other geometric forms. All are single pattern tiles. The most interesting thing in the church is the glass, six fragments in the east window of the chancel, and a large medallion in a lozenge frame in the south-east window of the nave. They are relics saved from the wholesale destruction of the 13th-century glass at Salisbury by the miscreant Wyatt. The ground of those in the east window is deep blue with yellow leaf pattern; in it are set geometrical figures outlined in white and having on a red ground floral patterns in green, white and yellow. In the head of the east window is a figure of the archangel Gabriel with his name above him. The medallion in the south-east window is perfect and shows on a blue ground St. Stephen in alb, dalmatic and fanon being stoned by two men with the hideous faces which mark the mediaeval villain. On a band beneath is the inscription STEPHS ORANS EXPIRAT.

In the churchyard is a tombstone to Joanna Elton, aet. 95, 1782, on the back of which are a set of pretty verses asking that her grave may be always planted with flowers, a request carefully attended to at the present day.

The tower contains two bells, both by John Wallis of Salisbury, 1583, and with the inscription 'God be prayed' on the treble and 'God be our guyd' on the tenor.

The plate consists of a silver chalice undated, probably of local make, a silver paten undated, a silver flagon of 1902 and a plated tankard-shaped flagon.

The first book of registers contains mixed entries 1624 to 1737, those previous to 1643 being from memory, as the registers were all burnt at that date. The second book contains baptisms and burials from 1741 to 1811 and marriages up to 1754, and the third book has marriages only from 1754 to 1812.

There is a note in the registers that the wood spire was half carried away by wind in 1781, and that it was repaired and the vane regilded in the same year. Since that date it has been removed altogether.

The first recorded presentation to ADVOWSON Grately Church, early in the episcopacy of Bishop Pontoise, was made by the king.<sup>36</sup> This, however, was probably only during a wardship, for the advowson belonged from an early date to the lords of the manor, with whom it continued for a considerable period.<sup>37</sup> Like the manor (q.v.) it suffered division into three parts among the heirs of Sir Henry Greene in the 16th century, being reunited at the sale to Lord Audley in 1577. In 1585 there was a dispute between Sir James Mervyn and John Moody about an intended sale of the advowson. Mervyn, who was seised of the manor only in conjunction with Lord Audley, was then patron.<sup>38</sup> It would appear, therefore, that about this date the manor and advowson became separated. Edward South of Swallowcliffe (co. Wilts.) and Richard South of Lockerley presented in 1625, Richard South of Salisbury in 1641 and Samuel South in 1699.<sup>39</sup> From 1731 to 1773 the Rev. Joshua Strother presented. His son George Strother had two daughters and co-heirs of whom Barbara married a Mr. Constable. Their son the Rev. John Constable was patron until 1864, when the living passed into the gift of the Rev. Francis Baron de Paravicini, who had married the daughter and heir of the Rev. William Dodson, Mr. Constable's wife's brother. His son the Rev. Frederick de Paravicini, formerly rector of Grately and now of Abbots Ann, is the present patron.<sup>40</sup>

There is a Baptist chapel in the parish.

The school was built in 1845 for 80 children.

In 1707 Edward Pyle by will gave CHARITIES to the poor for ever an annuity of 15s., issuing out of Drake's tenement on Pottery Common, to purchase coats and waistcoats of a green colour to be distributed on or about St. Luke's Day. The annuity is paid by the Earl of Portsmouth and given towards the purchase of a great-coat to some person chosen by the parish council.

In 1796 William Benson Earle left (a) 300 guineas, the yearly interest thereof (after deducting a guinea for the clerk for taking care of the flower beds over Dame Joanna Elton's grave in the churchyard) to be used in the purchase of food for the poor; and (b) 100 guineas, the interest to be used towards supporting the Sunday and day schools. The trust funds, which are held by the official trustees, now consist of (a) £374 1s. 3d. consols and (b) £124 13s. 9d. consols, producing yearly £9 7s. and £3 2s. 4d., applied respectively in the distribution of cheese and beef and to the Grately school.

KIMPTON

Chemuntune (xi cent.); Keminton (xii cent.); Kemeton, Cumpton (xiii cent.); Kumetone, Kumeton, Cumynton (xiv cent.).

Kimpton, which is bounded on the north by the Wiltshire parish of Ludgershall, covers an area of 2,795 acres, thus forming one of the most extensive parishes in the hundred. There are 1,825½ acres of arable land, 721½ acres of permanent grass and 154 acres of woods and plantations,<sup>1</sup> Kimpton Wood in the south-west and Littleton Copse in the east being the principal woodland. The highest land is on Kimpton Down, in the south-west corner of the parish, where the summit of Pickford Hill, on which there is a tumulus, is 456 ft. above the ordnance datum. From this point there is a gentle slope towards the north and east down to about 300 ft., with a subseand Littleton Farm is on the eastern boundary, close to Fyfield village. About a quarter of a mile south-west from Great Shoddessen excavations made by the Rev. G. H. Engleheart, F.S.A., towards the close of last century revealed a small building, probably a hut, of the Romano-British period.<sup>2</sup>

The high road from Devizes to Andover and the Midland and South-Western junction railway pass through the north-east of the parish.

A 13th-century extent of Littleton in the Gloucester cartulary gives many place-names, among which are 'Thursbrakedenelonde,' 'Fernfurlonge,' 'Oppethebitten,' 'Pikedelonde-juxta-Dounam,' 'Foxenhulle,' 'Willwelande,' 'Stallingforlonge,' 'Stomdene,' 'La Dounhalf,' 'Langethornesforlong,' 'Witehulle,' 'Mushulle,' 'Hellinglonde.'<sup>3</sup> The following places quent rise of 100 ft. in the extreme north. The soil is very light and the subsoil is chalk.<sup>2</sup> The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips.

Kimpton Lodge, a large brick gabled house built about 1835, stands in a park, the entrance to which is on the road from Fyfield to Shipton Bellinger. North of this park lies the village. The church stands back from the road to the south, and near it is a pretty gabled brick house with a fine yew hedge. The rectory, which was built in 1872, is to the north and beyond it is the school. Great and Little Shoddessen lie a mile to the north, are named in a deed relating to Shoddessen: 'Little Costord,' 'Hangers Close,' 'Periam.'<sup>5</sup>

KIMPTON was held by one Geoffrey MANORS under Hugh de Port at the time of the Domesday Survey, and had been held as an alod by Wenesi of the Confessor.<sup>6</sup> The Ports and their heirs, the St. Johns, continued as overlords, having two fees here,<sup>7</sup> which in 1349, after the death of Edmund St. John, were assigned, like so many neighbouring fees, to Sir Luke de Poynings and his wife Isabel, Edmund's elder sister and co-heir.<sup>8</sup> The manor was afterwards held of the burgesses of Andover.<sup>9</sup>

In 1167 Kimpton was held by a certain bastard, of whom nothing further is known.<sup>10</sup> In 1217 the king wrote to his uncle the Earl of Salisbury that Roger de Scures, having given surety that he would do homage without delay after the siege of Porchester Castle, was to have seisin of his land in Kimpton as he had it on the day when he withdrew from the service of King John.<sup>11</sup> Eve de Scures is mentioned in the Testa de Nevill as holding two fees here of Robert St. John,<sup>12</sup> and in 1349 John de Scures held the same amount of the heirs of Hugh St. John.<sup>13</sup>

The Scures, however, did not themselves hold in demesne. In the 13th century Hugh de Raumpenz held of Eve de Scures and the co-heirs of Adam Spinney held of Raumpenz by old enfeoffment.<sup>14</sup> The said co-heirs were the three daughters of Adam Spinney, Isabel wife of Alexander Hussey, Margery, who apparently married Richard de Dummer,<sup>15</sup> and Denise.<sup>16</sup> In 1256 Denise surrendered her share to Alexander and Isabel.<sup>17</sup> In 1306 Edmund Hussey, Alexander's son, disputed the right to present to the church with William de Dummer, who was probably the son and heir of Richard and Margery.<sup>18</sup> Ten years later John Hussey shared the vill with John de Wimbledon and William de Dummer.<sup>19</sup> In 1345 James Hussey granted manor and advowson to William de Edendon, clerk.<sup>20</sup> The real lord of the manor was, however, at this date Edmund Hussey, James having only a life interest in two-thirds, while Nicholas de Haywood and Joan his wife held the other third as the dower of Joan.<sup>21</sup> In the 'Aid' of the following year William de Edendon appears with Bernard Brocas, who had purchased John de Wimbledon's estate in 1338,<sup>22</sup> and Margaret Spircoc as his parcenaries,<sup>23</sup> and shortly after this John de Edendon presented to the church.<sup>24</sup> The manor subsequently appears to have passed to the Lisles, who acquired Thrupton (q.v.) about the same time. Elizabeth Lisle had a quarter of a fee here in 1431.<sup>25</sup> Thence it passed to John Rogers of Cannington (co. Somers.), who had married Margaret Lisle, one of the co-heirs of the Lisles of Wootton.<sup>26</sup> Sir Edward Rogers of Cannington<sup>27</sup> was dealing with the manor of Kimpton in 1551,<sup>28</sup> and his son, Sir George Rogers, died seised of it in 1582, leaving a son and heir Edward.<sup>29</sup> The latter sold the manor in 1591 to Robert Cook,<sup>30</sup> who died seised in 1601.<sup>31</sup> Richard son of Robert Cook died shortly afterwards, and in 1620 his sisters and heirs, Elizabeth wife of Henry Arthur, and Ann wife of Isaac Pennington, joined with their husbands in selling the manor to John Foyle.<sup>32</sup> The Foyles continued to hold in the male line<sup>33</sup> until the death of Mr. George Soley Foyle in 1839, leaving an only daughter, Mary Anne wife of the Rev. Charles Randolph. Mr. Charles Foyle Randolph, J.P., D.L., son of the Rev. Charles Randolph and Mary Anne Foyle, is now lord of the manor, and resides at Kimpton Lodge.

Azor held LITTLETON (known in modern times as the manor of LITTLETON AND SHODDESSEN) of Edward the Confessor as an alod. At Domesday it was one of the holdings of Hugh de Port,<sup>34</sup> and in 1096, on becoming a monk of Winchester, the great fief holder gave Littleton to the abbey of St. Peter, Gloucester.<sup>35</sup> This grant was confirmed by his son Henry,<sup>36</sup> and later by Adam de Port,<sup>37</sup> whose charter precedes in the cartulary, but was no doubt consequent on a command from Henry II forbidding him to vex the abbot in his possession.<sup>38</sup> The gift of Hugh de Port to Gloucester is also mentioned in the general confirmations given by King Stephen (1138),<sup>39</sup> Archbishop Theobald (1139-48)<sup>40</sup> and Henry II.<sup>41</sup> In 1280 the abbot was found to hold half a knight's fee of John St. John in Littleton.<sup>42</sup> In 1291 the abbot's temporalities in Littleton were valued at £10.<sup>43</sup> From an undated charter, probably of Abbot John de Felda (1243-63), it appears that the abbot held a court here, at which Henry de Reigate had to make suit twice in the year for the manor of Wallop Heathmanstreet, which he held at fee-farm of the abbey.<sup>44</sup> A very full list of tenures, rents and services in this manor has been gathered from the Gloucester cartulary.

week during the autumn (value in the whole 3s. 2½d.); to perform three bederipes in the autumn with two men subsisting at the lord's table (value 3d., such subsistence being deducted); to carry the lord's corn in the autumn (value 4s.); and if he did not reap or carry, then to thresh the lord's corn to the same value; to gather nuts for half a day (value ½d.): thus making the value of these services beyond the farm of five shillings, 12s. 2½d. The tenant of half a virgate of the same land was to plough for the lord twice in the year (value 2d.); he was also on those days to eat with the lord, and to give chirsæc according to his portion (value 19d.); to harrow (value 4½d.); to hoe (value 2½d.); to perform works relating to hay as if he had an entire virgate (value 2d.); to plant beans (value ½d.); to wash and shear the lord's sheep (value ½d.); to make a stack (value ½d.); to perform summage (value 1½d.); to mow, as for one virgate (value 3s. 2½d.); to perform three bederipes (value 3d.); to eat with the lord on those days, and to carry his corn in the autumn (value of such carriage 4s.), or to thresh to the same value; to collect nuts (value ½d.): sum total of the work, 10s. 3d.<sup>45</sup>

About the end of the 12th century<sup>46</sup> Richard, clerk of Ann, renounced his claim to the tithes of the demesne of Littleton, receiving from the monks half a mark yearly at Easter in recompense.<sup>47</sup> After the dissolution of the monastery Henry VIII founded the see of Gloucester, and among his gifts to the dean and chapter of the new cathedral were Littleton Manor and Littleton Copse.<sup>48</sup> This grant is dated 30 August 1541. The dean and chapter, however, did not long keep the manor. In 1545 they surrendered it to the king,<sup>49</sup> and it came soon afterwards into the hands of Sir John St. John of Lydiard Tregoze, who died in 1576, having left Littleton, by a will made two years earlier,<sup>50</sup> to his son and heir William St. John, who died seised thereof in 1609.<sup>51</sup> The male lines of the St. Johns of Lydiard Tregoze and Farley Chamberlayne (q.v.) came to an end on the death, unmarried, in 1699 of Oliver St. John, whose heir was his only sister Frances wife of Ellis Mews, who took the name of St. John on succeeding to the estates. Their son, Paulet St. John, was created a baronet in 1772 and was ancestor of the St. John-Mildmays, barts., now of Dogmersfield (q.v.). The manor, which began in the 17th century to be called the manor of Littleton and Shoddesden, descended in this line until 1795,<sup>52</sup> when Sir Henry Paulet St. John-Mildmay, third bart., sold three-quarters of it to John Pollen, created a baronet in the same year,<sup>53</sup> to whose great-grandson, Sir Richard Hungerford Pollen, fourth bart., it has descended. A quarter of the manor had become detached at some uncertain date. In 1779 it was the object of a fine between Thomas Day and John Pett and others<sup>54</sup>; and in 1825 between Robert Morrell and Richard Jordan, Phineas Pett, Ann Pett and Elizabeth Pett.<sup>55</sup> It must have subsequently become reunited to the main holding or have ceased to be manorial.

In 1086 Agemund held the manor of SHODDES-

DEN (Sotesdene, xi cent.; Shotesden, xiii cent.; Shadsdon, Shaddesden, xviii cent.) of the king, having also held it as an alod of Queen Edith.<sup>56</sup> In 1331 John de Bohun of Midhurst (co. Suss.) granted land here to the Prioress and convent of Easebourne,<sup>57</sup> who appear as overlords in the 16th century.<sup>58</sup>

Roger de Cormeilles, on whom Stephen Malory, clerk, and William Randolph settled land in Kimp-ton, Fyfield and West Shoddesden in 1340,<sup>59</sup> appears to have been lord of the manor; for licence to hear divine service within the manor of Shoddesden was granted once to himself and twice to Agnes his widow during the episcopacies of Orlton (1333-45)<sup>60</sup> and Edendon (1346-66).<sup>61</sup> In 1433 John Skillyng was seised of the manor of Shoddesden in fee simple.<sup>62</sup> He left a daughter and heir Elizabeth, who was the wife, first of John Wynnard, and secondly of Thomas Wayte.<sup>63</sup> John Wynnard and Elizabeth his wife conveyed the manor to John Wydeslade in 1465,<sup>64</sup> and in 1482 Thomas Wayte died seised jointly with his wife Elizabeth, who survived him. He was said to have held of John Lisle as of the manor of Kimp-ton, and left a brother and heir, William Wayte.<sup>65</sup> John Thornborough, however, died seised of the manor in 1511, holding of the Prioress of Easebourne.<sup>66</sup> His son, Robert Thornborough, died in 1522,<sup>67</sup> and was in turn succeeded by his son William, who died in 1535, having held the manor in reversion after the death of Anne, Robert Thornborough's widow, who had married Sir Anthony Windsor as her second husband.<sup>68</sup> In 1561 John son of William Thornborough sold the manor of Shoddesden to his brother-in-law Richard Kingsmill,<sup>69</sup> whose nephew William Kingsmill conveyed it in 1638 to Arthur Evelyn.<sup>70</sup> The next mention of the manor is not until 1705, when Dame Barbara Henley, relict of Sir Robert Henley, sold her life interest therein to her son John Henley of Abbots Wootton (co. Dors.),<sup>71</sup> who immediately sold the manor to Thomas Richmond alias Webb.<sup>72</sup> In 1720 John Richmond alias Webb and Anne his wife sold it to Edmund Stradwick,<sup>73</sup> and in 1756 Thomas Humphries and Frances his wife conveyed it to John Peachey, warranting him against the heirs of both.<sup>74</sup> It is probable that soon after this date this manor became merged in the manor of Littleton.

The church of ST. PETER AND CHURCH ST. PAUL consists of a continuous chancel and nave 73 ft. 2 in. long (of which some 27 ft. belong to the chancel) and from 14 ft. 5 in. to 15 ft. 2 in. wide, north transept 13 ft. 2 in. wide by 12 ft. 5 in. deep, south transept of like dimensions, south aisle 5 ft. 9 in. wide, with south porch, and west tower 9 ft. 9 in. by 10 ft. 4 in., all internal dimensions.

The building was originally a plain rectangular structure. The chancel dates from about 1220, and the small and apparently original north door seems to be of the same date. It is possible, however, that the nave may retain the walling of an earlier building which had a narrower chancel. The two transepts and the south arcade are all work of the 14th century; the details suggest that the north transept was added fairly early in the century, and that the south transept and aisle followed in the latter part of the century. The north-east window of the nave is a 15th-century insertion, and that further west is a late construction with a re-used 15th-century head. The south aisle was evidently rebuilt in the 18th century in accordance with the date 1702 which it bears. The tower was built in 1837.

The east window of the chancel has two ogee trefoiled lights with a quatrefoil above; it is all of modern stonework except the external outer order, which is a sunk quarter-round mould, and dates from c. 1320. Below the window is a length of contemporary scroll-moulded string course. In the eastern part of the north wall is the front of a tomb recess; it has a round arch with six cusps under a gabled head, the spandrels being trefoiled. There was, no doubt, a label to the gable, but this has now gone, and the recess has also been filled in to within 7 in. of the face; the jambs are of two hollow chamfers with broach stop bases sunk below the present floor level; it dates from the middle of the 14th century. The two north windows are set comparatively close together in the western half of the wall; the first is a 13th-century lancet, the second window is a low-side one without glass grooves, apparently a 14th-century insertion, and has a trefoiled head and widely splayed jambs with a wood lintel; its west jamb is pierced by a squint from the north transept, which has a low ogee trefoiled head on the west. In the south wall is a small late 14th-century piscina, with a two-centred trefoiled head under a gable with trefoiled spandrel; the jambs are of two hollow chamfers, and the details exactly like that of the tomb recess opposite. The first of the three south windows is a repaired two-light window of the same date, and doubtless all these alterations at the east of the 13th-century chancel belong to one time; the second window is a 13th-century lancet like that opposite, and the third is similar but with partly restored inner quoin. The south priest's doorway between the two latter is a 14th-century insertion, but the sharpness of its outside stonework suggests a later restoration; it is of a sunk quarter-round order with a scroll and bead label on round flower stops. The squint from the south transept opens into the west jamb of the third window, where it has a trefoiled head; part of the eastern jamb of the window is also cut away for the same purpose. There is no arch at the entrance to the chancel. That from the nave into the north transept or Shoddesden chapel has chamfered jambs with broach stops, now partly below the floor. The arch is of two wave-moulded orders dying on the jambs. The transept has a much restored north window of two ogee trefoiled lights with a quatrefoil above, under a two-centred arch. The east wall is unpierced, but has two original moulded image brackets, the south one of half-octagonal plan, and the north of square plan with a moulded face and flat sides, marking the site of an altar. The west window is a 14th-century (?) ogee-headed lancet with two small chamfered orders, now uncusped, but doubtless trefoiled originally. Below the north window is a blocked recess, perhaps originally like that in the south transept. It contains a plain marble altar tomb with indents for brasses, and above is a marble slab, crested and panelled, with the brasses of Robert Thornborough (vide infra).

The first of the two north windows of the nave is a square-headed one dating from the 15th century, with three cinquefoiled lights; the jambs outside are moulded with an ogee and wide hollow mould, and it has a moulded label; the edges inside have a double ogee mould which also passes around the head. The other window has three lights with cinquefoiled heads, old work re-used; the jambs are of two hollow chamfers outside, inside they are roughly moulded in plaster and the window has no label. Between the windows is a blocked doorway with a pointed head of a single chamfered order, probably 13th-century work. The south arcade has four bays; the pillars are octagonal, but that between the first and second bays is wider than the rest, to range with the transept; all the chamfered sides are stopped out with broach stops 1 ft. 11 in. above the floor excepting in the west respond, and have chamfered plinths below cut away in places. The east respond has an additional chamfered plinth. The arches are all two centred and of two chamfered orders dying on the jambs and pillars without capitals or any break at the springing.

In the south wall of the south transept is a piscina with a trefoiled ogee head and of a single chamfered order with broach stops above the sill; the sill has a circular basin, and half-way up is a shelf. The south window has two trefoiled ogee-headed lights and a quatrefoil over in a two-centred head with moulded labels inside and out, the latter apparently of modern repair. Below the window are the remains of a cinquefoiled ogee-headed tomb recess; its outer foils have been removed and it is partly filled in against either jamb. Its back is pierced by a low trefoiled light; this window had been filled in, and was discovered at a recent restoration. In the east wall are two image brackets; the southern one has been hacked away underneath, and had a chamfered quarter round below; the other seems a modern copy of it.

The south aisle has two small south windows. The first is a single trefoiled ogee light under a square head with pierced and cusped spandrels. Its lintel inside is plastered; it is evidently an 18th-century copy of a 14th-century window done when the wall was rebuilt. The south doorway is a plain one with chamfered jambs and segmental arch, probably of 18th-century date. The second window has a plain ogee-headed light and a plaster lintel inside; it is contemporary with a doorway. A panel outside, east of the porch, bears the date 1702 and the churchwardens' names.

The tower dates from 1837 and is built of flint and brick; the arch opening into it from the nave is a pointed one of cement. It has two stages with brick buttresses. The west window is of brick with a wood frame and a pair of brick lancet windows pierce each wall of the bell chamber.

The roof of the chancel is gabled and panelled below in oak; it is all modern except the moulded tie-beam to the middle truss, which has a carved foliage boss in the middle. The gabled nave roof is also modern; it is open timbered below. Both transepts are oak panelled below, and the aisle has a lean-to roof, all being modern.

The altar table dates from the late 16th century, and has heavy carved baluster legs and good rails.

The font is modern, octagonal in plan. The other furniture is also modern. The only old monuments are those in the north transept. The upper one has on a marble panel with cresting over the following inscription on brass, 'Off your charite pray for the soule of Robert Thornborough Esquyer whos body here restyth and dyed the xii day of May in the yere of O<sup>r</sup> lord God m<sup>c</sup>xxii and for ye soul of Alys and Anne his wyves & all there children o whos soul ihu have mercy.' Above the inscription are the brass figures of Robert Thornborough and his wives, the first with two children behind her and the other with seven. He is in armour, and above him is inlaid a cross with the five wounds; from his mouth issues the prayer 'Crux Xpi libera me'; the wives are dressed alike in kennel head-dresses with belts fastened by clasps in the form of three roses. The scrolls from their mouths are inscribed 'Crux Xpi salva me' and 'Crux Xpi defende me' respectively. Above the figures are the indents of three shields.

Below this slab is a small altar tomb half buried in the wall, it is 4 ft. 8 in. long and projects 1 ft.

4 in.; the top slab has a moulded edge and sunk in it are the indents of two figures, and an inscription, with two shields at the angles. The modern glass in the window above has the arms of Robert Thornborough, Ermine a fret and a chief gules, and of Henry Merceron, Azure two cheverons between two molets in the chief and a crescent in the foot all argent.

There are three bells: the treble by Warner, 1905; the second by Robert Wells of Aldbourne, 1764; and the tenor by William Purdue of Salisbury, 1662.

The plate consists of a silver-gilt chalice, a most valuable example of early silver work, possibly belonging to the late 15th century, and a silver paten and flagon of 1688.

The first book of the registers contains baptisms from 1593 to 1659, marriages 1593 to 1656, and burials from 1593 to 1652; the second continues all three to 1753; the third has baptisms and burials to 1812 and marriages to 1754; the fourth has marriages from 1754 to 1797; and the fifth continues them to 1812.

Adam Spinney, lord of Kimpton, ADVOWSON is said to have presented to the church of Kimpton in the reign of King John.<sup>75</sup> In 1306 William de Dummer and his wife Maud claimed the advowson against Edmund Hussey, but presumably without success,<sup>76</sup> and it continued to descend with the manor until 1886,<sup>77</sup> when it was acquired from Mr. Charles Foyle Randolph by Mr. Henry Merceron. Mr. Francis Henry Merceron of Tangley now holds it.

In 1291 the church was assessed at £10, with a pension of 5s. and another of 2 lb. of wax valued at 8d.<sup>78</sup> In 1535 the value, beyond reprises, was £25 12s. 9d.<sup>79</sup>

The school was built in 1873 and enlarged in 1895 for 75 children.

In 1795 Gorges Foyle, by a codicil CHARITIES to his will, left £100, the interest to be applied for the relief of the poor, invested in £133 11s. 5d. consols.

In 1839 George Soley Foyle, by will proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury 5 December, left £200 for the use of the poor, invested in £220 1s. 7d. consols.

The Rev. Edward Foyle by will, date not ascertained, left a legacy for the poor, represented by £135 18s. 2d. consols.

The several sums of stock are held by the official trustees. The yearly income amounting to £12 4s. 4d. is applied wholly in the distribution of coal.

The National Schools are entitled to a share of the charity of Mrs. Sophia Sheppard. (See under Fyfield.)

the Husseys, a rather puzzling record of a conveyance of a messuage, land and rent in Kimpton and Shoddesden, and the advowson of Kimpton, by Hugh Spinney to William de Midgham and Maud his wife (Feet of F. Hants, Hil. 9 Edw. II). It is possible that the latter are the same a William de Dummer and Maud his wife.

KIMPTON CHURCH : THE CHANCEL

KNIGHTS ENHAM

Etham (xi cent.); Enham Knights, Enham militis (xiii cent.); Ennam militis (xiv cent.); Enam (xv cent.).

Knights Enham is a parish bounded on all sides by Andover. There are three detached portions, all lying eastwards of the main parish. The total area is 794 acres. The soil is chiefly light loam and gravel, the subsoil is chalk,<sup>1</sup> and there are several disused chalk-pits. Bilgrove Copse and Little Bilgrove Copse are the principal woodlands. The name occurs in the 14th century.<sup>2</sup> Nearly the whole of the land is arable. The chief crops produced are wheat, barley, oats, sainfoin and turnips.

Hungerford Lane, which follows closely the site of the Roman road from Cirencester to Winchester, cuts through the south-eastern extremity of the parish. This is crossed at right angles by the road from Andover to Newbury, which passes through the east of the parish and skirts Enham Park.

The highest part of the parish is in the north and stands about 335 ft. above ordnance datum, the southern part of the parish, where rises a tributary of the Anton, being low and swampy.

Enham Place the seat of Mrs. Earle is an entirely modern house lying to the north of the village, which is on the eastern border of the parish, and situated in a park of 70 acres, partly in Knights Enham and partly in Andover.

At the time of Domesday ENHAM MANOR was divided into two equal holdings, each assessed at a hide and a half and held respectively by Sariz and Alsi Berchenistre.<sup>3</sup> It is difficult to say whether both these entries should be assigned to KNIGHTS ENHAM or one to King's Enham in Andover, but it is probable that they both refer to Knights Enham, as two centuries after Domesday there were still two manorial holdings of equal value in the parish. At the beginning of the 13th century the overlordship belonged to Avice de Columbers.<sup>4</sup> From her it descended to Matthew de Columbers, who died in 1273 seised of a knight's fee and a half in Enham and Crux Easton, held of the king in chief.<sup>5</sup> He was succeeded in his estates by his brother, Michael de Columbers, whose daughter and heir Nichola brought them by marriage to the Lises of the Isle of Wight.<sup>6</sup> In 1315 the manor of Enham was held of John de Lisle by service of doing suit at Chute court,<sup>7</sup> and in 1346 of Bartholomew de Lisle.<sup>8</sup> At the end of the 15th century it was said, like so many neighbouring manors, to be held of the freemen of Andover by fealty.<sup>9</sup>

In 1167 and again in 1168 Geoffrey the son of Morin paid half a mark into the treasury for Enham,<sup>10</sup> and he was probably at the time holding one of the two Domesday estates. Ralph Sansaver was one of the joint holders of the vill at the beginning of the 13th century, holding under Avice de Columbers,<sup>11</sup> and it is probable that he had obtained his estate by his marriage with the niece and heir of Richard Morin.<sup>12</sup> His fellow holder was William de Torney.<sup>13</sup> In the Assize Roll of 1280 Hugh Sansaver and Roger de Calstone, lord of Calstone (co. Wilts.), are named as holding half a fee in Enham of Matthew de Columbers.<sup>14</sup> In the same year Hugh Sansaver granted all his manor of Enham, with its appurtenances and his lands, tenements and rents in that manor and in the town of Andover, to Simon Torney, who was probably a descendant of the Testa de Nevill holder, at a rent of £10,<sup>15</sup> of which he was in receipt at his death in 1283.<sup>16</sup> Roger de Calstone died a few years later in receipt of rent for his manor from Robert Burnell, Bishop of Bath and Wells and Chancellor of England, who held it in fee.<sup>17</sup> At his death in 1292 the bishop was found to have held the manor of the heirs of Roger de Calstone,<sup>18</sup> but his nephew and heir Philip Burnell, who died a year later, was said to have held a moiety from Roger son of Roger de Calstone, and a moiety from Sir Ralph Sansaver, son of Hugh.<sup>19</sup> If this is a true finding the land of Simon de Torney must have passed by some means to the Burnells, who united the two parts into one manor. After this the manor was held directly of the chief lords, and no further mention is found of the Sansavers; but in 1335 Roger de Calstone quitclaimed a rent of £10 to John de Handlo,<sup>20</sup> then lord of the manor, who, a few years later, granted an equivalent rent to Queen's College, Oxford (see advowson). Edward son and heir of Philip Burnell died seised of the manor about 1315,<sup>21</sup> his heir being his sister Maud, widow of John Lovel second Lord Lovel of Titchmarsh. By 1316 she had become the wife of John de Handlo, who held Knights Enham on his wife's behalf.<sup>22</sup> Handlo had the manor during his life; and in 1322 a commission of oyer and terminer was granted on his complaint that certain persons had broken into it and driven away his horses, cattle and sheep.<sup>23</sup> He outlived his wife, and died in 1346, when the manor remained to her son John Lovel, third Lord Lovel.<sup>24</sup> He died in 1347, after demising the manor for life to his cousin Sir Ralph Lovel.<sup>25</sup> On the death of the latter in 1362<sup>26</sup> the king granted the manor, at a yearly rent of £6, to Peter de Bridges, to hold during the minority of the heir John fifth Lord Lovel,<sup>27</sup> who came of age in the following year, and in 1389-90 granted the manor to Sir John Sandys and Joan his wife.<sup>28</sup> Walter Sandys is named in 1428 as holding the half-fee which had formerly belonged to John Lovel.<sup>29</sup> His grandson, Sir William Sandys, died seised of the manor jointly with his wife in 1496, before which date it had been entailed on them and their heirs.<sup>30</sup> His descendants, the Lords Sandys of the Vyne, continued to hold it until the middle of the 17th century.<sup>31</sup> From that time evidence fails completely, but the manorial rights seem afterwards to have lapsed. At various dates in the latter half of the following century the Enham estate was acquired by George Dewar of St. Christopher (W.I.), who died in 1794,<sup>32</sup> and was succeeded by his son David Dewar. His descendants are still lords of the manor of Hurstbourne Tarrant (q.v.), but Enham was sold in 1817 by David Albemarle Bertie Dewar,<sup>33</sup> subsequently becoming the property of Henry Earle. Mr. Earle's eldest son, Lieutenant-Colonel William Henry Earle, died unmarried in 1887, and the estate came to his brother Thomas Hughes Earle, since whose death in 1891 it has been held by his widow, Mrs. Earle.

There was a mill at Knights Enham divided equally between the two Domesday holders, Alsi Berchenistre and Sariz, each moiety being worth 5s.<sup>34</sup> Later there appear to have been two mills, one of which Nicholas son of William Siffride conveyed in 1300 to William Siffride to hold for life at the rent of a rose, with reversion to Nicholas and his heirs.<sup>35</sup> It was doubtless the same mill his right in which John Nugl son and heir of William Nugl, son of Joan late wife of Geoffrey Nugl, daughter and heir of John Siffride, formerly of Andover, remitted to Roland Byris the reeve in 1429-30.<sup>36</sup> The other was granted by John de Handlo with the advowson to Queen's College, Oxford, in 1345.<sup>37</sup> There is now no mill in the parish.

The church of ST. MICHAEL AND CHURCH ALL ANGELS consists of a chancel 14 ft. 5 in. wide by 14 ft. long, nave 34 ft. 1 in. by 14 ft. 8 in., small north vestry and south porch. Externally the walls of nave and chancel are continuous. Some pieces of 12th-century masonry, now in the north window of the vestry, point to the existence of a church here at that time, and the walls of the nave may be of that date. In the 13th century a south aisle was built, and perhaps at the same time a smaller 12th-century chancel gave way to that now existing, which is practically equal in width to the nave. The aisle has since been destroyed, probably at some time in the 17th century, and the south porch may be of that date.

The east window has three modern lancets under a two-centred label; in the north wall of the chancel is a small modern credence recess; and probably a small piscina exists behind the plaster in the south wall. A modern doorway gives entrance to the chancel through the south wall; over it is the upper part of a 13th-century lancet window with widely splayed inner jambs. A thin wall in which is set a plain 17th-century wood screen of three bays divides the nave from the chancel. The screen has a moulded cornice at half height, and three arched openings above, that in the middle being taller than the others. The timbers have plain ovolo moulded angles. The north-east window of the nave is a 13th-century lancet with widely splayed inner jambs and two-centred rear arch. The second window has a 15th-century head of two trefoiled lights fitted to modern jambs and sill; the head was discovered among a pile of rejected stones and placed here in the stead of a wood-framed window which was moved to the south-east of the nave. A small north doorway west of this window is old, perhaps of 13th-century date; it has chamfered jambs and two-centred arch and straight pointed rear arch; in the jambs are the holes for the former wood draw-bar. It now opens to a modern vestry, and west of it is a modern lancet window.

Buried in the south wall of the nave is the arcade of two bays to the former aisle. It has an octagonal pillar and semi-octagonal responds; the capitals are moulded and have hollow-chamfered abaci; the arches are two-centred and of two chamfered orders. Most of the arcade can be traced outside the church, but only the west respond and the upper half of the west arch are exposed inside. Of the three windows in the south wall, the first and third are square openings with wood frames of two lights each, while the middle one is of stone with plain square heads of 17th-century date. The south doorway is contemporary with it. It has a chamfered elliptical head.

The west wall is unpierced, but set low inside is a recess having the head of a cinquefoiled 15th-century light and containing a modern round basin with a drain.

Over the north window of the vestry is an early-looking human head in Binstead stone, which may have been part of a rood; it may be 12th-century work or earlier, but the roughness of the detail makes an accurate dating a matter of doubt.

The walls outside are for the most part covered with plaster, and at the angles are modern diagonal brick buttresses. The roofs are covered with tiles, and the ceilings are flat and of plaster. Over the west end of the nave is a timber bell-turret with boarded sides and leaded pyramid roof. In it hangs a bell by Thomas Mears, 1837.

The font is modern, with a shallow bowl carved with an imitation of 12th-century detail, and stands near the south door.

The altar table is painted and of 18th-century workmanship; all the other fittings are entirely modern.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1649 given by David Kingsmill in 1654, a silver paten given by Thomas Braithwait, rector, in 1655, and a silver flagon of 1872.

The only old volume of the registers contains baptisms, marriages and burials mixed from 1683 to 1812. There is also a vestry book and poor book dating from 1801.

The church of Enham is first ADVOWSON found mentioned in 1241, when one John was parson.<sup>38</sup> In 1292 the advowson belonged to Roger de Calstone, the infant son and heir of Roger de Calstone.<sup>39</sup> In 1335 Roger gave up the advowson to the lord of the manor, John de Handlo.<sup>40</sup> John de Handlo presented twice,<sup>41</sup> but in May 1341 had a licence to alienate it in mortmain, together with a messuage, a mill, 20 acres of land, 10 acres of meadow and £10 rent, which he held of John Lovel under Bartholomew de Lisle, to the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury, towards the sustenance of their vicars, so that they might appropriate the church; provided that they should find four of the said vicars to celebrate divine service daily in the cathedral for the donor's good estate in life, for his soul after death, and for the souls of Maud his wife, Thomas Burnell their son, and all their ancestors, and of Edward II and Hugh le Despenser the elder, and should cause all the vicars to distribute to the poor yearly, on his anniversary, 20s. 10d. out of the messuage, mill, land, meadow and rent.<sup>42</sup> Before this licence took effect, however, Queen Philippa interfered on behalf of her new foundation at Oxford, and John de Handlo consequently transferred his gift to Queen's College,<sup>43</sup> to which the advowson of Knights Enham belonged until 1871,<sup>44</sup> when this and four other livings in the diocese of Winchester were given to the Bishop of Winchester, the present patron, in exchange for the rectory of Crawley with the chapelry of Hunton.<sup>45</sup>

In 1878 the neighbouring vicarage of Smannell in Andover was united with Knights Enham.<sup>46</sup>

In 1794 David Dewar, by will CHARITIES proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, gave £25 a year for ever as a teacher's salary for the education of fifteen boys and ten girls of Enham, Little London and Woodhouse, and also 30s. a year for pens, ink and paper for the same purpose. The testator also gave in like manner for the poor of the same places £25 a year, to be given them in meat, drink and clothing quarterly. The trust fund consists of £1,716 13s. 4d. consols in court in a cause of Dewar v. Maitland and others, of which £883 6s. 8d. consols stand to the 'teacher's salary account,' and £833 6s. 8d. like stock to the 'poor account.' The income of the former is paid to the school at Smannell and the income of the latter is duly applied by the rector.

In 1887 Lieutenant-Colonel William Henry Earle by will, proved 4 June 1887, bequeathed a legacy, represented by £980 6s. 1d. consols, with the official trustees, the dividends, which amount to £24 10s., to be distributed in fuel and clothing to the poor of Knights Enham, Little London, Woodhouse and Smannell.

MONXTON

Anne (xi cent.); Anna de Becco, Anne de Bec, Anna Bek (xiii, xiv cent.); Munestagne (xiv cent.); Monkestone, Moncston (xv cent.); Monkeston, Mounkeston (xvii cent.); Monkston (xviii cent.).

Monxton is a long, narrow parish bounded on the north by Weyhill and on the south by Over Wallop. The height above the sea level averages from 250 ft. to 300 ft., the highest point in the parish being on the southern boundary, where an altitude of 346 ft. is attained. The soil is partly light gravel, partly marl and partly chalk, and the subsoil is chalk,<sup>1</sup> and there are several disused pits. The principal crops are wheat, barley, oats, sainfoin and clover. The area of the parish is 1,156 acres, comprising 866½ acres of arable land, 162 acres of permanent grass and 38 acres of woods and plantations,<sup>2</sup> the most considerable woodland being Monxton Oakcuts in the south of the parish.

The village itself lies on both sides of Pillhill Brook and is contiguous with Sarson in Ampport.

The Andover junction and Southampton branch and the Cheltenham branch of the London and South Western Railway both pass through the parish, the nearest station being Weyhill, a mile and a half distant on the former.

Prospect is a small hamlet lying 2 miles to the south of the village.

In 1806 600 acres were inclosed in the parish.<sup>3</sup>

MONXTON has been identified with MANOR the 'Anne' of Domesday Book which the king held in demesne, and Ulveve had held as an alod of the Confessor.<sup>4</sup> The manor was the advowson. At this date it belonged to Roger de Calstone, also a minor.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

given to the Norman abbey of Bec Hellouin by Hugh de Grandmesnil,<sup>5</sup> as appears from an inspeximus dated 1228 of a confirmation charter of Henry II.<sup>6</sup> When called to account in 1281 for exercising the privileges of view of frankpledge, gallows, tumbrel, and assize of bread and ale without licence, the abbot claimed not only those rights on the manor of Ann de Bec (Monxton), but also sac and soc, tol and theam, infangentheof and all royal liberties and customs as given to the abbey by the charter of Henry II.<sup>7</sup> The chief English cell of Bec was Ogbourne Priory (co. Wilts.) founded on land given in 1149 by Maud de Wallingford.<sup>8</sup> To this house Monxton was attached until 1404,<sup>9</sup> when, since the lands of alien priories were then in the king's hands, Henry IV granted all the possessions of Ogbourne to his son John of Lancaster, constable of England (afterwards Duke of Bedford), Thomas Longley, clerk, and William, prior of the house, to hold during the war with France, rent free for the term of John's life.<sup>10</sup> Ten years later the alien priories were dissolved, and in 1435 the great Duke of Bedford died seized of these premises, among them Monxton, which descended to Henry VI as his heir.<sup>11</sup> In the following year Henry VI granted Combe and Monxton for life to Ralph le Sage, lord of Saint Pierre and king's councillor, in lieu of a former grant of £40 a year and in consideration of his services to the king and his father.<sup>12</sup> Ralph le Sage died in 1437, and in November of that year the manors were granted to William Erard, master in theology, the king's chaplain, and to John de Rinel, the king's clerk and secretary. John de Rinel was to hold for life; William Erard until he was otherwise provided for, taking £20 of the yearly revenues, whereof John was to have the balance.<sup>13</sup> This gift was in reward of long service whereby William had lost his benefices and patrimony and John his inheritance and possessions.<sup>14</sup> In July 1439 Erard was dead and Rinel sought and obtained a ratification of the grant.<sup>15</sup> Three months later a commission was sent to inquire into the wastes and stripments which had occurred in the time of Ralph le Sage,<sup>16</sup> and in 1441 the reversion of Monxton was included in the endowment of the Royal College of the Blessed Mary and St. Nicholas at Cambridge,<sup>17</sup> now known as King's College, the provost and fellows of which are the present lords of the manor.

There was a mill at Monxton in 1086<sup>18</sup> worth 7s. 6d. In 1628 a water-mill there which had belonged to Sir John Philpot, a recusant, and was then in the possession of William Baldwyn, was granted to Edward Barnes for forty-one years.<sup>19</sup> There is now a water-mill worked by Pillhill Brook.

The church of ST. MARY THE CHURCH VIRGIN has a chancel 19 ft. 6 in. by 12 ft.

3 in. with a vestry and organ to the north of it, a nave 44 ft. 6 in. by 20 ft. and a south porch. It was rebuilt in 1854 in flint and stone, the only part of the former building preserved being the 12th-century capitals of the chancel arch and perhaps a few other stones belonging to it. These capitals are square with small scallops on each face and small volutes at the corners; the abaci are grooved and hollow-chamfered. The responds below are half-round. The arch is a pointed one, all modern excepting the outer order on the east face, which is hollow-chamfered and has been retooled. The chancel is lighted by a three-light east window and two in the south wall, the eastern one of two lights and the other a single light. A doorway in the north wall gives entrance to the vestry and next it is an arch to the organ chamber, into which is a small opening from the east of the nave.

The nave has two two-light traceried windows a side, a single light to the south-west and another single light in the west wall. The entrance is in the south wall and has a wooden porch. A wood bell-turret is supported at the west end on an arch between two buttresses; it has oak shingled sides with traceried openings to the bell-chamber; above it is a small octagonal spire rising from a square roof and covered with oak shingles. The roofs of nave and chancel are tiled.

All the furniture is of modern date.

In the floor of the nave partly hidden by the pews are two brasses. One has the small figure of a lady in Elizabethan dress in a kneeling position with a man, also kneeling, behind her. The inscription runs:—'Here lyeth the body of Alice Swayne, mother unto Arthur Swayne, whose soule ascended into eternal joye the Xth daye of Januarye an<sup>o</sup> 1599 aged LXXXVIII yer<sup>s</sup>'; below this is the verse, 'Christe is to mee as life on earth, And death to me as gayne, Because I trust to him alone Salvation to obtayne.' The other brass is an inscription in Latin to Richard Pore, grandson of Adam Roberts, rector of this church, died 1606. There are also other grave-stones of later date.

The churchyard is small. The church is set back from the road and the entrance path to it has been inclosed in modern times in the garden of the private house next to the church.

There are two bells, one inscribed T. W. FRANCIS FOSTER 1669 RICHARD WALE CHURCHWARDEN, and the other by R. Wells of 'Aubourn,' 1783, and with the churchwardens' names.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten cover of uncertain date, a silver paten and flagon of 1865 and 1868 respectively, a pewter flagon given by Robert Hatchet, churchwarden, in 1682 and two pewter alms plates.

The first book of the registers contains mixed entries from 1716 to 1812, the marriages stopping at 1754, and the second book has the marriages from 1755 to 1811.

Monxton Church, though not ADVOWSON mentioned in the early grants, appears to have always followed the descent of the manor, and to have been in the patronage of the English representative of the Abbot of Bec,<sup>20</sup> except on those frequent occasions when the alien houses were in the hands of the king.<sup>21</sup> Again, the advowson is not specified in the grant to King's College, Cambridge, in 1441. However, the college was presenting early in Waynflete's episcopacy of Winchester (1447-86),<sup>22</sup> and still has the patronage.

Churches like Monxton, in the gift of a Norman house, were always likely to be served by a foreigner; and the lot of the Frenchman resident in England in the 14th century was a precarious one. An instance of this fact occurred in 1337, when the sheriff was ordered to deliver his church, its lands and possessions, goods and chattels, to Robert Swef or Swoef, rector of Monxton, whose property, as a subject of the French king, had been seized. The letter further states that the king had compassion on Robert's estate, who had remained for thirty years and more in his benefice, which was not worth more than 10 marks.<sup>23</sup> In point of fact Swoef had not been in his benefice for thirty years, having been instituted in 1317.<sup>24</sup>

There are no endowed charities in this parish.

PENTON MEWSEY

Penitone (xi cent.); Penintona (xii cent.); Penyton Meysi, Penitune Meysi (xiii cent.); Penyngton Meysi (xiv cent.); Pennington Mewsey (xvii cent.).

The total area of the parish of Penton Mewsey is 1,059 acres, of which 822 acres are arable, 175 acres permanent grass and 46 acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is light, the subsoil chalk, and there are several chalk-pits.<sup>2</sup> The principal crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips. The height of the parish above sea level averages about 250 ft., and rarely reaches more than 300 ft. The following description of the place is by the Rev. R. H. Clutterbuck, F.S.A., who was rector here from 1890 until his death in 1896, and made useful contributions to the history of the neighbourhood:—

'Penton Mewsey is built along the bottom of a little tongue-shaped valley running nearly north and south, the slopes of which are much sharper when facing to the west than to the east. This valley is stopped at its southern end by the line of hill which projects into the basin of the Anton, which is best known from the fair held on its crest at Weyhill. At the foot of this line of hills lies the course of the little stream, a tributary of the Anton, which though now generally dry at Penton makes itself conspicuous at the "Perills" at Charlton and joins the other branch of the river in the water-meadows at Enham Knights. A small pond, never dry, but to which cling traditions of occasional disagreeable behaviour, marks the spring, and as a general rule keeps to itself the representative character, as if it personified the stream which doubtless attracted the Saxon landholders to its banks.'<sup>3</sup>

Penton Lodge, the seat of the lord of the manor, Major Francis Richard Hugh Seymour Sutton, J.P., lies to the south-east of the village in a park of 70 acres. In the park is a tumulus, and there is another in the extreme south of the parish.

A road, known at various stages as Chalkcroft Lane, Harroway Lane and Short Lane, runs due north and south and forms the village street, crossing at right angles the road from Weyhill to Charlton, which skirts the south side of Penton Park, and meeting the high road from Andover to Devizes.

The manor of PENTON MEWSEY, MANOR which before the Conquest had been held by Osmund as an alod of King Edward, was at the time of the Domesday Survey in the possession of Turald, who held of Roger de Montgomery Earl of Shrewsbury.<sup>7</sup> Like the estate in Houghton, afterwards known as Houghton Drayton, which in 1086 was held by the same Turald of the Earl of Shrewsbury,<sup>8</sup> Penton Mewsey subsequently formed parcel of the honour of Gloucester. Thus in the Testa de Nevill Robert de Meysey is entered as holding half a knight's fee there of that honour.<sup>9</sup> Again, after the death of Robert de Meysey his lands in Penton were at first taken into the hands of the king,<sup>10</sup> who was at that time custodian of the lands of Gilbert de Clare, late Earl of Gloucester,<sup>11</sup> but were in 1233 restored to his nephew and namesake Robert de Meysey, of whom he had held them.<sup>12</sup> The Assize Roll of 1280 confirms the evidence of the Testa de Nevill,<sup>13</sup> and at the death of Gilbert de Clare seventh Earl of Gloucester in 1295 Richard de Meysey held of him a fee in 'Peninton by Andever.'<sup>14</sup>

The overlordship continued with the Earls of Gloucester and Hertford and their descendants, the Earls of Stafford and the Dukes of Buckingham, until the latter part of the 15th century, when the right fell into abeyance.<sup>15</sup>

The fee was held by the Meyseys of the honour of Gloucester until the end of the 13th century,<sup>16</sup>

when it passed to the baronial family of St. Maur, by reason, doubtless, of the marriage of Nicholas de St. Maur, who died in 1316, with Eve de Meysey, an heiress.<sup>17</sup> The manor was held of the heirs of this house at first as intermediate lords, and afterwards as overlords, as late as 1610.<sup>18</sup>

Subinfeudation appears to have taken place at an early date. The Robert who held Penton in 1167<sup>19</sup> was perhaps a Meysey, and from the Close Roll of 1233 it appears that at that time Robert de Meysey was holding of his nephew and namesake. Who was his immediate successor is uncertain, but the estate appears split up among various owners shortly after this date.

In 1256 Roger de Leyston and Nichola his wife granted a virgate and 10 acres of land in Penton Mewsey to Henry de Harnhill and Joan his wife,<sup>20</sup> who may have been the Lady Joan of Harnhill whom Walter le Munck calles 'his lady' in an undated charter.<sup>21</sup> Three years later the same Roger and Nichola conveyed to Walter le Gras and Agnes the eighth part of a knight's fee in Penton Mewsey. To this transaction Robert de Meysey was a witness.<sup>22</sup> In 1274 Walter le Gras granted John Hundeshayward and Maud his wife a messuage and pasture land formerly held from Lady Maud de Seyntebeide.<sup>23</sup> The subsequent history of this estate has not been ascertained, nor is it clear who was Lady de Seyntebeide, though she may have been the wife of one of the Meyseys remarried. It seems probable, however, that this holding came into the possession of Robert de Harnhill, who was holding part of the vill in 1316.<sup>24</sup>

In 1278 Robert Durdant granted to Thomas le Rychet (le Riche) of Andover and Alice his wife the daughter of Robert certain lands and tenements with the advowson.<sup>25</sup> This was not the whole of the Durdants' holding in Penton Mewsey, for in 1293 Nicholas Durdant died seised of land there held of the fee of Robert de Meysey.<sup>26</sup> In 1316 a part of the vill was held by Alice, late the wife of Thomas le Riche,<sup>27</sup> and six years later Thomas le Riche granted his estate in Penton Mewsey to Henry de Harnhill for life.<sup>28</sup> This must at some time have been made an absolute sale, for the Riches appear no more as holding land here and the Harnhills were evidently acquiring all the land held of the Meysey fee.<sup>29</sup> In 1323 Robert de Harnhill was returned as having died seised of a messuage, garden and curtilage in Penton Mewsey with the advowson, rents of assize and perquisites of court,<sup>30</sup> and twenty years later his son Henry de Harnhill by a fine with Geoffrey de Weston, parson of Harnhill, settled the manor and advowson on himself, with remainder to John de Wynton and Joan his wife, and the heirs of her body, with remainder in default to Sir John de Stonor and the heirs male of his body.<sup>31</sup> Sir John de Stonor was the son of Sir Richard de Stonor, who had married Margaret daughter and heir of Sir John de Harnhill.<sup>32</sup> Henry de Harnhill must have died very soon after making this settlement, for in 1346 John de Wynton was, with Richard Peverell, returned as holding Robert de Harnhill's half-fee.<sup>33</sup> Edmund de Stonor son of Sir John<sup>34</sup> was lord of the manor in 1373,<sup>35</sup> and his son John<sup>36</sup> died seised thereof in 1383,<sup>37</sup> being succeeded by his brother, Sir Ralph Stonor, who died seised in 1395.<sup>38</sup> Gilbert the son and heir of Sir Ralph apparently died young without issue and was succeeded by his brother Thomas, who enfeoffed Thomas Chaucer of Ewelme (co. Oxon.) and others of the manor,<sup>39</sup> and died in 1430.<sup>40</sup> This Thomas Chaucer, who held a quarter of a fee in Penton Mewsey in 1431,<sup>41</sup> in the following year with John Golafre, John Warefelde and Thomas Bardsley granted the manor to Alice widow of Thomas Stonor.<sup>42</sup> The Stonors Stonore, 1 Oct. 47 Edw. III.' A little while before this a small estate which had not been acquired by the Harnhills came to the Stonors. In 1363 Robert Brous was found to have been seised of a tenement in Penton Mewsey called 'Le Hangere' (Inq. p.m. 37 Edw. III, no. 15). The next year John Mathew and his wife quitclaimed to John Cordray, clerk, a toft, land, meadow, wood and 12d. rent there (Feet of F. Hants, East. 38 Edw. III), and in 1367 Cordray granted to Edmund Stonor these premises together with the advowson and whatever lands and tenements had lately belonged to Walter Brous or John Mathew and Alice his wife (Anct. appear to have made this the chief of their Hampshire manors, for in a grant of Shipton Bellinger, dated in 1504, the latter is said to be held of Thomas Stonor as of his manor of Penton Mewsey.<sup>43</sup> Sir William Stonor, grandson of Thomas, died seised of the manor in 1494.<sup>44</sup> His mother Joan died shortly afterwards.<sup>45</sup> The death, in his infancy and childless, of John Stonor, Sir William's son and heir, led to dissensions. The real heir was Anne Stonor, only daughter of Sir William and wife of Adrian Fortescue; but Thomas Stonor, brother of Sir William, claimed certain estates by virtue of an alleged settlement in tail male. In the statute by which the dispute was brought to a close<sup>46</sup> there is no mention of Penton Mewsey, but in an undated Chancery bill Sir Adrian Fortescue and his wife are found claiming evidences concerning the manor of Penton Mewsey and other premises which had been entrusted to Thomas Hobbes, warden of All Souls' College, by Sir William Stonor.<sup>47</sup> In 1536, however, all rights were quitclaimed to Sir Walter Stonor, son and heir of Thomas the disputant.<sup>48</sup> In 1559 Elizabeth widow of Sir Walter Stonor, together with Francis Stonor, heir of Sir Walter, sold the reversion of the manor and advowson of Penton Mewsey to Walter Loveden of Fyfield (co. Berks.), who died seised in 1580.<sup>49</sup> A year later his son, Walter Loveden, died so seised, leaving a brother and heir, John Loveden, aged seventeen,<sup>50</sup> and very shortly afterwards the premises passed to Francis Culpepper of Hollingbourne (co. Kent), who died seised thereof in 1590, leaving a son and heir John.<sup>51</sup> From the inquest held after the death of John Culpepper, who died in 1607, it appears that he held the manor in chief as of the inheritance of Thomas Seymour, and a messuage and carucate of land, later belonging to William Peverell, as of the honour of Gloucester. There was also a yearly rent-charge of £30 reserved to Francis Stonor and his heirs for ever.<sup>52</sup> In 1654 Thomas Allen of Ewelme (co. Oxon.) petitioned against the sequestration of this rent for the recusancy of the late William Stonor, having purchased the same for £400 of Thomas Stonor his son.<sup>53</sup> Sir Thomas Culpepper son of John<sup>54</sup> died seised of the manor in 1639, leaving a son and heir John, aged five.<sup>55</sup> Data for the immediate subsequent history of the manor are lacking, but it eventually became the property of the Pollens of Andover, who rose to prominence in the neighbourhood towards the end of the 17th century. John Pollen presented to the living in 1678,<sup>56</sup> and one may presume he was also at that date lord of the manor. In 1721 Edward Pollen was vouched to a recovery,<sup>57</sup> but in the following year, with his son and heir John Pollen, he sold the manor and advowson to Sir Philip Meadows of Chute (co. Wilts.),<sup>58</sup> knight marshal of the household, who died in 1767 and was succeeded by his son Sydney Meadows, holder of the same office.<sup>59</sup> Sir Sydney Meadows died in 1792 and left all his real property to his eldest nephew Evelyn Meadows,<sup>60</sup> with whose heirs<sup>61</sup> it remained until about 1886, when it passed from Mr. William Henry Meadows to Major (then Captain) Francis Richard Hugh Seymour Sutton, the present lord of the manor.

Disconnected references to the Peverells as holding land here for at least two centuries are found, but the statements as to how they held it are contradictory. In 1316 John Peverell was one of the three holders of the vill,<sup>62</sup> and eight years later his wood of Penton Mewsey in the forest of Chute and Finkley, taken into the king's hand for trespass of vert and venison, was ordered to be replevied to him.<sup>63</sup> In 1346 Richard Peverell appears as sharing Penton Mewsey with John de Wynton.<sup>64</sup> The name occurs no more in the 'Feudal Aids' in connexion with this place, but in 1362 Sir Henry Peverell died seised of a messuage and a carucate of land there which he held of the king in chief by service of 8s. and two quarters of salt,<sup>65</sup> and in 1505 Thomas Peverell son and heir of William Peverell died seised of the same premises, held of the king as of the Duchy of Lancaster.<sup>66</sup> He left an infant son and heir William, who apparently parted with the estate, for John Culpepper, who died lord of the manor in 1607, also possessed a carucate of land which had lately belonged to William Peverell, and was said to be held by knights' service of the king as of his honour of Gloucester.<sup>67</sup>

The church of HOLY TRINITY has CHURCH a chancel 24 ft. 5 in. by 16 ft. 4 in., nave 39 ft. 5 in. by 19 ft. 10 in., north transept 17 ft. 3 in. wide by 13 ft. 6 in., and a south porch, all inside measurements.

The building dates from about 1340 to 1350, and the transept and south porch are modern additions. The south wall of the chancel is thinner than the rest, having been rebuilt. Before the restoration of the church in 1888 the present north window of the chancel was in the east wall; it was put back where it now is (probably its original position), and a new east window inserted, the wall being more or less rebuilt at the same time. The roofs of the church were damaged by fire in 1889 and renewed, some of the old timber being re-used.

The east window of the chancel has three cinquefoiled lights and a traceried head. The north window is of two cinquefoiled ogee-headed lights under a two-centred arch filled with elaborate flowing tracery, and that opposite to it in the south is similar but of less depth inside to suit the thinner wall. West of this window is set a doorway with a peculiar pointed angular head; it has a sunk chamfer with a roll on the inside face and soffit stopping on moulded bases above the floor; these bases appear to be capitals reversed; the whole doorway is evidently a make-up of earlier material. It is now blocked on the inside by an organ which fills up the south-west angle of the chancel.

The chancel arch is plain and narrow, of two chamfered orders dying on the jambs, which have a single chamfer stopped out below. The transept opens to the nave by a wide modern arch of like detail, and is lighted by windows in its east and north walls, both of two lights under a traceried head. The old north doorway of the nave is now blocked; it has chamfered jambs and a two-centred arch outside, and a plain chamfered rear arch. The north-west window is a modern one of two lights with a quatrefoil over. The south-east window is original and has two trefoiled ogee-headed lights with a quatrefoil over in the two-centred head, a plain external label and two-centred rear arch. In its east jamb is a small trefoiled piscina recess with a stone shelf and a round drain on the level of the window-sill. The south doorway is also original, and has two continuous wave-moulded orders with a three-quarter hollow between them; the head is two-centred and has a plain label. The west window is of 14th-century detail but a good deal repaired; it has three cinquefoiled lights, the middle one ogee-headed, with flowing tracery, and a two-centred arch with a plain label. Over the west wall is an original bell-cote with two pointed openings under gabled heads flanked by gabled buttresses, with additional buttresses on the north and south, a pretty and unusual design; in it are hung two modern bells. The south porch is a modern one of wood.

The walling is of faced flint with large ashlar quoins; the east wall of the chancel is of chequer work of flint and stone. All the facing is modern, except that of the north wall of the chancel. A chamfered stone plinth runs all round, except for a short distance on the west of the south porch, where a blocked opening can be traced, perhaps a doorway to a former gallery. There is a sundial on the south-west angle of the nave.

The roofs are gabled; they are plaster barrel vaulted below. In the chancel are two tie-beams visible and in the nave three trusses with old timbers; these have arched (two-centred) principals following the line of the ceiling and curved struts to the king posts, set parallel to the principals, above the cambered tie-beams.

The font is octagonal and contemporary with the church, and has a pair of trefoiled arches on each face, the upper and lower edge of the bowl being moulded; the stem has a hollow profile with a moulded necking, and the base is also moulded.

The altar rails have 18th-century twisted balusters, and at the west end of the nave is a 17th-century chest; the rest of the church furniture is modern.

In the south-east window of the nave are a few fragments of original glass, in red, gold and white diaper patterns on a dark background.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1713, given by Edward Grace in 1714, a silver paten of 1714, and a silver alms plate of 1828, given by Caroline Willis in 1835.

The first book of the registers contains baptisms, marriages and burials mixed from 1642 to 1677, and a few briefs for 1660 and later; the second also has mixed entries from 1673 to 1743; the third continues the baptisms and burials from 1744 to 1812 and the marriages to 1754; the fourth has the marriages from 1754 to 1812.

In the rectory is an old handbell inscribed, 'Sit nomen domini Benedictum, A° 1555.'

Penton Mewsey Church is mentioned in Domesday Book.<sup>68</sup> In 1278 Robert Durdant granted the advowson to Thomas le Riche and Alice his wife,<sup>69</sup> and Thomas subsequently presented.<sup>70</sup> The advowson went with the manor until about 1734,<sup>71</sup> when Joshua Strother, clerk, presented, Sir Philip Meadows having presented in 1732. Joshua Strother was again presenting in 1736, Barbara Strother in 1762, Edward Fulham in 1790 and John Constable in 1832.<sup>72</sup> Shortly after this last date the advowson passed to the Rev. W. Dodson and was held in turn by the Rev. Christopher and the Rev. P. A. Dodson. Thence it passed about 1876 to the Rev. Thomas Hargreaves, and about 1881 to the Rev. Meyrick Onslow Alison. Both the last-named were also incumbents. Major Sutton, the present patron and lord of the manor, acquired the right about 1886.

In 1291 the church was assessed at £6 13s. 4d.,<sup>73</sup> and in 1535 at £9 12s. 7d. beyond reprises.<sup>74</sup>

The school was erected by subscription in 1876, for 80 children.

John Read's Charity for education CHARITIES and other purposes was founded by will in 1651. In 1905 the sum of £9 was received from the Carpenters' Company, London. By an order of the Charity Commissioners of 8 September 1903, made under the Board of Education Act 1899, two third parts of such net annual income were determined as the Educational Foundation of John Read. Payment of £6 a year is made to the school, 13s. 4d. to the rector for a sermon on 5 November, at which this part of the donor's will is to be read, and the balance to the poor of this parish and Weyhill.

In 1876 the Rev. Henry Powney by will left £150 for the benefit of the poor. A portion of the principal sum was expended on blankets for the poor and the remainder in enlarging the parish schools. The amount replaced is represented by £120 17s. 4d. consols with the official trustees, producing yearly £3 0s. 4d., which is applied in the distribution of coal.

QUARLEY

Perlei (xi cent.) ; Cornelea (xii, xiii cent.) ; Querle, Querlye, &c. (xiv cent.) ; Qwarley, Qwharley (xv cent.). Quarley is bounded by Cholderton, Ampport, Grately and the Wiltshire border. The soil is light and friable, of the secondary chalk formation, and the subsoil is chalk.<sup>1</sup> The total area of the parish is 1,692 acres, over two-thirds of which are arable land, rather under a third permanent grass, and the small remainder woods and plantations.<sup>2</sup> The principal crops are barley, oats and turnips, with sainfoin and grasses. Little more than 300 ft. above sea-level at the north and south extremities, Quarley Hill in the centre rises to a height of 561 ft. On the summit is a large camp. Formerly there were entrenchments extending along Cholderton Hill and three others in different directions, which have, however, been levelled.

The village is situated in the north on either side of a road running due north and south through the parish. The rectory is on the west of the road, and opposite it is St. Michael's Church standing in Quarley Park.

There was an inclosure award here in 1794.<sup>3</sup>

Earl Harold had held QUARLEY MANOR and in Domesday Book it was assigned to the Conqueror,<sup>4</sup> although Maud of Flanders, his wife, who died in 1083, had given it to the abbey of Bec Hellouin.<sup>5</sup> Like its neighbour, Monxton, the manor was in the charge of the Prior of Ogbourne (co. Wilts.), the principal cell of Bec in England, and is probably that 'Cornby' over which the abbot claimed royal liberties and customs in 1281.<sup>6</sup> Be that as it may, according to the Assize Roll of 1280, the prior had the rights of gallows, view of frankpledge, infangentheof, chattels of felons and fugitives and assize of bread and ale, in all his lands in Hampshire.<sup>7</sup> In 1404 Henry IV granted all the possessions of Ogbourne to his son John of Lancaster (vide Monxton), afterwards Duke of Bedford and guardian of England, who held them until his death in 1435, when they came to Henry VI as his heir.<sup>8</sup> In 1438 £20 yearly from Quarley Manor was assigned to Humphrey Duke of Gloucester as part of a pension of 2,000 marks.<sup>9</sup> In April 1441 the manor was granted in free alms to the master, brethren and sisters of the hospital of Saint Katharine by the Tower of London,<sup>10</sup> and a fuller regrant was made in the following August 'with all rights, appurtenances, profits, commodities, emoluments, courts and views of frankpledge thereto belonging, and with all rights and claims which the king had therein as freely as the Priors of Ogbourne held the same.'<sup>11</sup> Edward IV gave a fresh charter in 1462.<sup>12</sup> In 1563 the hospital leased the manor in reversion to Godfrey Wilson for ninety-nine years from Michaelmas 1594.<sup>13</sup> This lease, which descended to Hugh Pitman, who died seized c. 1616,<sup>14</sup> was subject to a reservation of a half-share of casualties, of profits of courts, and of fines and heriots, together with all the great wood and timber standing and growing on the premises. In 1892 the hospital sold the manor to Augustus John Henry Beaumont (Paulet) fifteenth Marquess of Winchester,<sup>15</sup> whose brother, the present marquess, is now lord of the manor.

CHURCH ST. MICHAEL

The church of consists of a chancel 20 ft. 5 in. by 13 ft. 6 in., north vestry, nave 31 ft. 9 in. by 16 ft. 4 in., and a south porch.

The nave is not later than the beginning of the 12th century and has the remains of three windows and a north doorway, belonging to the early work. The walls are 2 ft. 8 in. thick, built of flint set in herring-bone fashion, and the windows are high in the walls. The western angles have fair-sized quoins of wrought stone, but the eastern angles, so far as they can be seen, are of flint without any wrought dressings. The whole church is so overgrown with ivy that much of the wall surface, especially in the chancel, is entirely hidden.

the 15th century, and has now an east window of 18th-century classic design. The porch was added in 1881 and the vestry in 1882.

The east window of the chancel is of three lights, the middle one round-headed and the others flat, divided by detached square shafts inside and out, with Ionic capitals; the side lights have now been filled in with masonry. The only other chancel window is one in the south wall, dating from the 15th century and being of two cinquefoiled lights with semi-quatrefoils above, under a square head and with a moulded label outside. A priest's doorway to the east of it is probably contemporary with it; it has a pointed head of two continuous hollow-chamfered orders. In the north wall, to the east, is a low tomb recess some 7 ft. long and diminishing in depth from head to foot; it has a sunk quarter-round order running round the jambs and pointed segmental arch and stopping on moulded bases. No stone or slab bearing any inscription or ornament now lies in the recess, which appears to date from the middle of the 14th century. Next to it is a modern doorway into the vestry, and west of this is a modern arch in which stands the organ. The vestry is lighted by three lancets and has a blocked doorway in its west wall. The chancel arch is a modern one of simple design.

The north wall is now unpierced, but contains the stones of the west jamb of an original window set high up in the wall in about the middle of its length, and further west is a blocked round-headed doorway of the same period, of plain design. Of the two windows in the south wall the one east of the doorway dates probably from early in the 15th century; it has three trefoiled lights with half-quatrefoils above under a square head. The mullions are modern. The other window is of two lights of similar design but of modern date. The south doorway is a pointed one of a single chamfered order; it is probably contemporary with the window east of it. Over the doorway and partly destroyed by it is another blocked round-headed window, and high in the west wall (above the later west window) is a third, fairly perfect. All have large roughly-worked stones in the jambs, but the heads are of thin small stones set radially like tiles. Only the west window can be seen from the outside; it has a round head in a single stone, and wrought stones, set long and short fashion in its north jamb; in the south jamb this is, however, not the case. The splay runs straight to the outer face without a chamfer.

The lower west window has modern tracery but old inner jambs, perhaps 15th-century work. The wall beneath it is of later date than the general surface, and there may have been in the first instance a west doorway. The blocked north door, very near to the north-west angle of the nave, has a plain round head in fairly large stones, and the jambs are of the same character. The radius of the arch is wider than the jambs, and it seems that the head was originally filled with a tympanum. The upper edges of the springing stones are horizontal and not radial, having a triangular space between them and the next arch-stone, which is filled in with mortar on one side and with a small stone in a very rude mortar joint on the other. The stones show a rough diagonal tooling, which stops at a well-marked line, beyond which the stone was meant to be plastered. The surface is higher beyond the line, instead of lower, as might have been expected, in order to make a stop for the plaster. The same thing occurs on the quoins of the north-west angle, and cannot be entirely due to weathering of the exposed part.

The nave roof has a few old timbers, with strutted king posts, but the chancel roof is modern.

The font has been partly retooled and is probably of 13th-century workmanship; it has a round cup-shaped bowl on a short round stem. The late 17th-century altar rails, with very pretty twisted and carved balusters, are now set across the chancel arch, and more of the same kind are worked into the modern pulpit. The other furniture is of modern date.

In the floor, by the font, is a coffin-lid with an incised floreated cross (probably of 14th-century date) with a trefoiled leaf at the base of the stem.

Forming the threshold of the vestry doorway is part of a 17th-century gravestone to John Pitman, and there are also a number of monuments to the family of Cox, the oldest dating from 1748.

The two bells now hang on a low frame in the churchyard to the north of the church. One is inscribed 'Sancta Maria ora pro nobis' and has the maker's mark, a small black letter s, on the shoulder; the other is by I.D. 1636, and has the words 'Love God.' A third bell was cracked and since recast; it is not now in the church.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and cover of 1779, a chalice of 1895, a paten of 1894, also a plated chalice and paten and a flagon (secular).

The first book of the registers contains baptisms 1559 to 1712, marriages 1560 to 1708, and burials 1559 to 1711; the second has baptisms 1712 to 1786 (exclusive of the year 1720, contained in the first book), marriages 1708 to 1752, and burials 1711 to 1808; the third book has baptisms 1787 to 1812, and burials in 1812 only; the fourth marriages 1755 to 1811.

The church, which is mentioned ADVOWSON in Domesday Book, was held with the manor. The Prior of Ogbourne presented as procurator-general for the abbey of Bec in England, except, that is, when the priory was in the king's hands, as was the case in nine presentations out of ten during Wykeham's episcopacy.<sup>16</sup> In the deeds whereby Henry VI granted Quarley Manor to St. Katharine's Hospital in 1441<sup>17</sup> no mention was made of the advowson. Apparently this left room for uncertainty; for in Bishop Waynflete's first register two presentations by the hospital are recorded, followed by four by Eton College,<sup>18</sup> which had a conceivable claim under the terms of its charter of endowment.<sup>19</sup> This was evidently the reason for the charter of 1462,<sup>20</sup> in which the advowson is specifically referred to and the matter settled. The church is still in the gift of St. Katharine's Hospital, which was removed from its old site to its present one near

In 1399 relaxation of five years and five quadrages<sup>22</sup> of enjoined penance was granted to penitents who on the principal feasts of the year and those of the dedication and St. Michael, the octaves of certain of them and the six days of Whitsun week should visit and give alms for the conservation of the church of St. Michael the Archangel, Quarley. Those who did this on the said octaves and days only were released a hundred days.<sup>23</sup>

The school was built in 1817 for thirty-six children.

Mrs. Sophia Sheppard, by deed of CHARITIES 25 July 1844, gave an annuity of £20 for the benefit of the poor of the parish (see under Ampport). In 1906 the sum of £20 received from Magdalen College, Oxford, was applied in the distribution of coals among 32 persons.

The official trustees hold a sum of £200 consols in respect of the charity of the Rev. Thomas Sheppard, D.D., and Richard Cox, the dividends of which, amounting to £5 a year, are carried to the school account.

THRUXTON

Anne (xi cent.); Turkilleston (xii cent.); Turcleston, Thorcleston (xiii cent.); Throkeleston, Thurckleston (xiv cent.); Throkeston (xv cent.); Thruckleston (xvi cent.); Throxton (xviii cent.).

Thruxton is a long, narrow parish stretching from Fyfield on the east to the Wiltshire border on the west. The total area of the parish is 1,565 acres, comprising 1,060 acres of arable, 255 acres of permanent grass and 70½ acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is rather light and the subsoil chalk.<sup>2</sup> The principal crops grown in the parish are wheat, barley, oats, sainfoin and turnips. The height above sea level varies from about 500 ft. on Thruxton Hill to 230 ft., with a downward slope, in general, from south-west to north-east.

The road from Andover to Amesbury runs for about 2 miles along the southern border, leaving it just by Thruxton Down Farm, crosses Thruxton Hill and passes Thruxton Farm on the north. The village is situated in the east of the parish, a little to the west of Pillhill Brook, which flows through the parish from north to south. The site of a Roman villa was discovered near Eastfield, about half a mile east of the village, in 1823. The mosaic pavement was taken up in 1899, and is now in the British Museum. There are earthworks in the village to the west of the church, and fragments of Roman tiles and pottery have been found there.<sup>3</sup>

Redenham Park and House were formerly in Thruxton, but were transferred to Fyfield in 1888 by order of the Local Government Board.

There can be little doubt that of the MANOR four Annes named in Domesday under Andover Hundred that which Saxi held as a manor of the Confessor<sup>6</sup> is to be identified with THRUXTON. In 1086 it was held by Gozelin de Cormeilles,<sup>7</sup> whose descendants were lords of Thruxton for three centuries. The overlordship belonged at an early date to the family of Pont de l'Arche, of whom William refounded the priory of St. Mary Overy in Southwark in 1106,<sup>8</sup> and the same or another William was sheriff of Hampshire and Berkshire in 1129.<sup>9</sup> As early as 1166 Robert de Pont de l'Arche was tenant in chief of an unnamed knight's fee in Hampshire, which, as Hugh de Cormeilles, held it of him, was almost certainly Thruxton.<sup>10</sup> In the Testa de Nevill John de Cormeilles is entered as holding a fee there of Robert de Pont de l'Arche,<sup>11</sup> who died in 1247.<sup>12</sup> Robert's brother and heir William de Pont de l'Arche being an outlaw,<sup>13</sup> all his lands were in 1249 granted to William de Valence, afterwards Earl of Pembroke, and his heirs by his wife, until the king should restore them to the right heirs.<sup>14</sup> Restoration, however, seems never to have been made. Aymer de Valence second Earl of Pembroke, at his death in 1324, had a fee in Thruxton,<sup>15</sup> which fell to the share of Laurence de Hastings, great-nephew of the earl and one of his co-heirs.<sup>16</sup> In the late 15th century the overlordship of Thruxton belonged to the Wests, Lords De La Warr,<sup>17</sup> no doubt as appurtenant to the manor of Newton Valence,<sup>18</sup> of which Laurence de Hastings had enfeoffed Thomas West in 1339.<sup>19</sup> As late as 1400, however, Philippa wife of John de Hastings, last Earl of Pembroke of that name, and afterwards

of Richard (Fitz Alan) Earl of Arundel, and of Thomas (Poynings) Lord St. John of Basing,<sup>20</sup> died in possession of a fee in Thruxton.<sup>21</sup> Sir John Philpot, who died in 1634, was returned as holding of the manor of Newton Valence.<sup>22</sup>

As has been said, Gozelin de Cormeilles held the manor in 1086,<sup>23</sup> and in 1167 Hugh de Cormeilles rendered account for Thruxton.<sup>24</sup> In 1199 Thomas de Cormeilles granted Cecily daughter of Baldred of Tidworth a virgate of land and a mill there for life,<sup>25</sup> which grant was confirmed three years later, on an assize of mort d'ancestor, by William son of Henry de Cormeilles.<sup>26</sup> Others of the name were parties to fines in the succeeding reigns,<sup>27</sup> and John de Cormeilles is entered in the Testa de Nevill as holding a knight's fee in Thruxton.<sup>28</sup> In 1304 John de Cormeilles, whose name occurs a dozen years later as owner of the vill,<sup>29</sup> was granted a weekly market on Monday at his manor of Thruxton, a two days' fair yearly on the eve and feast of St. Peter and St. Paul and free warren over his demesne.<sup>30</sup> In 1346, when a subsidy was levied for the knighting of the Black Prince, Isabel de Cormeilles held two parts of a fee in Thruxton.<sup>31</sup> As widow of John she held a life estate in the manor, as appears from a fine levied in 1348, whereby Richard Folks, vicar of the church of Steeple Ashton, granted the manors of Hemblesworth Giffard (co. Dors.) and Thruxton, with the advowson of Thruxton, to John de Cormeilles the younger and Goda his wife and their heirs in tail.<sup>32</sup> This Goda, who outlived her husband, also had a life interest in the manor. She subsequently married John de Buttethorn, who presented to the living during the episcopacy of William de Edendon (1346-66).<sup>33</sup> Precisely when the Cormeilles family parted with the manor and how the Lisles acquired it has not been discovered, but Sir John de Lisle, who died in 1407, desired to be buried in the church<sup>34</sup> there, and he left a son John and a wife Elizabeth, who was probably that Elizabeth Lisle, 'gentilwoman,' who in 1428 held the two parts of a knight's fee<sup>35</sup> which had belonged to John de Cormeilles, and as relict of Sir John Byssie presented a rector to the church during the episcopacy of Henry Beaufort.<sup>36</sup> Sir John Lisle of Wootton (I.W.), who died in 1471, had the manor and advowson of Thruxton by the demise and confirmation of Nicholas Lisle and others and held it of Lord De La Warr.<sup>37</sup> His widow Isabel afterwards married Thomas Beauchamp, and died seised of the manor in 1484.<sup>38</sup> Sir John left a son, Sir Nicholas Lisle, whose will was proved in 1506.<sup>39</sup> He was succeeded by his son Sir John, whose will, as well as that of his wife Mary, was proved in 1524.<sup>40</sup> This Sir John, who left no issue, entailed the majority of his estates on his cousin, Lancelot Lisle, but left Thruxton after the death of his wife to his right heirs. These were the children of his sister Eleanor wife of John Kingston. Mary Kingston, daughter of John and Eleanor, who by the death of her brothers John and Nicholas became heir general of the Lisles of Wootton, married a Sir Thomas Lisle and died in 1539 leaving no issue.<sup>41</sup> On the death of her husband, three years later,<sup>42</sup> Thruxton reverted to the heirs of Agnes sister of the above-mentioned Sir Nicholas Lisle and wife of John Philpot of Compton, and co-heir of the Lisles of Wootton with her sister Margaret wife of John Rogers (vide infra).<sup>43</sup> In this way the manor passed to the family of Philpot. Thomas Philpot, great-grandson of John and Elizabeth,<sup>44</sup> who was vouched at a recovery in 1556,<sup>45</sup> and dealt with the manor by fine in 1576,<sup>46</sup> died seised of it in 1586.<sup>47</sup> His son Sir George, who conveyed Thruxton and other manors to Henry Earl of Southampton in 1607,<sup>48</sup> died so seised in 1624.<sup>49</sup> Sir John Philpot, son and heir of Sir George, had his property confiscated as a recusant, and in 1628 two-thirds of Thruxton were granted to Edward Barnes for forty-one years.<sup>50</sup> However, Sir John Philpot died seised of the manor in 1634,<sup>50a</sup> and it descended to his son and heir Henry Philpot, who dealt with the manor in the same year.<sup>51</sup> In 1645 Henry and his brother, Thomas Philpot, were compounding for delinquency and declared themselves ready to sell a great part of their estate to satisfy the fine of £1,200 imposed on them.<sup>52</sup> In 1651 Henry Philpot and Mary his wife settled the manor on their eldest son, Henry Philpot, and his heirs.<sup>53</sup> About this time, <sup>43</sup> Part, however, of the manor passed into other hands, though the holding of the Philpots and their successors was apparently always considered a whole manor. Materials are too scanty to trace the descent of this detached portion. In 1540 a third part of a moiety was the object of a fine between Edward Pasbrigg and Hugh Williamson and Christopher Morgan and Joan his wife (Feet of F. Hants, East. 31 Hen. VIII). In 1559 Sir Richard Lyster died seised of the same fraction (Chan. Inq. p.m. [Ser. 2], cxxiv, 222), and in 1753 Robert Nugent and his wife quitclaimed it to Edward Eliot, then lord of the manor (Feet of F. Hants, Trin. 26 & 27 Geo. II). In 1755 James Newsam was vouched at a recovery of one-third of the manor (Recov. R. Hil. 28 Geo. II, rot. 140).

however, the line of the Philpots failed and the manor passed to Henry Rogers of Cannington (co. Somers.), only surviving son of Sir Edward Rogers of Cannington, as heir of John Rogers and Margaret Lisle, co-heir of the Lisles with her sister Agnes Philpot (vide supra and cf. Kimpton). Henry Rogers died in 1672, leaving the manor in tail-male to Alexander Popham, son and heir-apparent of Sir Francis Popham and his wife Helena, niece of the testator, with contingent remainder to his nephew, Sir John St. Barbe, bart.,<sup>54</sup> to whom it eventually came. In 1709 Sir John St. Barbe and Honora his wife conveyed the manor to Aaron Rutherford.<sup>55</sup> Before 1753<sup>56</sup> it had come into the hands of Edward Eliot of Port Eliot, who having, with his son and heir Edward James Eliot, barred the entail in 1779,<sup>57</sup> sold it in 1783 to George Paulet of Ampport,<sup>58</sup> afterwards twelfth Marquess of Winchester. In 1829 Harry Noyes and Catherine his wife quitclaimed the manor to Ralph Etwell and his heirs.<sup>59</sup> Within twenty years of this date Thruxton had come, by an exchange,<sup>60</sup> to the trustees of St. John's Hospital, Winchester, the governors of which are now lords of the manor.

ROGERS of Cannington. Argent a chevron between three harts running sable with a crescent for difference.

In 1280 a distraint was ordered against John de Meysey touching a claim to the assize of bread and ale broken in Thruxton.<sup>61</sup> According to the Assize Roll of the same year William de Valence had view of frankpledge and assize of bread and ale in Thruxton.<sup>62</sup> According to another entry on the same roll John de Cormeilles and his men both free and villein had been accustomed to do suit at the out-hundred of Andover every fortnight until twenty-three years previously, when it was withdrawn by William de Valence. William asserted that he and his men of the manors of Newton (Valence) and Hawkley<sup>63</sup> were quit of suits of shires and hundreds everywhere in the county and claimed view of frankpledge, producing a charter of Henry III. The jurors found Thruxton to be a member of these manors.<sup>64</sup>

Although no mill is mentioned in Domesday Book, one is included in several early grants of land at Thruxton.<sup>65</sup> It seems, however, to have disappeared at an early date.

The church of ST. PETER AND CHURCH ST. PAUL has a chancel 26 ft. 3 in. by 16 ft. 1 in. with north vestry and organ chamber, nave 27 ft. by 19 ft. 1 in., north aisle 10 ft. wide, and west tower 13 ft. square with a porch to the south of it. The measurements are internal.

Owing to the very complete modernizing of the building there is little left to tell its story.

The chancel, which leans considerably to the north, was probably rebuilt late in the 15th century, but the nave, though retaining no early detail, is doubtless much older; the tower owes its appearance of age to the re-use of old stonework, and the south porch and north aisle and vestry are modern. The external stonework of nave and chancel was thoroughly renewed in 1869, and the walls are faced with flint. Early in the 16th century the Lisle tomb was built on the north of the chancel and a chapel added with it.<sup>66</sup>

A tower appears to have been added near the end of the 17th century, as in one of the register books is a note that it fell in 1796, having stood 110 years. It was rebuilt in 1801; and another note says that the chantry chapel north of the chancel was pulled down for the purpose of supplying it with material, and this statement is certainly borne out by the number of carved stones in the tower parapets matching those in the north wall of the chancel.

The east window is a modern one of three trefoiled lights under a two-centred head. The east wall is strengthened by diagonal buttresses, and has a modern moulded plinth on which is the date 1869. In the north wall, close to the east, is a blocked doorway which formerly opened into the chantry chapel, west of it is the arch in which stands the Lisle altar tomb, and west of it a larger arch of the same date; these are described below, with the tomb to which they properly belong.

In the south wall is a small semi-octagonal pillar piscina, with a moulded base and capital; the recess above it is modern, and west of it is another large arch over an altar tomb of earlier character than that opposite. In this arch are set a modern three-light window and a doorway with a small porch outside. The south-west window dates from the 15th century, and is of two cinquefoiled lights under a square head with a modern moulded label outside. The chancel arch has continuous moulded jambs and four-centred arch, and is apparently of late 15th-century date; it is square with the nave, and therefore askew with the chancel. It closely resembles the chancel arch at Timsbury.

The modern arcade dividing the nave from the north aisle is of two bays in 14th-century style. In the south wall are two windows, both modernized, but originally of 15th-century date; the eastern is a single cinquefoiled light with a two-centred head and a four-centred rear arch, the other is of two cinquefoiled lights, with a quatrefoil above, in a two-centred arch. Below the first is a small 15th-century piscina for a nave altar; it has a plain four-centred arch in a square head. The aisle is lighted by two north windows and one west, each of two lights with a quatrefoil over; all are modern, with the aisle. The archway opening into the tower from the nave has modern jambs and plain chamfered abaci; the arch is a round one of a single slightly chamfered order, and is obviously of 17th if not 18th-century date.

The tower is squat in appearance and is faced with ashlar; it has a south doorway, which forms the principal entrance to the church, of early 16th-century detail, which, together with the west window of two lights under a four-centred head, is doubtless part of the former north chapel. The second of the three stages has a small square doorway on its north side approached by an iron ladder outside. The third stage is lighted in each wall by a round-headed window. The parapet is embattled and bears the date of the rebuilding (1801) upon it. It is for the most part of very pretty early 16th-century detail, with honeysuckle in the battlements and a frieze of running foliage with medallions, those on the south face being supported by griffins. Below is a classic cornice with shields bearing the arms of Lisle, a fesse between three martlets, the sun from a cloud, and the initials of Thomas Lisle bound with knotwork. On one of the medallions is the date 1527. The roofs are all modern, that of the chancel is open-timbered with pointed arched trusses; the nave has a similar roof, but of different profile, and the tower has a flat panelled ceiling with moulded joists.

The font, which stands in the tower, dates from 1844 and replaced one of 1814, which in turn had replaced another which was broken by the fall of the tower in 1796. A piece of it and the 1814 font are now in the foundations of the porch; the altar is of stone and also modern.

In the chancel is a very fine monumental brass, with the figure of a knight in full plate armour with sword and dagger, under a rich canopy of three cinquefoiled arches with traceried and crocketed gables and crocketed pinnacles. There are four shields, the first with the arms of Lisle; second, a chevron between three martlets; third, Lisle impaling Courtenay; and fourth, Lisle impaling a chevron between three roses. The inscription in brass around the edge of the slab reads:—Sub lapide isto jacent p̄re memorie dominus Johannes Lysle miles, dominus de Wodynton in insula Vecta et Domina Elizabeth Lysle uxor ejus. Idem dominus Johannes obiit ultimo die mensis Januarii anno domini millesimo cccc vii<sup>o</sup> Eorum anime pace fruantur eterna Amen.

To the north of the sanctuary is an altar tomb of Purbeck marble with richly traceried panels bearing the recumbent effigies of a knight and lady in a fine white stone; he wears a mail hauberk under his plate armour and a tabard over it with the arms of Lisle quartered with a fesse between three martlets; the same are on the shoulder pieces. He also wears a collar of SS and roses. His head is bare and rests on a shield with cross bands carved with Renaissance ornament. One leg is broken below the knee into several pieces, the other has been broken and repaired, and his feet rest on gauntlets. The lady wears a richly decorated 'kennel' head-dress and her hair descends in long tresses behind her back; she is in a tight-fitting dress with close sleeves and a long mantle fastened apparently by a double chain at the shoulders, from which hangs a cross. Her feet are wrapped in the mantle, and the workmanship of both figures is extremely beautiful and shows a marked Italian influence. They are said to be the work of an Italian artist brought over by Lord Sandys. The Purbeck marble base of the tomb is richly panelled in three bays on the south; the brass shields which were on this side and the single shields at east and west have now gone as well as the inscription which went round the top edge.

On the north is a stone front of Renaissance detail, apparently added to the tomb, bearing a blank cartouche in the middle, on the east the quartered arms as on the cornice, and on the west a lozenge with the arms of Courtenay. The tomb stands below a four-centred archway in the north wall with panelled soffit and jambs; the construction is Gothic, but the ornament, except that in the soffit, is of the finest early Renaissance character. A beautifully carved cornice and cresting above bears on both sides the quarterly shield with helm and mantling. A wide four-centred flat arch west of it opened into the former chapel and is of similar detail; in the spandrels on the south side are shields, one with the arms of Lisle and the other with the sun's rays coming out of clouds. Of the two on the north side one is hidden by the organ and the other is mutilated, but had apparently the T.H. monogram which occurs on the tower.

On the south side of the altar is another tomb of late 15th-century design, but without inscription, figures or armorial bearings. It is in white stone, and has been much restored. Its panelled south side is exposed to the weather, the wall being built over it. The four-centred arch under which it stands is old, and has panelled jambs and soffit, and over it is a moulded and embattled cornice between two shafts, which are supported on corbels carved with angels holding shields, and there are similar angels at the top. The shields are unfortunately blank. In the middle of the cornice is an embattled bracket, and below it a pendant in the form of a lily pot, the underside of its base carved with a sun. The large spandrels of the arch are blank, but on the cornice is a pleated scroll now bearing a modern text.

Standing at the east end of the north aisle, whither it was brought from the rectory garden, is a life-size recumbent wooden effigy of a lady in Elizabethan dress. Its original position is doubtful. It is said to be the effigy of Lady Elizabeth Philpot.

There are five bells: the treble and second by Thomas Mears, 1836; the third by John Wallis, of Salisbury, 1616, and inscribed, 'Give almes'; the fourth by the same founder, 1581, inscribed, 'O prayed be thy name O Lord'; the tenor bears no maker's name or mark, it is inscribed, 'Georgius Philpotus me fieri fecit in honore Sancti Johannis evangeliste A<sup>o</sup>. 1600.'

The plate consists of a silver-gilt chalice, paten and flagon, all of 1846, and a large brass alms dish, supposed to be of Spanish origin. The flagon was the gift of Francis Dyson, rector, in 1846.

The first book of the registers is of parchment, and contains baptisms from 1600 to 1690, marriages 1603 to 1605 and 1608 to 1666, and burials from 1607 to 1666. The second book is a paper copy, and has baptisms from 1702 to 1812, marriages 1721 to 1752, and burials 1721 to 1812. The third book has marriages from 1754 to 1811, and the fourth two marriages (only) for 1812. There is also a poor book from 1748 to 1788, and a book of churchwardens' accounts from 1693 to 1785. It is interesting to note the comparatively large sums paid during the 18th century for the extermination of pests and vermin. Sparrows were the worst sufferers; these were paid for at 2d. a dozen heads, while polecats were 4d. each, stoats 2d. each, and foxes 1s. a head: the last payment of this sort was in 1774.

In 1086 the Norman abbey of ADVOWSON Cormeilles held the church of Thruxton with 1 virgate of land and had there one villein.<sup>67</sup> At some unknown date the abbey must have given the advowson to the manorial lords, and the Cormeilles and Lisles are found presenting in the 14th and 15th centuries.<sup>68</sup> A pension of 13s. 4d. paid from the church in 1291 and constituting a tenth of the full value<sup>69</sup> was perhaps due to the abbey. The advowson continued to descend with the manor until late in the 18th century.<sup>70</sup> It seems, however, to have been leased out for a considerable period to

Sir John Hinde Cotton, bart., who presented in 1709, 1726 and 1747.<sup>71</sup> Between 1783 and 1795, the date of his first presentation,<sup>72</sup> it was acquired by Dr. Thomas Sheppard, who presented to the church as late as 1806. Between 1848 and 1859 it passed from Mrs. Sheppard to the Rev. Lancelot Miles Halton and from him by purchase to the Rev. Donald Baynes, who built the rectory and restored the church. Mr. Baynes gave the advowson to his nephew, Henry De Foe Baker, who in 1896 was succeeded by his son, the Rev. Henry Charleton Baker, the present patron, formerly rector of Thruxton and now vicar of St. Chad's, Everton.<sup>73</sup>

There was a chapel attached to the church in the 13th century.<sup>74</sup>

The school was built in 1874 and enlarged in 1894 for ninety-one children.

There is a Wesleyan Methodist chapel in the village founded in 1817.

Charity of Henry Rogers (see CHARITIES under Fyfield).—By an order of the Charity Commissioners of 6 October 1903, made under the Board of Education Act, 1899, the trustees are entitled to apply two annual sums of £5 each of the net yearly income of the county towards the support of the parochial schools of Thruxton and Fyfield respectively, such part to be called 'The Educational Foundation of Henry Rogers.'

The school is also entitled to a share of Mrs. Sophia Sheppard's Charity (see under Fyfield).

SOUTH TIDWORTH

Tedorde, Todeorde (xi cent.); Thodeworth, Thudeworth (xiii cent., &c.); Suthtudeword, Suth-tudeworthe, &c. (xiv cent.); South Tedeworth (xv cent.).

The parish of South Tidworth (sometimes spelt Tedworth) lies in a corner of the county having the Wiltshire border for its northern and western boundaries. To the east lies Kimpton and to the south Shipton Bellinger. The total area of the parish is 2,303 acres, nearly the whole of which is pasture land, about a tenth only being arable. The Bourne River runs through the centre of the parish from north to south, but is usually dry. The soil is light loam and the subsoil chalk.<sup>1</sup> The principal crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips.

Tidworth House stands in a well-wooded park of 500 acres. It was built by Mr. Thomas Assheton Smith, but has been much enlarged and is now the official residence of the General in Command of the Salisbury Plain Military District. Near the house stand both the new church and the site of the old church, while the rectory is a little to the north-east. Adjoining the park on the east is Ashdown Copse, which continues northward to the woody western slope of Furze Hill. The summit of this hill—596 ft.

above the ordnance datum—is the highest point in the parish, which in no place descends to a lower level than 360 ft. Further to the east is Warren Hill, on which are targets for rifle practice, the longer ranges, however, being in the neighbouring shire. Military barracks have recently been built here.

The kennels of the Tidworth Hunt are in the parish.

Hampshire Cross is a hamlet on the Wiltshire border. Half a mile to the west of it are seven tumuli.

There were three separate estates in MANORS SOUTH TIDWORTH at the time of the Domesday Survey. The largest, which paid geld for 7 hides, was held by a certain Hugh of Robert son of Gerold. It had formerly been held of Earl Harold as an alod by Codolf.<sup>2</sup> The second had been held as two manors by two freemen in the time of the Confessor, but was held by Robert son of Gerold as one manor at the time of the Survey.<sup>3</sup> The third holding was that of Croc the Huntsman, consisting of 2 hides which Alwin had held as a manor of the Confessor.<sup>4</sup> From the time of the survey until the 16th century only one manor proper of Tidworth seems to have been recognized, but at the later date there appear in the parish three manors, known respectively as the North, Middle and South Manors of South Tidworth, and there is a likelihood that these may be roughly equated with the Domesday entries. The manor proper was identical with the later 'Middle' Manor.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The Middle Manor, the 7-hide Domesday holding of Robert son of Gerold, was held of the manor of Queen's Camel (co. Somers.<sup>5</sup>), which was granted to Hubert de Burgh Earl of Kent by King John,<sup>6</sup> exchanged by him with the king in 1228 for other estates,<sup>7</sup> and granted in 1318 to Edmund of Woodstock,<sup>8</sup> afterwards Earl of Kent. In 1353 fees in Tidworth were assigned in dower to Elizabeth widow of John Plantagenet Earl of Kent,<sup>9</sup> and she died so seised in 1411.<sup>10</sup> The honour of Camel eventually reverted to the Crown.

In 1202 Baldwin de Combe granted Sarah, late the wife of Robert le Dun, half a hide of land in Tidworth as dower, which she claimed from the freehold there, which had once belonged to Robert.<sup>11</sup> In the Testa de Nevill Simon le Dun is found holding Tidworth by one knight's fee of the old enfeoffment of Hubert de Burgh.<sup>12</sup> In October 1270 William le Dun was granted free warren on his demesne there,<sup>13</sup> and a month later a weekly market at his manor every Monday and a yearly fair on the vigil, feast and morrow of Holy Trinity.<sup>14</sup> This William died seised of the manor about 1286.<sup>15</sup> Two years later John le Dun was seeking to replevy his land in West Tidworth, which had been taken into the king's hands for his default against William de Nevill<sup>16</sup>; and in 1309 he was seeking to replevy his lands in South Tidworth, confiscated this time for his default against Alice late the wife of Roger Cleyn.<sup>17</sup> In 1309 he obtained licence to settle the manor on himself for life, with remainder to Stephen de Brightmerston and Joan his wife in tail, with contingent remainder to George de Brightmerston and Agnes his wife, Robert de Harnhill and Henry de Harnhill. This he did by means of a fine with William de Sherborne.<sup>18</sup> John le Dun died in 1332, and Stephen de Brightmerston being dead the manor descended to Nicholas de Wyly, who had married Stephen's daughter Isabel.<sup>19</sup> In 1333 licence was granted to Nicholas and Isabel de Wyly to enfeof John de Sewale and Isabel his wife of the manor and advowson of Tidworth, and for them to regrant the premises to Nicholas and Isabel in fee-tail.<sup>20</sup> In the following year Henry Burry of New Sarum and Agnes his wife, John de Sewale and Isabel his wife, and Nicholas de Wyly and Isabel his wife quitclaimed the same premises from themselves and the heirs of Agnes, Isabel and Isabel to Roger Norman and his heirs.<sup>21</sup> In 1337 Roger Norman was granted free warren in South Tidworth.<sup>22</sup> He died in 1349, leaving as his heir his grandson Giles,<sup>23</sup> who died while still under age in 1362.<sup>24</sup> Giles' heir was his cousin Margaret, daughter of Agnes Norman, sister of his father Roger Norman and wife of John Chamberlayne, but she died almost immediately afterwards, leaving as her heirs Julia, who married first Richard Cavendish and secondly John Shonne, Beatrice wife of John de Glemsford, and Christine wife of William Chamberlayne.<sup>25</sup> South Tidworth Manor was apparently assigned eventually to Julia, Richard Cavendish, her first husband, presenting a rector in 1373.<sup>26</sup> In 1375 the manor was settled upon her and her second husband, John Shonne, in fee-tail.<sup>27</sup> However, in spite of this settlement, it passed after Julia's death<sup>28</sup> to her daughter and heir by her first husband—Alice the wife of Richard Becket.<sup>29</sup> In 1391 Richard Becket and Alice his wife obtained an inseximus and confirmation of Roger Norman's charter of free warren,<sup>30</sup> and in 1411 Richard Becket died seised of the 'manor of South Tidworth, called the Middle Manor,' and the advowson in right of his wife Alice. He left a daughter Joan, wife of Robert Peny, as his heir.<sup>31</sup> At the assessment for an Aid in 1428 William Langbrook, John Peny, Richard Mayn, Thomas Mayn and William Gerard, who were apparently trustees, held Roger Norman's fee in Tidworth,<sup>32</sup> and three years afterwards Robert Peny of Tidworth held the fourth part of a fee there.<sup>33</sup>

The precise date at which the Dales acquired the manor is uncertain, but William Dale purchased Fyfield (q.v.) in 1484, and his son John Dale died in 1514 seised of the Middle, North and South Manors of South Tidworth.<sup>34</sup> John Dale grandson of John

The descent of the land representing the North and South Manors is traced below. By the end of the 17th century they had come to be regarded as forming one estate. Even before then, however, perfect consistency was not maintained. In a fine of 1594 what is described as the manor of South Tidworth appears, both from the extent and in relation to subsequent dealings, to imply all three manors (Feet of F. Div. Co. Mich. 36 & 37 Eliz.); and in the chancery suit between William Dale and John Cooke

Dale died so seised in 1522, leaving a daughter and heir Alice Dale, aged nine months,<sup>35</sup> who married and carried the manors to John Cooke.<sup>36</sup> In 1552 John Cooke and Alice his wife were parties to a fine for altering the entail from her heirs to his,<sup>37</sup> and four years later he entailed the manors and advowson on his youngest son, George Cooke.<sup>38</sup> In 1564, however, William Dale,<sup>39</sup> brother of John Dale, father of Alice Cooke, brought an action in Chancery against John Cooke to recover the manors as uncle and heir of Alice, who had died without issue. On Cooke's quoting the above-mentioned fine for altering the entail, the plaintiff responded 'that the said defendant did beat and very cruelly and unkindly handell and use his saide wiffe untill wth very extreme practizes wherewth she was daylie by a great space as it were tormented she forceably yielded to levye suche fyne.'<sup>40</sup> In spite of these charges Cooke remained in peaceable possession and died seised in 1568.<sup>41</sup> Seven years later his son George Cooke quitclaimed the North and South Manors to William Paulet Lord St. John (afterwards third Marquess of Winchester) and Agnes his wife.<sup>42</sup> This cannot have been a sale, for only the small sum of £200 passed between the parties, and two years later George Cooke dealt with the premises by recovery.<sup>43</sup> Nevertheless, the estate very shortly came, possibly by a foreclosure, to the Marquess of Winchester; for in 1594 he and his wife Agnes conveyed it in trust to William Wallop and Richard Lee,<sup>44</sup> and the marchioness dying in 1601 left the manor of South Tidworth to her daughter Katherine,<sup>45</sup> who married Sir Giles Wroughton. In 1622 Sir Giles and his wife quitclaimed from themselves and the heirs of Lady Wroughton the three manors and the advowson to Sir James Ley, bart., chief justice of England,<sup>46</sup> who was four years later created Earl of Marlborough.<sup>47</sup> The earl settled this property on Jane, his third wife,<sup>48</sup> who survived him, and in 1650, with her husband, William Ashburnham, and others, sold it to Thomas Smith.<sup>49</sup> The manor remained with his descendants<sup>50</sup> until 1859, when, on the death of Matilda (Webber) widow of Thomas Assheton Smith, it passed by will to her nephew Francis Sloane-Stanley of Leesthorpe Hall, Melton Mowbray, son of the Rev. George Sloane-Stanley and Laura Maria Webber. Mr. Sloane-Stanley sold it in 1877 to Sir John Kelk of Bentley Priory, first bart., and in 1897 Sir John William Kelk, second bart., sold it to the War Department.<sup>51</sup>

The 4 hides which Robert son of Gerold held in Thorngate Hundred,<sup>52</sup> joined with the 1½ hides which he held in Shipton Bellinger<sup>53</sup> in the same hundred, formed a holding which though not called a manor in mediaeval records is equivalent to the South Manor of the 16th century. For the most part it followed the descent of the Middle Manor, to which it was probably considered to appertain.

In 1270 William le Dun had a grant of free warren in his demesne lands of Tidworth and Shipton (Bellinger),<sup>54</sup> and in 1316 John le Dun held the hamlet of Tidworth in Thorngate Hundred.<sup>55</sup> This holding did not, however, pass with the Middle Manor from the heirs of John le Dun to Roger Norman (vide supra), and in 1346 it was the possession of Robert Lock and assessed at half a fee.<sup>56</sup> In 1428 it belonged to William Alexander and Robert Peny, of whom it may be noted that the first held the North and the second the Middle Manor.<sup>57</sup> At some date not long subsequent to this the holding passed to the Dales, became known as the South Manor, and henceforth followed the same descent as the two others. From the inquisition taken on the death of John Dale in 1514 it appears that the South Manor was held of the heirs of Avice de Columbers.<sup>58</sup>

The third Domesday holding in the parish was that of Croc the Huntsman, consisting of 2 hides which Alwin had held as a manor of the Confessor.<sup>59</sup> The evidence seems to show that Croc the Huntsman's Domesday holding was identical with what was afterwards known as the North Manor. That manor, like the South Manor, was held as of the heirs of Avice de Columbers,<sup>60</sup> for in 1208 Michael de Columbers gave 200 marks to marry Avice daughter of Ellis Croc, and to have the office of forester of Chute which Ellis held in fee.<sup>61</sup> This Ellis was of the in 1564 (vide infra) the plaintiff speaks of the three several manors in South Tidworth called 'the Southe mannor, the Myddell mannor, and the North mannor,' and the defendant speaks of 'the mannor and advowson of South Tidworth with the appurtenances in Hants and the manor of North Tidworth in Hants and Wilts,' 'which said two manors contain all the lands and tenements mentioned in the said bill' (Chan. Proc. [Ser. 2], bdle. 57, no. 38). It appears that the Middle and South Manor together were sometimes known as the South Manor, and that the North Manor was sometimes regarded as included in the manor of North Tidworth (cos. Hants and Wilts.).

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

family that gave its name to Crux Easton, which the Huntsman held in 1086.<sup>62</sup> In the Testa de Nevill Philip Croc is entered as holding four parts of a knight's fee in Tidworth (Toneworth) of the old enfeoffment of Avice de Columbers,<sup>63</sup> and in 1291 Thomas son of Philip Croc conveyed 2 carucates there to John de Drokensford,<sup>64</sup> who in his turn made a fine three years later with Philip de Drokensford concerning a messuage, a carucate of land and 40s. rent in Tidworth, which he was to hold for life at the rent of a rose with reversion to Philip and his heirs.<sup>65</sup> It is probable that the first as well as the second of these conveyances was a family matter; for, according to a pedigree in Glover's Collections,<sup>66</sup> John Drokensford, Bishop of Bath and Wells (1309-29), had a sister Joan, who married Philip Crook (sic). He also had a brother, Philip Drokensford, and it is possible these brothers were the parties to the second fine. In 1346 Roger Norman and Philip Drokensford held the fourth part of a fee which had belonged to John de Drokensford,<sup>67</sup> and in 1428 William Alexander and Edith his wife held the quarter fee which had belonged to Philip de Drokensford.<sup>68</sup> Towards the end of this century or the beginning of the next the manor passed to the Dales, and thereafter followed the same descent as the Middle Manor. In the inquisition taken on the death of John Dale in 1514 it was said to be held of the heirs of Avice de Columbers.<sup>69</sup>

The church of ST. MARY THE CHURCH VIRGIN is an entirely modern building erected in 1880. It is a copy of elaborate 13th-century work of stone with polished marble shafts in the columns of the arcade piers. The chancel floor is laid with Italian mosaic. The measurements are as follows:—Chancel 28 ft. 6 in. by 17 ft. 6 in., north and south transepts 14 ft. by 13 ft. 8 in., nave 42 ft. 10 in. by 17 ft. 6 in., with north and south aisles 10 ft. wide. There are also a north vestry and a south porch.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten of 1837 given by F. Dyson, rector, in 1838, a silver-gilt chalice and paten of 1877 and a silver-gilt flagon of 1869.

The registers are contained in five books. The first has baptisms from 1627 to 1643, burials from 1599 to 1644, and marriages 1600 to 1635. In this book there are also a few irregular entries of all three from 1655 to 1670, baptisms from 1684 to 1688 and from 1703 to 1712, also one marriage of 1703. The second book contains baptisms 1684 to 1783, burials 1681 to 1782, and marriages 1718 to 1752, with a gap in the burials from 1684 to 1690. Both of these books were repaired in 1908. The third book contains marriages only from 1761 to 1782, the fourth book baptisms and burials from 1783 to 1812, and the fifth book marriages only from 1788 to 1812.

In the burial-ground of this parish is a small mortuary chapel about 22 ft. long by 18 ft. wide, built of stones from the old parish church. In the east wall is a 14th-century window of three trefoiled lights with two quatrefoils over and a moulded label. The small windows in the north and south walls and the west doorway and porch are modern.

The church of SOUTH TID-ADVOWSON WORTH is mentioned in Domesday

Book with the larger holding of Robert son of Gerold,<sup>70</sup> and the advowson followed the descent of the Middle Manor,<sup>71</sup> the lords or their feoffees presenting until 1897, when Sir John William Kelk sold the manor to the War Department but retained the advowson.

The prebendary of Chute had a portion in this parish which in 1291 was assessed at 15s., the church itself being assessed at £10.<sup>72</sup>

The school was enlarged in 1903 for 110 children.

There are apparently no endowed charities in the parish.

WEYHILL WITH PENTON GRAFTON

Penintone (x cent.); Leweo (xiii cent.); La Woe (xiv cent.); Wee (xv cent.); Way (xvi cent.); Wey, Wayhill (xvii cent.).

The parish of Weyhill or Penton Grafton—in the latter name preserving the memory of its ancient subservience to the Abbots of Grestein (Normandy)—is bounded on the north by Wiltshire. The total area of the parish is 1,892 acres, comprising 1,214 acres of arable land, 434 acres of permanent grass and 124½ acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is light gravel, the subsoil chalk.<sup>2</sup> The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats, swedes, sainfoin and grass. The land slopes gently from north to south, the highest point marked on the ordnance map being 388 ft. on the northern border.

Ramridge House, the seat of Lieut.-Col. Charles D'Oyly Harmar, J.P., is a fine mansion standing in a park of 116 acres. This park contains some fine old trees and is adjoined on the north by a large copse. It was evidently a well-wooded spot in the 14th century, for in an extent of the manor made in 1361 the pasture and underwood of 50 acres of wood were found to be worth nothing on account of the shadow of the trees.<sup>3</sup> A mile north-east lies the hamlet of Clanville. Clanville Lodge, situated in its park of some 60 acres, was formerly known as Blissmore Hall. It is at present occupied by Captain Thomas Faith. In Clanville there is an old house, probably mediaeval, built of wattle and daub, the appearance of which has, however, been somewhat spoilt by a modern addition.<sup>4</sup>

The hamlets of Ragged Appleshaw and Nutbane are situated respectively in the north-west and north-east of the parish. Penton Grafton is in the extreme east and forms one village with Penton Mewsey.

The village of Weyhill lies towards the south of the parish on the high road from Andover to Devizes, about half a mile east from Weyhill station on the Midland and South Western Junction Railway. The church stands in the centre with the rectory hard by, and Weyhill House is at the east end. The fair ground is on Wey Hill, a little way west of the village.

A Roman villa on the north side of the lane between the hamlets of Clanville and Ragged Appleshaw was excavated in 1897.<sup>5</sup> Other Roman remains have been found about half a mile south between Ramridge House and Penton Grafton, and on the Devizes and Andover high road a mile north of Weyhill village on the east side of the road.<sup>6</sup>

Weyhill Down, comprising 680 acres, part of which lies in Appleshaw, was inclosed in 1812.<sup>8</sup>

The manor of RAMRIDGE (Ramme-MANORS rugge, Ramryge, xiv cent.; Ramradge, Ramsradge, xviii cent.), known earlier as PENTON or PENTON GRAFTON (Penitone, xi cent.; Penyton Croftyn alias Gresdeyn alias Greston, xiv cent.), was held by Edith queen of Edward the Confessor, and was granted by the Conqueror to the abbey of Grestein in Normandy,<sup>9</sup> as appears from an inspeximus of Edward II of a confirmation by Richard I of the English lands of the abbey.<sup>10</sup> It pertained to Wilmington Priory, a cell of Grestein, and in 1348, when the lands of alien priories were in the hands of the king, the abbot and convent of the Norman house had licence to grant Ramridge and other manors, with their knights' fees, advowsons and other appurtenances, to Tidemann de Lymbergh, the king's merchant, and his heirs and assigns for 1,000 years, saving always to the king during the war with France as much farm as the prior would render yearly, and other profits that belonged to him, and to the chief lords of the fee the due services.<sup>11</sup> Two years later, however, the king granted licence to Tidemann to demise these manors to whatsoever Englishman he would—so long as it were not in mortmain—to hold by the service of one knight's fee; he also pardoned him and his successors the farm above mentioned, which amounted in all to £86 11s. 9½d. yearly.<sup>12</sup> In accordance with this licence Tidemann assigned the property to Sir Thomas de la Pole, to whom in 1354 the Abbot of Grestein released Ramridge and the other manors<sup>13</sup>; but it was not until 1372 that they were relieved from ecclesiastical taxation.<sup>14</sup> Sir Thomas de la Pole died in 1361 seised accordingly.<sup>15</sup> He left an infant daughter Katherine, whose death occurred in the following year,<sup>16</sup> and Ramridge passed to his brother Michael, afterwards famous as chancellor to Richard II and first Earl of Suffolk.<sup>17</sup> In 1380 Michael de la Pole granted Ramridge with Conock (co. Wilts) to Thomas, one of his younger sons, for life.<sup>18</sup> This was converted a few years afterwards to an estate in tail-male.<sup>19</sup> On the death of Sir Thomas de la Pole in 1420<sup>20</sup> the manor passed to his son Thomas, and eventually, on the death of the latter without issue, ten years later, to his second cousin, William fourth Earl and afterwards Duke of Suffolk.<sup>21</sup> The earl had married Alice Chaucer, daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Chaucer of Ewelme (co. Oxon.), by Matilda daughter and co-heir of Sir John Burgersh. In 1437<sup>22</sup> he founded the Ewelme Hospital or God's House (co. Oxon.), endowing it in 1442 with the manors of Conock (co. Wilts.), Ramridge (co. Hants), and Marsh (co. Bucks.).<sup>23</sup> The sixth statute of the almshouse is as follows:—

'Also we woll that this present wrytyng and ordynauce verrely shewe and signifie all times to com that it is owre full and hole will that the same Maystre, techer of grammer and pore men and theyre successours for ever more have and holde of our yifte and graunte to them and their successours for ever in pure and perpetuall almesse, to her sustenance and to here othir certeyn charges aftywardes in this oure present ordynauce to be rehersed, iii maners with theyre hole appurtenaunce, excepte the advowsons of the churches perteynyng to the seide maners to us and to our heyres reserved; of the which iii maners one is cleped Ramruge in Hamptshyre, the secunde Connok in Wiltshire, the iii<sup>de</sup> is cleped Mershe in the shire of Bokyngham, lyke as it appereth in the dedes, munimentis, and grauntes openly made of the saide iii maners with their appurtenaunces to the said maystir and techer of grammer and pore men, and to their successours in perpetuite, withoute any impetycion, lettyng, or any occasion of us, of our heyres, or of oure assignes whatsoever they be.'<sup>24</sup>

The letter of this statute has been adhered to, and Ramridge is still the right of the chaplain and poor men of Ewelme. There is a considerable collection of court rolls and other MSS. belonging to the almshouse, from which information may be gleaned as to the conduct of the manor. Towards the end of the 16th century we find the lord claiming a brown cow as heriot,<sup>25</sup> and a little later there is an order that the tenants shall, in proportion to their holdings, dig a ditch, called the 'Heathe dicke,' 3 ft. deep and 3 ft. wide, under a penalty; and that all the tenants shall keep the two meadows, 'Ellemeade and Moremeade,' without beasts.<sup>26</sup> In 1653 there was a mock presentment of Edward Walker for locking the buttery door contrary to the custom of the manor, signed Nicholas

Nemo.<sup>27</sup> In 1658 and again three years later the farmer was presented for not allowing sufficient churchway, contrary to the statute.<sup>28</sup>

A windmill is mentioned as appertaining to Ramridge Manor in a 14th-century inquisition,<sup>29</sup> but there is none in the parish to-day.

The Abbot and convent of Grestein also possessed land in CLANVILLE.<sup>30</sup> Precisely when it became their property has not been ascertained, but a confirmation by Edward II of gifts to the abbey recites the grant that William de Mersey made of all that land in Penton Grafton and Clanville which had belonged to Randolph de la Hulle and Alice his wife.<sup>31</sup> This gives an approximate date, for Randolph de la Hulle conveyed land in Clanville to William de Mersey in 1252.<sup>32</sup> In 1293 Nicholas Durdant died seised of land in Clanville belonging to the fee of the Abbot of Grestein,<sup>33</sup> and three years afterwards, when William de Mersey granted a messuage and land in Penton Grafton and Clanville to John de Kudelinton, the transaction was confirmed by the abbot as overlord.<sup>34</sup> In the Nomina Villarum of 1316 the vill of Clanville is assigned to the abbot,<sup>35</sup> and it is to be presumed that the subsequent descent of this holding is identical with that of Ramridge Manor. In an Inclosure Award of 1812 it is stated that the whole of the hamlets or townships of Penton Grafton, Clanville and Nutbane are comprised in the manor.<sup>36</sup>

The 1½ hides in CLANVILLE (Clavesfelle, xi cent.; Clevesfelde, xiii cent.; Clanefeld, xiv cent.), which Azor held of King Edward as an alod and Herbert held of Hugh de Port in 1086,<sup>37</sup> represents the estate later known as BLISSMORE HALL (Busemerhale, xiii cent.; Besemerale, xiv cent.). The overlordship continued with the descendants of Hugh de Port, Clanville occurring in lists of the St. John knights' fees as late as 1349.<sup>38</sup> In the 17th century it was held of the king as of the manor of Greenwich.<sup>39</sup> The intermediate lordship belonged to Herbert Fitz Peter and his descendants. At the beginning of the 13th century half a knight's fee in Blissmore was held by the heirs of Robert le Markaunt of Herbert Fitz Peter.<sup>40</sup> Henry le Markaunt, a descendant of Robert le Markaunt, was the holder at the beginning of the reign of Edward III.<sup>41</sup> He apparently soon parted with the estate, for in 1346 Richard Crul (sic) and the Prior of Ogbourne were stated to be holding the fourth part of a knight's fee in Blissmore and Clanville, which had belonged to Henry le Markaunt.<sup>42</sup> The same holding was in the possession of John Crabbe and the Prior of Ogbourne in 1428.<sup>43</sup> Blissmore Hall Acre is frequently mentioned in the disputes over Weyhill Fair in the 16th and 17th centuries as the site in which part of the fair was held. In the late 17th and early 18th centuries the Kent family<sup>44</sup> (co. Wilts.) held Blissmore Hall, but by the early part of the 19th century, when it was held by Henry Bosanquet, sheriff of Southampton,<sup>45</sup> its name was changed to Clanville Lodge (q.v. supra).

Weyhill Fair is one of the largest and most celebrated in England. Originally held on 28, 29 and 30 September, it was subsequently postponed until 8 October, its duration being lengthened to six days.<sup>46</sup> For many years, however, it has been held on 10 October and the five days following. There is a singular dearth of early records concerning it, and the date of its foundation has not been discovered, though there is a late and doubtful reference to a lost charter of John<sup>47</sup>; but Langland mentions it in Piers Plowman, coupling it with the great fair at Winchester. More recently it has been celebrated in literature by Mr. Thomas Hardy in The Mayor of Casterbridge. It drew folk from all parts of the country, inasmuch that in 1665 it was deemed expedient to forbid its being held for fear of spreading the plague.<sup>48</sup> Cobbett visited the fair and described it in his Rural Rides (published in 1822). He found a depressing state of affairs. A few years earlier £300,000 would have changed hands; at that time probably under £70,000, though the rents of the sheep-sellers were, perhaps, as high as ever. 'The countenances of the farmers were descriptive of their ruinous state.' On another part of the down, he visited the horse show, and 'saw horses keeping pace in depression with the sheep.' In the great days of the fair 140,000 sheep were sometimes sold in a day,<sup>49</sup> but conditions have altered since then. In 1895 the total sales were reckoned to have been between 17,000 and 20,000.<sup>50</sup>

In 1784 a 'sudden and terrible fire' broke out in a booth called the 'White Hart,' and spreading to neighbouring booths did damage to the extent of £888 13s. 9d.<sup>51</sup>

It seems probable that the fair (though never specifically named in the inquisitions post mortem) was originally an appurtenance of the manor of Ramridge and passed with it to Ewelme Hospital (vide supra). This explains why Princess Elizabeth was interested in the fair since Edward VI had granted her for the term of her life the manor and park of Ewelme,<sup>52</sup> which carried with it, according to the statutes drawn up by William de la Pole, the patronage of the hospital.<sup>53</sup> Accordingly in 1554 Princess Elizabeth wrote to Cecil, her future treasurer, to complain of the misdeeds of Thomas Key, paymaster of 'myne almshouse in Ewelme,' who, among other iniquities, was endeavouring to bring about the removal of Weyhill Fair to Andover, to the great damage of the tenants of Weyhill. Key and his accomplices were trying to effect this purpose by Act of Parliament, and Elizabeth besought Cecil to frustrate them.<sup>54</sup> In this the secretary was evidently successful. Nothing is heard of the removal to Andover for many years to come. Nevertheless the question of the ownership of the fair gave rise to disputes, owing to the fact that it was held partly on the Ramridge demesne land, partly on Blissmore Hall Acre (vide supra) and partly on the glebe. Thus, when Elizabeth was on the throne, Alexander Bolton, the master of the hospital, fighting his own battles this time, went to law with Robert Noyes, tenant of Blissmore Hall. This was the sequel to an earlier dispute between John Spence, a former master, and Sir John Rogers, a former tenant, which Sir William Paulet, the treasurer of England, had decided in favour of the almshouse.<sup>55</sup> Again, in 1672, W. Tayleur<sup>56</sup> lodged a petition with the Lord Chancellor, stating that as the rectors had ceased to reside by reason of the ruinous condition of the rectory house, the tenants of Ramridge were little by little drawing the trade of the fair on to their own grounds by setting up stands for tradesmen, pens for sheep and such like.<sup>57</sup>

In this year is heard the first note of a dispute which was to result in a tedious and complicated series of law-suits. Randall Saunderson, the rector of Weyhill, writing in August to Williamson, the clerk of the council, gives some interesting details. As already stated, there were three persons who benefited 'by breaking the ground at Weyhill Fair.' First, there was the parson himself, who paid for the privilege both in first-fruits and also yearly in tenths, as Saunderson had learned at the Exchequer at the time of his institution in 1649; secondly, the landlord of Blissmore Hall—at this time one Mr. Kent, 'an idiot or changeling'—and, thirdly, Mr. Drake, who farmed Ramridge under Ewelme Hospital, as he and his father had done for forty-five or forty-six years. The writer goes on to state that Mr. Baker (presumably a slip for Drake) claimed the profits of tollage, &c., under a charter of King John, which was alleged to have been lost, and that these let for £30 a year. This was an injustice both to the parsonage and to Blissmore Hall, but another danger threatened which made it necessary for Saunderson to join, for the present, with Mr. Drake and 'afterwards play my own game with the oppressor and extortioner of Ramridge.'<sup>58</sup>

The trouble was that of late years the men of Andover had been putting forward a claim based on their charter of 1599 and endeavouring to move the fair from its old ground.<sup>59</sup> In September 1672 a caveat was issued that no grant should pass for holding a fair near Andover to the prejudice of Weyhill nor for removing that at Weyhill nearer Andover.<sup>60</sup> This, however, had little effect. At the fair in the following year the men of the borough made a disturbance, endeavouring to move it from the hospital lands. The king was petitioned to intervene; and an order in council was issued in favour of the ancient site. But even that failed to quiet the men of Andover; and the master and poor men of Ewelme with their tenant, William Drake, and Constance his wife, accordingly brought an action at law, which was decided in their favour 26 July 1674.<sup>61</sup> But this was not the end of the matter. Lawsuits multiplied and became so costly that the borough was constrained to borrow money with which to carry them on. In November 1682 an order was made that these loans should be repaid out of the profits of the fair, if the same should be recovered.<sup>62</sup> The hopeful tone of this order was induced by the fact that the borough had recently surrendered its charter and obtained a new one which empowered the burgesses to hold a fair wherever they pleased on Weyhill.<sup>63</sup> They at once removed it to Cholderton.<sup>64</sup> The master of the hospital and his tenants, however, were prepared to fight the matter to the end, and in 1684 obtained verdicts both at the assizes and at the Exchequer from juries of Hampshire men.<sup>65</sup> They also obtained an injunction in Chancery to quiet their possession.<sup>66</sup> But in 1685, the Exchequer verdict having been set aside on the ground that the jury was prejudiced, a Middlesex jury found for the borough.<sup>67</sup> The plaintiffs appealed, and the Lord Chancellor ordered Sir Robert Sawyer, the attorney-general, to mediate.<sup>68</sup> Representatives of the contending parties met at Highclere, the attorney-general's Hampshire seat. What passed is told in the following note:—

'Note yt on tuesday 10 Aug. 86, Mr. Attorney-Generall in ye presence of severall members of Andever Corporacon, and of Dr. Dixon, Rector of Wayhill, proposed an accomodacon an yt Andever should be kynde to ye church, and should give him for ye use of his glebe £20 per ann. duringe faire at Wayhill, and remitt ye 3 last years profits and his part of ye costs, ye Dr. craved tyme to consider of it till tuesday then next following, at wch tyme he declared yt he would not assent thereto unless Andever would give him £10 per ann. more.'<sup>69</sup>

In 1694, as the result of an action brought by the town of Andover against Dr. Dixon, it was decreed <sup>54</sup> Hist. MSS. Com. Rep. xiii, App. ii, 8, 9. Although Elizabeth speaks of the fair as 'being a private matter, and being myne interest,' it is to be presumed that she is identifying herself with the almshouse and did not personally get any tangible profits from the fair. Ewelme remained a royal manor (and the hospital, accordingly, under royal patronage) until early in the 19th century, when it was sold to the Earl of Macclesfield (see V.C.H. Oxon. ii, 156). James I annexed the mastership of the hospital to the Regius Professorship of Physic at Oxford (ibid.).

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

that the town should have that parcel of glebe-land on which part of the fair was held to its absolute use during fair time, paying the rector £35 yearly for the same.<sup>70</sup> Dr. Dixon does not seem to have made a good bargain, for, at the fair of 1683, 30,000 sheep standing on his glebe had brought him in £65.<sup>71</sup> Meanwhile the profits of the fair accruing to Mr. Drake, as tenant of Ramridge, had been assessed at £177, which on 20 April 1687 the plaintiffs were ordered to pay over to the defendants.<sup>72</sup> In the following June, the money having been paid, the Master of the Rolls ordered that the bill should be absolutely dismissed.<sup>73</sup> This was not the end of the matter. On a bill of review the lords commissioners, on 22 November 1690, ordered a new trial between the same parties at the King's Bench, before a Hampshire jury, who found for the plaintiffs, their verdict being affirmed by the lords commissioners on 22 May following. On 22 September, however, the defendants obtained an order from the commissioners, enjoining the hospital from setting up pens, &c., on their own land, otherwise than as the town should appoint. Then, getting secret leases of the glebe and of Blissmore Hall Acre, they set up the most profitable part of the fair there. The hospital took the matter to the House of Lords, who on 4 February 1692 reversed the decree of 22 September.<sup>74</sup> Henceforth the borough seems to have contented itself with taking leases of the glebe and Blissmore Hall Acre.<sup>75</sup>

A court of pie-powder was held at the fair until recent times.<sup>76</sup> The ceremony of 'horning the colt' was practised there and was continued into the 19th century.<sup>77</sup>

Besides the great fair there is also one for sheep, cows and pigs on the second Thursday in April and a lamb fair on the last Friday in July.

The church of ST. MICHAEL consists of a chancel 24 ft. 10 in. by 13 ft. 6 in., with a small modern vestry to the north, nave 50 ft. 4 in. by 15 ft. 3 in., north transept 18 ft. 8 in. by 14 ft. 7 in., south aisle 41 ft. 2 in. by 12 ft., and south porch, all inside dimensions.

A great part of the building is modern. The transept was built early in the 19th century, the south aisle and porch in 1864-5, the nave has been rebuilt except part of its north wall, with a new wooden bell-turret, and the chancel was restored in 1880. The chancel arch probably dates from the end of the 12th century, and the chancel itself is of the 13th century, preserving its original north windows and the inner jambs of one of those on the south, together with the south doorway. The chancel is not on the same axis as the nave, but set to the north of it; its south wall is probably on the line of that of the earlier chancel, but its north wall is on the same line as that of the nave. The south-east quoins of the aisleless nave are partly visible under the ivy, and look early, but too little of them can be seen to settle the point. The east window of the chancel is a modern one of three lancet lights, but the inner jambs are old, and evidently belonged to a single-light window. The two north windows have internal rebates and chamfered rear arches, the eastern window also has an old edge roll to its sill inside. Of the pair on the south wall the western is entirely modern, the other is modern outside. The chancel arch has square jambs with small edge chamfers stopped out above the floor; the abaci are quirked and hollow chamfered, and the arch is semi-circular with small chamfers stopped square over the abaci.

A modern arch opens from the nave into the north transept, and east of it is a small modern wood-framed window to light the pulpit. Two modern lancets light the nave on the north; the west window of two lights is also modern.

An arcade of three bays with round pillars and pointed arches divides the nave from the aisle. This has single lancet windows in its east and west walls, and on the south two lancets and a two-light window. The south doorway is set between the second and third windows, and, like the rest, is modern.

The transept has wood-framed single lights in its side walls and a modern north window of two lights.

The vestry is entered from the north of the chancel and has an outer east doorway; it is lighted by a three-light window to the north.

The low-pitched roof is old, probably 16th-century work, the ties, purlins and principal rafters being moulded. The bell-turret is a modern one of oak with foliated and louvred openings to the bell chamber; over it is a low four-sided spire covered with oak shingles.

The altar table is modern; to the south of it stands a small 18th-century table used as a credence. The pulpit is a modern one of stone and stands in the north-east corner of the nave. The font is octagonal, quite plain, and whitewashed, with a very shallow bowl: it has the marks of staples in its upper edge, but otherwise shows no signs of antiquity.

The oldest monuments are two in the chancel of 18th-century date; a number of others are set in the transept.

The turret contains a clock and four bells, only the tenor of which is hung for ringing; it is by Mears & Stainbank, 1907, as also is the third; the second is ancient, inscribed in Lombardic capitals '●scs MICHAEL.' The treble is an old one recast in 1907, its inscription is '●SANCT MICHAEL.'

In the east wall of the vestry is set an ancient stone, apparently a coffin-lid, the lower half of which has a cross of early form, with expanded ends to the arms, set in a sunk panel; the cross stands on a pedestal with a spreading foot. The upper part of the stone has been defaced, and a generation or two ago, when the stone stood in the south wall of the nave, the old villagers used to point this out to their children and bid them curse the memory of Cromwell, the presumed author of the disfigurement. It seems possible that it contained a hand issuing from clouds as at Romsey and Headbourne Worthy; the slab is probably not later than the beginning of the 11th century. To the south of the church is the base (now retooled) of a cross found in the churchyard by the present rector in 1904; it has sloping sides, a round mould at the bottom, and it is pierced right through each way by pointed openings. In it has been set a cross of orange red 'stone of unction,' brought from Jerusalem in 1905.

The plate consists of a silver Elizabethan chalice, a chalice and paten of 1722, given by Eliza widow of John Kent of Devizes, a silver flagon of 1871, and an alms plate of 1692 (?), given by Henry Bosanquet of Clanville Lodge in 1815.

The first book of the registers contains mixed entries from 1564 to 1780, the second has marriages 1754 to 1799, the third continues them to 1813, and the fourth has baptisms and burials 1781 to 1813.

The church of Weyhill, which is ADVOWSON mentioned in Domesday Book,<sup>78</sup> was granted with the manor to the Abbot of Grestein by William the Conqueror.<sup>79</sup> Following the descent of the manor<sup>80</sup> it came, in the middle of the 14th century, to Sir Thomas de la Pole. When, however, William Earl of Suffolk endowed Ewelme Hospital in 1442 he reserved the advowson,<sup>81</sup> which, it is to be presumed, came into the hands of the king on the attainder of Edmund Earl of Suffolk in 1504.<sup>82</sup> In 1626 Charles I, at the suit of the queen, granted this and other Hampshire advowsons to Queen's College, Oxford,<sup>83</sup> the provost and fellows of which foundation still present.

In the 13th century the fruits of this living were equally divided between the rector and the Abbot of Grestein, each portion being valued in 1291 at £3 13s. 4d.<sup>84</sup> This accounts for the expression, 'Institution to a moiety of the church,' found in the registers of Bishops Woodlock, Sendale and Asser.<sup>85</sup>

Part of Weyhill Fair is held on the glebe land,<sup>86</sup> a circumstance which involved the rector, Thomas Dixon, in the lawsuits with the town of Andover recorded above. Dr. Dixon had been presented to the living in 1682. The circumstances of his appointment were somewhat peculiar. 'To the amazement of everybody Mr. Crosthwaite has resigned Weyhill. The Provost, upon his giving it up, desired me to carry him to the tavern and to give him as much wine as he could drink, that he might say he was not himself when he did it. Several other remarks have been made upon it both by him and others, so that I am forced to take it to avoid such imputations. The glebe, tithes and from £50 to £60 from the two days' fair held there, have generally been let for about £215 a year.'<sup>87</sup>

There is a Primitive Methodist chapel at Weyhill.

The school at Weyhill was built in 1863 and enlarged in 1897 for eighty children. There is also a school at Clanville for fifty children.

The poor of this parish receive £1 CHARITIES a year from John Read's Charity (see under Penton Mewsey).

In 1759 Richard Taunton, by will, left £200, the interest to be applied in the distribution of bread. The legacy is represented by £212 5s. 9d. consols with the official trustees, producing yearly £5 6s., which is duly distributed in bread.

The official trustees also hold £345 Midland Railway 2½ per cent. preference stock and £173 Great Western Railway 5 per cent. rent charge stock in trust for the charity of Henry Fowle-Smith Donalson, producing a yearly income of £17 5s. 6d.

THE HUNDRED OF WHERWELL

CONTAINING THE PARISHES OF

LONGPARISH

TUFTON OR TUCKINGTON

WHERWELL WITH WESTOVER

The above list represents the extent of the hundred in 1831.<sup>1</sup> Between 1831 and 1841 the following changes were made. Abbotts Ann, of which only the tithing of Little Ann had been always reckoned in Wherwell Hundred, was wholly transferred from Andover Hundred (q.v.) thither. Chilbolton, formerly in Buddlesgate Hundred, was added to Wherwell, while Tufton was moved from Wherwell to Whitchurch Hundred.

To Welford Hundred of Domesday Book—the Wherwell Hundred of a later date—six manors are assigned :—Wherwell, Tufton, Goodworth, Little Ann, Middleton (Longparish) and Bullington. All these were then held by Wherwell Abbey and had been in the Confessor's day, when the total assessment of the six manors was 67 hides as against 37 hides 3½ virgates at the later date.<sup>2</sup> Fullerton in Wherwell, the only manor in any of the parishes of Wherwell Hundred which the house of Elfrida's foundation did not possess, was at the great Survey counted as in the hundred of King's Somborne, and was then, as it remained, in the hands of Hyde Abbey. Little Ann, though severed from the rest of the Wherwell manors, is still included in this hundred; it is treated, however, as in that of Andover with its parish of Abbotts Ann.<sup>3</sup>

The abbey was thus paramount in the hundred. By a grant of King John it was quit for ever of all shires and hundreds, suits of shires and hundreds, aids of sheriffs, reeves and bailiffs and plaints and exactions to them appertaining.<sup>4</sup> This comprehensive charter, which included also the grant of a fair at Wherwell, was more than once confirmed.

Harewood Forest, to-day one of the largest tracts of woodland in this part of the shire, lies wholly within the hundred. It belonged to the community at Wherwell, and in 1378 the abbess, Cecily de Lavyngtone, received confirmation of a reputed charter of King Alfred, giving the wood to her monastery, which in Alfred's day had, unfortunately, still a century to wait for its foundation.<sup>5</sup> It was doubtless on the strength of this same charter that thirty years previously the then abbess had petitioned the king against his forest servants. Alfred son of Osgar, late Earl of Devon, she said, had founded the abbey and given Harewood to the abbess and her nuns. The wood had ever been found to be without any forest and had been held peaceably without interference; but now the ministers of Chute Forest, asserting the wood to be royal demesne, had attached it to the forest and put their officers therein, preventing the abbess from hunting and taking her profits.<sup>6</sup> This petition was scarcely well founded, for in 1296 the abbess then in office had been licensed to fell and to sell 60 acres of underwood in her wood of Harewood, which was within the metes of the forest of Chute, on condition that she forthwith inclosed the wood with a dike and hedge so that the underwood might grow again.<sup>7</sup>

Claim of the right to chattels of fugitives in the hundred of 'Mestowe'<sup>8</sup> by the religious of Wherwell led to a lawsuit in the reign of Richard II. One Henry Harold had killed his wife Isabel at Wherwell within the hundred and fled to the church there. The abbess asserted her right, and the murderer's belongings to the value of £35 4s. 8d. were seized by her reeve. The matter went to the King's Bench, where judgement was given for the abbess, but was not delivered because of a difference of opinion among the justices. The abbess, therefore, petitioned the king, who by letters patent granted her the disputed privilege during his life and insured her against molestation for the sum in question.<sup>9</sup>

When the Dissolution bereft the nuns of church and lands the Lords De La Warr became lords of the hundred as of the manors within it. And so they continued—holding their courts, no doubt, at 'Mustwood,' 'the litle house to keepe Courts and laweday in'<sup>10</sup>—until the great sale of 1695 that transferred the estates to Edmond Boulter of London.

BULLINGTON

Bulandun, Bolende (xi cent.); Bolendon, Bolyndene (xiii cent.).

The parish of Bullington is bounded on the north by Tufton, on the east and south by Wonston and on the west by Barton Stacey, part of the boundary on this side being formed by a narrow strip of woodland called Barton Stacey Belt. The average height above sea level is 300 ft. in the north and south, sinking to 200 ft. in the valley of the tributary of the Test that runs through the village, and for some distance divides this parish from Wonston.

The soil is loam and the subsoil chalk. The chief crops are wheat, barley and oats. The total area is 1,635 acres, comprising 1,184½ acres of arable land, 256½ acres of permanent grass and 39 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup>

The Didcot, Newbury and Southampton branch of the Great Western Railway runs through the parish, but there is no station.

A road from Barton Stacey passes through the village, and on Bullington Common meets the road from Whitechurch to Winchester, here called Bullington Lane. Another road runs from east to west half a mile north of the village. Bullington House is the residence of Mr. Henry Nicoll, J.P., who is lord of the manor.

There is a camp known as Tidbury Ring about a mile and a quarter north of the village, where Roman remains have been found.<sup>2</sup>

By an addition dated six years after his MANOR confirmation charter of 1002 Ethelred gave to Wherwell Abbey 10 mansae in the place 'qui solito Bulendun nomine solet appellari.'<sup>3</sup> At Domesday the abbey was said always to have held the manor as 10 hides; but it had never paid geld.<sup>4</sup> In 1291 it is included in the list of the abbey's possessions, being then valued at £18 12s. 8½d.<sup>5</sup> With the rest of the Wherwell property Bullington passed from the abbey to Thomas West Lord De La Warr, from whose heirs it was in due course bought by Edmond Boulter in 1695.<sup>6</sup> Three years later Boulter and his trustees sold the manor with that of Little Ann to Cornelius Cornwallis of Earlstone (co. Hants).<sup>7</sup> The tenure of this new purchaser would not seem to have been a long one, for in 1724 Richard Widmore was selling Bullington to Peter Hawker,<sup>8</sup> to whose heirs it descended. In 1903 the trustees of the late Mr. Peter James Duff Hawker, of Longparish House, were still lords of the manor, which has since been acquired by Mr. Henry Nicoll.

About 1219 Geoffrey of Bullington conveyed to Robert of Bullington 2 virgates of land in Bullington to be held of Eufemia, Abbess of Wherwell by the service of 10s. and ten hens at Michaelmas. These 2 virgates were part of 2 hides for the residue of which Robert quitclaimed Geoffrey.<sup>9</sup>

In 1241 Alexander of Bullington granted the Abbess Eufemia and her successors common rights with himself in the fishery from the top of his garden to the top of 'Chynepol' towards the east, with the exception of the water extending from Alexander's mill to the top of his garden, wherein the abbesses were not to fish. For this grant the abbess gave Alexander a sparrow hawk.<sup>10</sup>

In 1263 Thomas of Bullington and his wife Annora quitclaimed a messuage and a virgate of land in Bullington to the Abbess Mabel and her convent. The abbess agreed to provide for Thomas the allowance of one chaplain in her house, that is to say, seven convent loaves and eleven gallons of beer, half to be of convent beer and half of such beer as the servants had; of kitchen dishes as much as pertained to one chaplain, and for raiment 6s. 8d. yearly at Michaelmas. For Annora she undertook to provide a nun's portion, which seems to have been the same as a chaplain's with half the allowance of beer.<sup>11</sup>

In 1086 there was a mill in Bullington worth 15s.,<sup>12</sup> probably representing the water-mill which the college of St. Elizabeth, Winchester, rented from the Abbess and convent of Wherwell during the 14th century.<sup>13</sup> Alexander of Bullington also owned a mill in the parish in 1241.<sup>14</sup> At the present day there is one water-mill there worked by the Test.

The church of ST. MICHAEL is a CHURCH plain rectangular structure built of flint rubble with ashlar quoins 44 ft. 7 in. by 14 ft. 10 in., with a north vestry and organ chamber 13 ft. 1 in. wide and 5 ft. 10 in. deep, south porch, and west tower 9 ft. 2 in. by 7 ft. 3 in.

The nave—about 34 ft. of the length—dates from the latter part of the 12th century, two small windows near the west end and the north doorway being of that date; the chancel was rebuilt about 1220 and its width made equal to that of the nave. The two double-light windows south of the nave, although now modernized outside, were insertions of the end of the 14th century; the tower, north vestry, &c., and the south porch are all modern additions and a good deal of modern repair has been done.

In the east wall of the chancel is a triplet of lancets with trefoiled rear arches, all of modern stonework, and the quoins at the eastern angles are likewise modern.

To the south of the chancel is a modern priest's doorway, and to the west of this a 13th-century lancet with a modern sill. There was a similar lancet on the opposite side, but this was removed when the modern arch into the organ-chamber, &c., was made and is now in the west wall of the chamber; in its east wall is a modern copy of the window. The north doorway of the nave is now blocked, its jambs outside are chamfered, with scalloped stops below the chamfered abaci; the semicircular arch is of square section with a chamfered label; its internal east jamb is chamfered and stopped like those outside but the west jamb is square, and the rear arch is segmental, of square section. Near the west end is a small contemporary round-headed window with splayed inner jambs. The first two windows in the south wall are each of two trefoiled ogee-headed lights under a square head; the outer stonework is all modernized, but the inner quoins are old; the third window is of 12th-century date like that opposite. The south doorway has modern stonework outside but old inner quoins and segmental rear arch; the outer arch is round-headed with small engaged angle shafts with plain capitals and bases.

A round-headed plastered archway opens into the tower, which is built of flint and brick. The west window appears to be a 15th-century one re-used, and was probably in the former west wall; it has two trefoiled round-headed lights with a quatrefoil above. Over this is a modern trefoiled light to the chamber above. The bell-chamber windows are each of two trefoiled lights with a quatrefoil above. The roof is hipped, east and west, with brick eaves and cornice.

The roofs are open timbered and covered with tiles; over the chancel the braces to the rafters are arched. The porch is an open one of wood, on a low stone base; a few of its timbers seem to be old.

The font, which stands in the tower, has an old round bowl probably of 13th-century date on a modern stem and base. The other furniture is modern.

There are three bells: the first inscribed, 'Joseph Carter made mee 1599'; the second, 'Henry Knight made mee 1680'; and the tenor, 'Sancta Ana ora pro nobis.'

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten of 1859 and a plated flagon.

The first book of registers contains baptisms 1725 to 1782, with seven entries of marriages at Tufton; the second, burials 1725 to 1782. The third book has marriages 1755 to 1813; before this date marriages were celebrated at the mother church of Wherwell. The fourth book contains baptisms and burials 1783 to 1814 on the printed Salisbury form.

The church of St. Michael of ADVOWSON Bullington is mentioned in a list of Wherwell Abbey possessions in 1228.<sup>15</sup> It was formerly a chapel annexed to Wherwell and was declared a perpetual curacy in 1857 and a vicarage in 1865.<sup>16</sup> It is in the gift of Mr. William Henry Iremonger of Wherwell Priory, and has the chapelry of Tufton annexed.

In 1300 Thomas of Cambridge, rector of Wherwell, granted to the abbess and convent all fruits of the chapels of Tufton and Bullington, and all their lands, except the tithes customarily belonging to the chaplain, for three years for £40 a year.<sup>17</sup>

There are apparently no endowed charities in this parish.

GOODWORTH CLATFORD

Godorde (xi cent.); Godewirda, Gudeworth, Godeworth (xiii cent.); Good (xvi cent.); Good Clatford (xvii cent.).

The parish of Goodworth Clatford, or Nether or Lower Clatford as it is occasionally called, is a narrow strip lying between Upper Clatford, Andover, Wherwell and Lower Wallop, and has a station on the Andover and Redbridge branch of the London and South Western Railway. The land slopes upwards from the south-west, where it averages something over 200 ft., to nearly 400 ft. at the top of Cow Down. The soil is a light loam, the subsoil chalk with a small 'outlier' of the Woolwich and Reading beds in Cowdown Copse and alluvial deposits in the valley of the Anton. The principal crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips. The total area of the parish is 2,200 acres of land and 9 acres of land covered by water. About two-thirds of the land area is arable.<sup>1</sup> The west end of Harewood Forest, including the spur known as Upping Copse, lies in this parish.

The village is situated near the right bank of the Anton on the high road that comes north from Stockbridge. There is another road running across Cow Down and almost the whole length of the parish.

The manor of GOODWORTH MANOR CLATFORD has from the earliest times followed the same descent as Wherwell (q.v.), and is now the property of Mr. William Henry Iremonger of Wherwell Priory. In Domesday 'Godorde' is assessed at half a hide and valued at 40s.,<sup>2</sup> and in 1291 it was valued among the Abbess of Wherwell's possessions at £10 0s. 9d.<sup>3</sup>

Henry le Wayte had in 1325 a licence for the alienation in mortmain of a messuage and land in Goodworth, Wherwell and Aston to the Abbess and convent of Wherwell that divine service might be daily celebrated in the abbey church for the souls of the faithful departed.<sup>4</sup>

There is no mention of a mill at Goodworth Clatford in Domesday Book, but in 1320 Abbess Isabel and the convent of Wherwell granted to John of Trente, Maud his wife and Amice their daughter a piece of ground for building a fulling mill by the bridge between Goodworth and Clatford on the north, a field, a house with a croft, and one beam (lignum) yearly for keeping the mill in repair.<sup>5</sup> There is now a corn-mill in the north-west of the parish, not far from the Upper Clatford boundary.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The church of ST. PETER consists of a chancel 27 ft. 3 in. by 13 ft. 6 in., with north organ chamber and vestry, nave of like width and 41 ft. 10 in. long, north aisle 10 ft. 1 in. and south aisle 8 ft. 7 in. wide, south porch, and west tower 12 ft. 3 in. by 12 ft. All the measurements are taken within the walls.

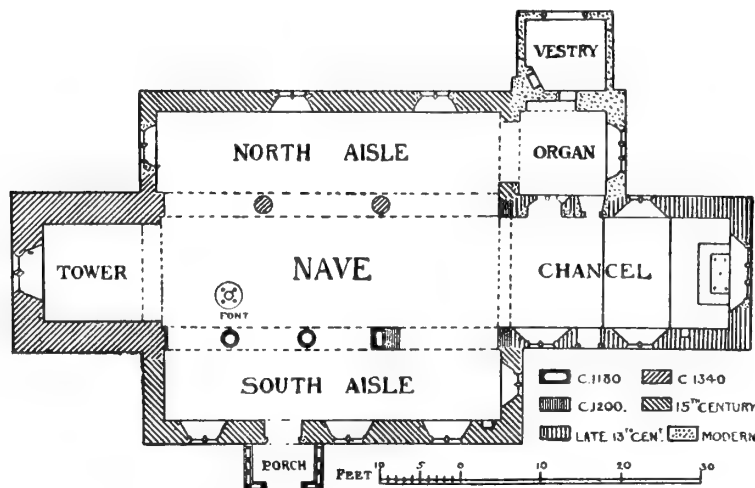

The church from which the present structure has grown was probably a small early building with a nave about 30 ft. by 13 ft. 6 in., and a chancel about 10 ft. by 12 ft.

To this nave a south aisle was added towards the end of the 12th century, and soon after, about 1190, the chancel was pulled down and its space thrown into the nave, transepts being added on either side, and a new chancel built to the east. This was lengthened and perhaps rebuilt later in the 13th century, and the tower was added about 1340. It may have replaced one of earlier date and contains a great many stones worked with late 12th-century ornament. In the bell-chamber there are a number of fragments of this date (described in detail below) belonging to the jambs of a doorway or arch. A windows in the south wall; of the pair on the opposite side the western has been converted into an arch into the organ chamber, with the loss of its mullions and east jamb. The ledge of the south-east window has been dropped to form a sedile. Between the two windows on this side is an original priest's doorway with a modern outer arch, and in the north wall a doorway to the organ chamber, which has a large three-light east window and a doorway in its north wall opening into the vestry; the latter has a fireplace and is lighted by a window on the north. The chancel arch is, perhaps, of late 12th-century date, and is made to match the transept arches, but has no responds. The arch is pointed and only 1 ft. 7 in. thick; it is slightly chamfered and springs from moulded corbels of late 12th-century section. The first arch on the south side of the nave is two-centred of a single-chamfered order 3 ft. thick; its eastern half has been rebuilt and widened, but the west jamb is unaltered, and has a grooved and moulded abacus with stopped chamfers above and below; the stops vary in shape, one being scalloped and others moulded. The three arches of the arcade west of this are of much narrower span but of similar section; they have labels, grooved and hollow chamfered in the two western bays and carved with dog-tooth in the eastern. The two pillars are circular, the bases having square-chamfered plinths and a moulded top member, with leaf spurs at the angles.

The capitals are enriched by small scallops with sunk faces and with bunches of foliage at the angles. While those of the west pillar are all alike, the scallops in the other pillar vary and are in parts worked in the leaves, &c., part of the capital being unfinished. The two responds have plain abaci like the eastern bay; the west has north aisle was added about the same time as the tower, the transept being thrown into it. Both aisles were rebuilt in the 15th century, the south being made equal in width to the transept. Since then the building has had to undergo the usual necessary repairs: in the sixties of the last century the spire was added to the tower and the organ chamber was added east of the north aisle. The south porch dates from 1872 and the vestry is a still more recent addition.

The east window of the chancel consists of three trefoiled lancets with soffit cusps, the middle light being of greater width than the others; the tracery is re-worked or modern, but the widely splayed inner jambs and the two-centred drop rear arch are original.

In the south wall is a small piscina with a chamfered two-centred arch; the chamfer is stopped out above the sill, which has a shallow round basin, and there is also a shelf in the back. The side windows of the chancel are each of two trefoiled lights with soffit cusps. The inner jambs are widely splayed and have two-centred rear arches; there are two no base; the east base is simply chamfered.

The north arcade has three bays. The first is similar to that opposite, and like it widened eastward. The two pillars are round with moulded octagonal bases. The capitals are moulded; the abacus of the west pillar is octagonal, but the other is half-octagonal to the west and square to the east, with carved heads set in foliage at the angles; this is done to take the square-edged arch on the east. The two western arches are of two hollow-chamfered orders and are two-centred; the inner order in the west respond springs from a corbel of similar detail to the capitals, resting on a human head. The aisle opens into the organ chamber by the rear arch of a 15th-century east window. On each side of it are two moulded brackets of 15th-century date; the lower pair, which are 6 ft. 3 in. above the floor, are semi-octagonal in plan and doubtless carried images; the others are 4 ft. 6 in. higher, and are larger; they probably carried the timbers of an extension of the rood loft across the aisle. The widening and cutting back of the eastern arches of the arcades is doubtless due to the same thing.

GOODWORTH CLATFORD CHURCH : NAVE LOOKING NORTH-EAST

GOODWORTH CLATFORD CHURCH : CAPITAL IN NORTH ARCADE OF NAVE

The north wall has two windows of two cinquefoiled lights under square heads; the outsides are modern, but the quoins of the splayed inner jambs are original and also the rear arch of the first window; the west window is modern of two cinquefoiled lights under a pointed segmental arch.

The east window of the south aisle and the three in the south wall all date from the 15th century and have been partly restored with new mullions, &c.; they are of two cinquefoiled lights under square heads with moulded labels outside; the inner jambs are splayed and have rear arches of pointed segmental form. The modern south doorway, between the second and third window, is pointed and of two hollow chamfers. The aisle has no west window. The south porch is of wood, on a low flint wall.

The tower is of two stages and is built of ashlar. The arch opening into it from the nave is a rough pointed one with its apex much to the south of the centre line; it is evidently a late alteration, being set much higher than the original arch would have been. The west window in the lower stage is of two ogee trefoiled lights, with wide inner splays and segmental rear arch. The next story above the horizontal string has a single west window with an ogee trefoiled head, and similar single lights pierce each wall of the bell-chamber; these latter have modern brick rear arches. The walling in the middle of the tower has a great many stones carved with zigzag ornament and a few with diaper work. In the bell-chamber are several other worked stones, including two pieces of a round attached shaft, pieces of small scalloped capitals and moulded bases, and of grooved and hollow-chamfered abaci; they are all of late 12th-century date. The parapet is plain with a moulded string course, at the middles and angles of which are gargoyles. Above the tower is a modern wood spire changing from square to octagonal and covered with oak shingles.

The roofs of the chancel, nave and north aisle are gabled, open timbered below and covered with tiles. Many of the timbers in all three are old. The south aisle has a modern flat lean-to roof covered with lead.

The furniture in the church is all modern except the font, which has a bowl and base dating from the end of the 12th century. The former is of Purbeck marble, square in plan with sloping sides, which are worked with shallow round-headed arcades on three sides, and two quatrefoiled leaf patterns on the fourth; the round stem and four angle shafts are modern, but the base is old, with angle spurs.

The church possesses no ancient monuments or gravestones.

There are three bells; the treble by John Wallis, dated 1622 and inscribed 'Give thanks to God'; the second has 'Love God I.D. R.T. 1627,' with many of the letters of its inscription reversed, the tenor is dated 1700 and bears the names of the churchwardens of the time.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1872 and a silver paten and flagon of 1841.

The first book of the registers contains baptisms and burials from 1538 to 1727 and marriages from 1555 to the same date; they are mixed from 1692, and there is a hiatus from 1610 to 1622. The second book has baptisms and burials from 1726 to 1783 and marriages to 1754, whence in the third and fourth books they are continued up to 1812.

The church of Goodworth Clatford belonged originally to Wherwell ADVOWSON Abbey, and there was a prebend of Goodworth there. The right of presentation to the vicarage has never been parted from the manor since the Dissolution, the living at the present time being a vicarage in the gift of Mr. William Henry Iremonger.

In 1343 Abbess Amice granted to John of Shaftesbury, prebendary of Goodworth, and his successors a piece of land (in length 12 perches, in breadth 7 perches) in the town of Goodworth, adjoining the rectory on the east and the tenement of John le Tomber, a villein of the abbey, on the west, to be held for inclosing, building and planting for ever as the right of the prebendal church; an acre of arable land beyond the manor court of that town to be given in exchange.<sup>6</sup>

Early in the 17th century George Widley, clerk, who had a lease of the parsonage for twenty-one years, built a parsonage-house at Goodworth Clatford.<sup>7</sup>

There is a Primitive Methodist chapel.

The school was founded by the CHARITIES Rev. Lascelles Iremonger, formerly vicar, who endowed the same with £1,000 consols.

LONGPARISH

Middeltune (xi cent.).

The name of Longparish does not seem to have been used until about the middle of the 16th century. Before that the whole parish was known as Middleton, a name which is now used chiefly to denote one hamlet, although it is still the alternative designation of the parish.

The parish slopes from a mean height of 300 ft. above sea level in the north to a mean height of 200 ft. in the south. The soil is light, the subsoil chalk, with alluvial deposits in the valley of the River Test. The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips. The total area is 5,327 acres, of which 2,884 acres are arable land, 599 acres permanent grass and 1,324 acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The greater part of Harewood Forest, a tract of open copses and intersecting green roads, lies within this parish. In Deadman's Plack Copse is a monument erected in 1826 to the memory of Earl Athelwold, who, tradition has it, was murdered there in 963 by King Edgar for the sake of his wife Elfrida, whom the king subsequently married.

There is a station here, at some distance from the village, on the Hurstbourne and Fullerton branch of the London and South Western Railway. The Didcot, Newbury and Southampton branch of the Great Western Railway also passes through the parish.

On the main road, running through the parish from north-east to south-west, East Aston, Longparish, Middleton and Forton lie at short distances apart. Longparish House is the seat of Mr. Peter Thomas Ryves Hawker, whose ancestors have been there for many generations.<sup>2</sup> It lies between East Aston and Longparish. Middleton Hall (with its park), the residence of Mr. Cecil Lowry Wade, is between Middleton and Forton. Gravel Acre Farm, or Gavel-acre, the residence of Mr. R. K. Hodgson, is near the meeting of Wherwell, Longparish and Barton Stacey. The oldest part of the present building does not antedate the 17th century and the greater part of it is modernized.

Ink Pin<sup>3</sup> Lane branches off from the main Andover to Basingstoke road at Harewood Farm and runs through the forest to Middleton. Another road from Andover runs south-east towards Bullington, and skirts the northern edge of the southern division of Harewood Forest, crossing the Test just below Forton.

In 1802 no less than 750 acres in West Aston and Middleton were inclosed.<sup>4</sup>

Place-names found in early documents are: Broad Ell, 'Rigge,' 'Adames Dene'<sup>5</sup>; Lynford, Collett Close, Sheppard's Lane, Little Deanes, Great Deanes, 'Deanes where the Well is,' Upper Deanes and the Strip.<sup>6</sup>

Like the neighbouring manors LONG-MANORS PARISH belonged to Wherwell Abbey, was granted to Thomas West Lord De La Warr at the Dissolution, and remained in that family until 1695. In 1086 it ('Middeltune') was assessed at 10 hides, and had a fishery for the use of the hall,<sup>7</sup> and in 1291 it was valued at £39 6s.<sup>8</sup> One of the 'innumerable works' of the good Abbess Eufemia, who ruled the convent in the second quarter of the 13th century, was the rebuilding of the manor house. 'The manor house of Middleton, which occupied a dry situation and was close to a public thoroughfare, and was further disfigured by old and crumbling buildings, she moved to another site, where she erected permanent buildings, new and strong, on the banks of the river, together with farm-houses.'<sup>9</sup>

In 1698 Boulter, who had purchased of the Wests in 1695, sold Longparish to Richard Widmore of North Oakley, in the parish of Kingsclere, reserving an annual rent of £42 on Longparish Farm.<sup>10</sup> The estate is now in the hands of the trustees of the late Mr. James Widmore.

Free warren over its demesne of Middleton was granted to the convent of Wherwell in 1331<sup>11</sup> and confirmed in 1378<sup>12</sup>; and the manorial rights of free fishery, free warren, liberty of foldage and view of frankpledge are mentioned in an 18th-century conveyance.<sup>13</sup>

In 1228 the Abbess of Wherwell was claiming an assize of novel disseisin against Henry Marshall and others in regard to the common pasture in Andover, which appertained to her free tenement in Middleton. This pasture was said to be royal demesne, and a mandate was issued to the justices itinerant to respite the said assize until the king had inquired further into the matter.<sup>14</sup>

In 1640 Edward Nicholas, then secretary to the Admiralty, purchased Longparish Farm from Lady De La Warr.<sup>15</sup> Ten years later, however, the estate was sequestered for delinquency, and Jane, Lady Nicholas, was begging an allowance for herself and her children.<sup>16</sup> In July 1651 Leonard Green, formerly Nicholas's tenant, who had been in arms for Parliament, had a grant of the premises.<sup>17</sup>

At the Domesday Survey there were two mills worth 40s.<sup>18</sup> In 1328 the Abbess Isabel and the convent of Wherwell granted to Maud wife of John le Fox and Richard his son the moiety of a fulling mill which lay south of the water running through the water-wheel, all the houses built on that side, and half the eels taken in the mill close, with other gifts and privileges.<sup>19</sup> On the same day a grant of the northern moiety was made to Richard of Free-folk.<sup>20</sup> In 1362 John atte Park of Winchester granted to Sir Robert of Bruddecombe, chaplain, a water-mill and other premises in Middleton which he had recently had of the gift of William atte Mill.<sup>31</sup> A little later, apparently the same John and Christine his wife quitclaimed to Richard Deneby of Lambourn, clerk, and William of Malmesbury, clerk, and the heirs of Richard a mill, three messuages and land there.<sup>32</sup>

In 1566 a tucking-mill with a watercourse in Longparish, formerly belonging to the Abbess and convent of Wherwell, was granted to Thomas Blackway and Francis Barker, both London citizens, to be held in socage of the royal manor of East Greenwich.<sup>33</sup>

At the present time there are two mills in the parish, the Upper on East Aston Common and the Lower some half mile further down the Test.

GAVELACRE, or Gallaker, represented now by Gavelacre Farm, was at one time a manor. Eustace of Gavelacre mortgaged his tenement in Gavelacre to the community at Wherwell for a debt of 25 marks payable within three years from the Feast of the Assumption in 1258.<sup>34</sup> In 1351 John Ingpen was found to have died seised, it would seem, of 12 acres of waste land there, held of the king in chief.<sup>35</sup> This John is probably the same as the Thomas Ingpen of 'Galaker' mentioned in the visitation pedigree of 1634,<sup>36</sup> who married Isabel Colshill and had a son Robert; for an inquisition of 1411 shows that Robert Ingpen held at his death, which occurred in the previous reign, the manor of Gavelacre, which had been part of the dower lands of his mother Isabel, late wife of Hugh Craan, and whereof the abbey of Wherwell was overlord.<sup>37</sup> From a previous inquisition taken in 1406 it appeared that Robert Ingpen died in 1389, since which date his wife Margery, who had married John Bennet, had taken the issues.<sup>38</sup> His mother Isabel died in 1409 holding—of whom and by what service the jurors were ignorant—the manor of Gavelacre, which then reverted to Richard son and heir of Robert.<sup>39</sup> In December 1509 John Ingpen died seised of this manor which he held of the abbey.<sup>40</sup> Gavelacre is not named among the Wherwell Abbey property granted to Lord De La Warr, but in 1623 Richard Blake died at Andover seised of the mansion house called Gavelacre with its appurtenances, which he held of Cecily Lady De La Warr as of her manor of Wherwell.<sup>41</sup> It is to be presumed, therefore, that it became merged in that manor (q.v.) at the Dissolution and followed its descent.

The vill of FORTON is named among the possessions of Wherwell Abbey in the privilegium of Pope Gregory IX in 1228.<sup>42</sup> Land there is the subject of several early undated charters in the Wherwell Cartulary.<sup>43</sup> In 1234 the convent of Wherwell agreed, for a rent of 1 lb. of cummin at Michaelmas, to give Eustace of Gavelacre and Maud his wife a mill with its appurtenances in Forton in exchange for his tenement in Compton.<sup>44</sup> About 1332 Nicholas le Wayte and Amice his wife fined with Roger Hussey for a mill and other premises there, which they were to hold to themselves and the heirs of their bodies with reversion, in default, to Roger and his heirs.<sup>45</sup> The same Nicholas and Amice had, some eight years later, confirmation of a life grant from the Abbess Maud of two messuages and 2 virgates of land in Forton.<sup>46</sup> In 1361 Roger Hussey died seised of lands and a mill there,<sup>47</sup> and in 1370 his brother John was found to have held the same premises of Wherwell Abbey conjointly with his wife Isabel.<sup>48</sup> Thirty years later one William Ringbourne was at the time of his death tenant in chief of a messuage, land and water-mill in Forton.<sup>49</sup> In 1468 John Gilbard son and heir of Nicholas Gilbard of Woodborough (co. Wilts.) released to Robert Ingpen of Southampton all his right in the 'manor' of Forton, a water-mill there, and pasture for two cows with the cows of the Abbess of Wherwell<sup>50</sup>; but this seems to be the only occasion on which the 'manor' of Forton is mentioned. John Ingpen, who died seised of the manor of Gavelacre in December 1509, held also a mill and land in Forton,<sup>51</sup> described as parcel of the manor of Gavelacre. At the Dissolution these holdings doubtless went to Lord De La Warr. Richard Blake, who died in 1623, held a messuage called 'Chamberlaynes hold,' and others there, of Cecily Lady De La Warr as of her manor of Wherwell<sup>52</sup>; and premises in Forton are repeatedly mentioned in the later conveyances of Longparish Manor.

The tithings of EAST ASTON and WEST ASTON lie half a mile to the east and west, respectively, of the village of Longparish. In the list of Wherwell Abbey's possessions given in Pope Gregory's privilegium of 1228 the vill of Eston with its appurtenances is named.<sup>43</sup> In 1258 Robert Falconer granted to the convent of Wherwell all the land which he had bought or held of Henry le Frye in the vill of 'Eston,' except 3 acres in 'la

Robert of Knightsbridge quitclaimed to the Abbess Isabel in 1329 all his right in the moor of 'Esteston' which John of Goncloude had given to the abbess and convent <sup>46</sup>; while in 1544 the king granted to William Bishop of Bredy (co. In the Wherwell Cartulary there is a list of tenants in East Aston, West Aston and Forton together with those in Bullington, Little Ann and Goodworth Clatford, in 1493.<sup>48</sup>

The church of ST. NICHOLAS consists of a chancel 24 ft. 4 in. by 13 ft.

6 in., with a north vestry, a nave 52 ft. 2 in. by 18 ft. 6 in., with north and south aisles 9 ft. 2 in. and 8 ft. 8 in. wide respectively, a west tower 9 ft. 10 in. by 9 ft. 1 in., also an organ chamber opening north from the north aisle and a south porch. All the measurements are internal. The general structure of the chancel, nave and aisles belongs to c. 1190-1200, but modern restorations have destroyed all the old windows, and the nave arcades are the chief features that remain of the original building. The tower was added in the 16th century and the vestry and organ chamber are modern additions.

The east window of the chancel has three trefoiled lights and tracery of 14th-century design and is modern, as is the tracery of all the windows of the church.

The four other windows of the chancel, two in the north wall and two in the south, are single trefoiled lancets, which have old masonry at the angles of the internal jambs and rear arches, the south-west window having 13th-century shafts with moulded capitals. Beneath the easternmost window on this side is a modern piscina and in the opposite wall a small modern credence. There is also a modern sedile on the south and over it a modern reminiscence of an Easter sepulchre. Between the two north windows is the entrance to the vestry, which is lighted by two small windows in the east wall and a very small two-light window in the north wall. There is an outside doorway in the west wall. Between the two windows of the south wall is a priest's doorway which has stop-chamfered jambs, grooved and chamfered abaci and a plain semicircular arch. The internal jambs and rear arch are modern.

The chancel arch is two-centred and has two chamfered orders continuous with the jambs with a moulded abacus at the springing which continues round to the capitals of the aisle responds. The work is old but entirely retooled. The north and south arcades are each of four bays with circular columns which have roll and hollow-moulded bases and capitals with fluted scallops enriched with foliage, much repaired and recut. The capital of the first pillar on the south side has stiff-leaf foliage, while one on the north side has hollow flutings. The arches are two-centred and of two chamfered orders with moulded labels on the nave sides.

The west window of the north aisle is a deeply splayed round-headed light in a pointed rear arch, the jambs of the rear arch alone being old, and near it on the north-west is a plain two-light window also widely splayed, but all the other aisle windows are of 14th-century character with modern tracery, their jambs being for the most part old.

The pointed arch opening to the organ chamber has modern semicircular responds with moulded bases, but the capitals, which are of the same type as those in the arcades, appear to be old. The chamber is lighted by two single trefoiled lights in the east and west walls and a window of two trefoiled lights with traceried head in the north wall. The south doorway has jambs moulded in two orders and a two-centred arch with a label, the outer order having a moulded base and modern capitals; the doorway must date from c. 1200.

The tower arch is narrow and four-centred, with wide chamfered jambs. The west doorway is modern and has moulded jambs and two-centred arch. Above it is a modern three-light window with traceried head.

The tower is divided into three stages and has an embattled parapet. The stair turret is on the north-west angle and is square at the bottom and octagonal at the top. The top stage contains a window of two plain flat-pointed lights filled with modern pierced stonework on each side except the east. In the west face only is a similar window in the middle stage. The walls of the tower are of chequer work with flint and stone, all other walls are of flint with stone dressings. The roofs are tiled.

All the internal fittings are modern and the roofs are of modern open timber work.

The font near the west end of the nave has a tall modern canopy which swings on a pivoted iron bracket. The whole interior of the church is decorated with modern painted ornament and texts in red, blue, green and gold, and all the windows are filled with stained glass. This and the absence of a clearstory make the building very dark.

The tower contains three bells, all by Robert Wells of Aldbourne, 1791.

The plate consists of a silver parcel-gilt chalice and two patens of 1884, a silver flagon of the same date, a plated chalice and flagon and two plated flagons given by the late Rev. Ellorrough Woodcock in 1886.

The registers are contained in five books; the first having baptisms, marriages and burials from 1654 to 1759; the second has marriages only from 1754 to 1803; the third book contains baptisms and burials from 1760 to 1801; the fourth book, which has marriage forms printed on vellum, was in use from 1784 to 1802, and the fifth book has baptisms, marriages and burials on printed paper forms from 1802 to 1812.

TUFTON OR TUCKINGTON

ADVOWSON The church was in the gift of Wherwell Abbey, where there was a prebend of Middleton.

In 1546 the advowson of the prebend, rectory and vicarage of Middleton was granted to Laurence Syerward and others at a rent of 26s. 8d. for the rectory.<sup>49</sup> In the following reign Richard Venables and John Maynard had a pension and rent in this rectory to be held in soccage of the manor of East Greenwich.<sup>50</sup> At what date the advowson first belonged to the Paulets is uncertain, but in 1610 William Marquess of Winchester and Lucy his wife conveyed it among other premises to the Earls of Salisbury and Exeter, Lord Burghley and others.<sup>51</sup> In September 1614 Lucy Marchioness of Winchester made her will, which contains this among other dispositions:—‘Mr. Johnson, my chaplain, has promised to make over an estate of the tythes of Longparish upon a yearly rent for lives or years unto whomsoever I shall nominate. My will is that the said Mr. Johnson shall make over the said tythes to Sir Anthony Mayne, knight, for such three lives as he shall nominate, for the bringing up of my son Edward, his godson, until he be 21, when Sir Anthony shall assign the interest of the said tythes to him.’ The marchioness died 1 October 1614 and her will was proved in November.<sup>52</sup> In 1652 George Cony and Daniel Witcharley recovered seisin of various property, including the advowson of Middleton and tithes in Middleton and Longparish, against Sir Henry Paulet, Knight of the Bath, Charles Paulet the elder, and Edward Paulet, Charles Paulet the younger being vouchee.<sup>53</sup> The defendants here were the younger sons of William fourth Marquess of Winchester and the above-mentioned Lucy, and the vouchee would be their nephew, the future first Duke of Bolton. Just a century later Harry fourth Duke of Bolton was vouched as warranty when Thomas Barnard recovered seisin against Edward Woodcock.<sup>54</sup> Edward Woodcock was patron of the prebend of Middleton in 1795.<sup>55</sup> The living is now a vicarage in the gift of Mr. S. H. J. Johnson.

The prebend of Middleton seems to have been a constant bone of contention between Wherwell Abbey and the Crown. In 1347 the Court of Common Bench passed judgement in favour of the king against the abbess,<sup>56</sup> and pardon was granted to Roger Ferrou of Bedford, clerk, who prosecuted in the court of Rome to annul this judgement.<sup>57</sup> Again in 1398 and 1402 the king recovered the right to present.<sup>58</sup>

There are Baptist, Wesleyan and Primitive Methodist chapels in the parish.

The parliamentary returns of 1786 CHARITIES mention that Thomas Baker by his will demised a rent-charge of 10s. for teaching poor children. The annuity is received from the trustees of the Widmore estate and paid to the National school.

In 1825 James Widmore by a codicil to his will bequeathed £10 a year to be applied in providing clothes and bedding for the poor. The legacy is represented by £333 6s. 8d. consols with the official trustees, producing yearly £8 6s. 8d., which is usually applied in the distribution of blankets.

Tochiton (xi cent.); Thoketone, Tokinton (xiii cent.); Tokyngton (xvi and xvii cent.).

The River Test forms the north-western boundary of the parish of Tufton or Tuckington, the mean height of which above the sea level is about 300 ft. The soil is light, the subsoil chalk. The chief crops are wheat, oats and turnips. The total area is 1,546 acres, comprising 1,222 acres of arable land, 231 acres of permanent grass and 17 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup>

The Didcot, Newbury and Southampton branch of the Great Western Railway runs through Tufton, but the nearest station is Whitchurch, 2 miles away.

The village lies in the extreme north-west of the parish on the left bank of the Test.

As the high road from Whitchurch to Winchester passes through Tufton it branches south-west, passing Manor Farm House, the residence of Major the Honourable William Chambré Rowley, and Westfield House, the residence of Mr. James Walter John Kennedy, which both lie a little south-east of Tufton village.

In 1787 there was an inclosure award for this parish.<sup>2</sup>

The manor of TUFTON descended MANOR with Wherwell (q.v.) until 1698, when Edmond Boulter, who had three years previously bought it from Lord De La Warr,<sup>3</sup> sold it to Alice Wallop,<sup>4</sup> widow of John Wallop of Hurstbourne Priors and mother of the first Earl of Portsmouth. The purchaser was to pay an annual rent of £7 17s. 6d. for Tufton Farm. Newton (Wallop) sixth Earl of Portsmouth is now lord of the manor.

Before 1698 the Wallops had owned property in the parish, lands in Tufton being among those which Sir Henry Wallop bought in 1636 from the Oxenbridges.<sup>5</sup> Robert Wallop, as one of the judges of Charles I, was barred from enjoying these same lands at the Restoration.<sup>6</sup>

Tufton Manor House, which in the 13th century was rebuilt by the Abbess Eufemia,<sup>7</sup> figures in the records of the Court of Star Chamber, where in 1553 one Christiana Grove brought an action against Thomas Wroughton of Overton and John Grove of Lyons Inn for forcible entry, false imprisonment of her servants and seizure of her goods. We have only the defendants' account of the affair, from which it appears that they had a title to the house. Coming to take possession, they found the door barred against them. So they went for Sir John Kingsmill and William Wares, the magistrates, who about three o'clock in the afternoon came with a train of mounted men to settle the matter. Christiana still refused to open the door and threatened to 'hurle hote lycor' on those without. The justices thereupon tried to come to terms and 'tolde her the dainger of hir suche enterprise.' But she 'still contyneued in hir stoutenes,' so they broke the door down, marched her servants off to Winchester Gaol and took possession of the house. Next day the lady rode freely away to London, and, affirms the deponent, 'she was not then and ther beaten or yvell intreated nor by violence appulsyd thens.'<sup>8</sup>

Licence was granted to Henry le Wayte, clerk, in 1323 to alienate a messuage, mill and land in Tufton to Wherwell Abbey, that daily service might be said for the souls of his father and the faithful departed.<sup>9</sup>

The church of ST. MARY consists of CHURCH a chancel 17 ft. 9 in. by 16 ft. 1 in. and a nave 42 ft. 2 in. by 21 ft. 4 in., with a south porch and a small wooden bell-turret over the west end.

The building on this site in the 12th century probably consisted of a nave and chancel of much the same size as at present.

The chancel was rebuilt early in the 13th century and greatly restored in modern times. The nave retains none of its original details except the chancel arch and the rear arch of the south doorway. The south porch is of modern brickwork. The whole church was plastered over in the 18th century and wide latticed windows with wooden casements inserted in the nave at the north-east and south-east.

The east window of the chancel is modern and has two plain pointed lights. The north and south walls of the chancel are each divided into three bays by wall arcades of early 13th-century date, having detached shafts with plain bell capitals, square abaci, roll-moulded bases and two-centred arches, edge chamfered. All the arches are original, but much of the rest has been restored. In each bay is a lancet window, the easternmost in the north wall and all in the south wall being modern, but the remaining two north windows show old stonework on the outside, the jambs of one being square and the other slightly chamfered. All the internal wall faces of the chancel are covered with modern plaster.

The chancel arch is semicircular and quite plain, and may date from c. 1120. The abaci at the springing are grooved and chamfered and are not returned on the east or west sides of the wall.

On either side of the arch is a plastered squint, the plastering being modern.

The nave contains only three windows, one at the north-east of two lights in a square-headed wooden frame, a like one at the south-east, both of 18th-century date, as already noted, and a third at the west, of a single elliptical-headed light with the stonework restored in plaster. Its present form is probably only of 18th-century origin. Beneath the south window is a small arched recess, no doubt the remains of a piscina for the altar which stood on the south side of the chancel arch.

The south doorway has square jambs and head with a wooden frame and a high semicircular rear arch. The head is completely hidden by the porch, and there is nothing to show its date, but the rear arch is probably original, c. 1120. No trace of a north door can be seen.

The chancel has a modern open timber roof, and the nave has a flat plastered ceiling.

On the floor near the chancel arch is a blue slab, with a much defaced English inscription in black letter, dated August 1527.

The old plastering remains in most parts of the nave, and on the north wall a large piece of the outer coat of plaster has been cut away, revealing a large painting of St. Christopher carrying the child Christ on his shoulder, the whole within a border of vine pattern. The west border is painted on a line of 12th-century ashlar stones, which look like the jambs of a blocked window. In the centre of the panel a series of concentric circles has been scratched.

The bell-turret contains two bells, both by Thomas Mears, 1836.

The plate consists of a silver parcel-gilt chalice and paten of 1873 and a plated alms dish.

The registers begin with baptisms 1784 to 1813, followed by some more copied from an older book from 1716 to 1783. At the other end of the same book are burials from 1784 to 1812, with others copied in from 1714 to 1784.

The living of Tufton is a ADVOWSON chapelry, annexed to the vicarage of Wherwell until 1852 and since that date to Bullington (q.v.).

The church of the Blessed Mary of 'Tokynton' is given in the list of the possessions of Wherwell Abbey in the privilegium of Gregory IX.<sup>10</sup> The abbey also had the tithes and assarts for which was paid an annual pension of 2s.<sup>11</sup>

In 1300 Thomas of Cambridge, rector of Wherwell, granted the abbess and convent all fruits, rents, &c., annexed to the chapels of Tufton and Bullington and all the lands of the said chapels—except the tithes customarily belonging to the chaplain—for the space of three years in exchange for an annuity of £40.<sup>12</sup>

On 28 August 1647 the inhabitants were petitioning the lords that they should not be united to Wherwell, which was 4 miles distant, nor to Whitchurch, which was in another hundred, but should have the use of their ancient chapel of ease. On the same day an order was made in accordance with this petition.<sup>13</sup>

There are apparently no endowed charities in this parish.

WHERWELL WITH WESTOVER

Werewelle, Warwelle (xi cent.); Hwerewelle, Wharewell, Hwherewelle, Thwerewelle (xiii-xiv cent.); Whorwell, Worwell (xvi cent.); Horwell (xvi-xvii cent.); Whorwell (xvii cent.); Harwell, Whirwell (xviii cent.).

The parish of Wherwell is divided from Longparish by the old Roman road which ran through the heart of Harewood Forest from Winchester to Cirencester. Along the eastern and south-eastern boundary flows the Test, the vicinity of which is liable to floods. The mean height varies in different parts of the parish from 200 ft. to 300 ft. The soil is part light gravel, part heavy gravel and part white loam. The subsoil is chalk and there are several chalk pits. The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats, turnips and grass. The total area of the parish is 3,633 acres, comprising 2,111½ acres of arable land, 701 acres of permanent grass and 511 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> Some 34 acres are covered by water. To the north the parish runs wedgewise through the heart of Harewood Forest and includes Wismore Copse, Popple Hill Copse, Hartway Copse, Park Brow Copse and Hassock Copse. There is a station at Wherwell on the Hurstbourne and Fullerton branch of the London and South Western Railway, and at Fullerton is the junction of that and the Andover and Redbridge branches. The village is situated mainly between the railway line and the most northern stream of the Test, beyond which, and bridging one of the streams, is Wherwell Priory. The tithing of Fullerton lies 1½ miles to the south-west on the River Anton. Westover is 2 miles due west of Wherwell, Mount Pleasant a quarter of a mile to the north and Dublin Farm half a mile to the north-east. At the south-west extremity of the parish, where it becomes a narrow strip between Longstock and Goodworth Clatford, are Rowberry and Nettlebank Copses.

The road from Andover to Winchester passes through the village and a branch of the same road passes through Fullerton. From Fullerton a road runs north-west past Redrice Park and through Abbots Ann, crossing that from Andover to Stockbridge just south of Westover.

When in 1002 Ethelred confirmed his MANOR mother's<sup>3</sup> foundation of Wherwell Abbey the property of that house in the vicinity of WHERWELL consisted of 70 mansae,<sup>4</sup> and in Domesday Book it is said to hold the whole vill in which the abbey stands.<sup>5</sup> In 1207 John granted the community certain liberties, and the right of an annual fair at Wherwell on the day of the dedication of the church, the day before and the two days following, provided it should not harm the neighbouring fairs,<sup>6</sup> and in 1215 a letter to that end was directed to the sheriff.<sup>7</sup> The right of holding a market every Wednesday at her manor of Wherwell was granted to the abbess in 1267,<sup>8</sup> but a few months later she was attached for not appearing to answer a charge of holding a market to the hurt of the king's free market at Basingstoke.<sup>9</sup> In 1331 the community had a grant of free warren over its demesnes of Wherwell and elsewhere,<sup>10</sup> which was confirmed in 1378.<sup>11</sup> In 1291 the manor was worth £59 13s. 6d.,<sup>12</sup> and it continued in possession of the monastery until the Dissolution.

Thomas West ninth Lord De La Warr was not only in the royal favour for his furtherance of the divorce, but he was also lord of five Sussex manors which Henry wished for his own, and proposed to take in exchange for other lands. Accordingly, in November 1539, Lord De La Warr wrote to Cromwell urging him to use his influence to get him the Wherwell estates.

'I would gladly have the said nunnery because it stands wholesomely, in the country where I was born, and my wife has no house to dwell in if I should die before her; and this is but a reasonable house as I hear say. I beg your favour that I may obtain the said abbey before the surveyors of the same come to the king, for fear he should grant it to another. Trusting if I get it, that the king will discharge all leases and fees going out of it, as I shall do to his grace in Halfnakyd.'<sup>13</sup>

A few days later Wherwell was surrendered.<sup>14</sup> Cromwell had more than once noted John Kingsmill as a candidate for the property,<sup>15</sup> but in the following March the site of the monastery, the manor and advowson, six manors adjacent<sup>16</sup> and other neighbouring property of the dissolved house were granted to Lord De La Warr for the rent of £137 3s. 8d. and the coveted Sussex lands.<sup>17</sup> In 1544 the new lord of Wherwell bought the lead and bells of the monastery for £100.<sup>18</sup> On his death without issue in 1554 the baronies of De La Warr and West fell in abeyance between the daughters of Sir Owen West, his brother of the half-blood. During his lifetime he had taken his nephew William son of Sir George West of Warbleton into his house and adopted him as his heir. William, however, too eager for his inheritance, was discovered to be scheming to poison his uncle, and in 1549 he was deprived of all rights to honours and estates by Act of Parliament.<sup>19</sup> In 1570, however, he became Lord De La Warr by a new creation and died in 1595 seised of the family manors.<sup>20</sup> His son obtained the precedence of the ancient barony.

In 1605 because of non-payment of a bond given on the premises to Elizabeth by William the newly created Lord De La Warr all these estates in Wherwell Hundred were seized into the hands of the Crown and, with certain exceptions, granted to Sir John Crofts till the sum should be paid.<sup>21</sup> The exceptions were all trees, wood, under-wood, mines and quarries, together with the advowson of the prebend or rectory of Wherwell and all tithes and profits, which were granted in 1625 to Sir Thomas Edmonds, treasurer of the royal household.<sup>21a</sup>

In 1616 Thomas West, third baron, had a licence to sell these manors,<sup>22</sup> which none the less remained in his descendants' hands until 1695. Fourteen years later Cecily Dowager Lady De La Warr was discharged £278 2s. 6d. arrears of rent for the site of the monastery of Wherwell.<sup>23</sup> During the Civil War there was a good deal of fighting in this part of the shire; and in 1645 Lord De La Warr was petitioning the House of Lords for protection. His estate in the county of Southampton, he complained, had sustained much damage by the quartering of both armies upon his tenants and the cutting down of his woods by the soldiers; and now it was intended to make his house at Wherwell into a garrison contrary to the order for the protection of peers' houses. This was likely to spoil the house and to be of little advantage to the State by reason of the hills which adjoined it.<sup>24</sup>

In 1695 John (West) sixth Lord De La Warr sold those Hampshire lands which his ancestors had had from Henry VIII to Edmond Boulter of London.<sup>25</sup> Edmond Boulter died in February 1709 possessed of estates in several shires. By his will proved in the following March he left his manors in Wherwell and Goodworth Clatford—he had already disposed of the neighbouring manors—to his nephew John Fryer, 'pewterer in the parish of St. Bennet Gracechurch, in the City of London.'<sup>26</sup> The new lord of Wherwell, an eminent City merchant and an alderman, was created a baronet in 1714. Dying in 1726 without surviving male issue, he bequeathed his Hampshire manors equally among his three daughters, Bithiah Brassey, Susannah Fryer and Delicia Fryer.<sup>27</sup> On the death of Susannah in October 1731<sup>28</sup> her inheritance passed to her sister of the whole blood, Bithiah wife of Nathaniel Brassey of Lombard Street. In 1742<sup>29</sup> Delicia Fryer, the youngest co-heir, married Joshua Iremonger, who thus became lord of one-third part of the manors of Wherwell and Goodworth Clatford. He purchased the other two-thirds from Nathaniel Brassey in February 1743,<sup>30</sup> so reuniting the property, which is now in the possession of his descendant, Mr. William Henry Iremonger.

By the custom of the manor of Wherwell copyhold lands might be granted for three lives in possession or for one life in possession and two in reversion and no more.<sup>31</sup>

There were three mills worth 27s. 6d. at Wherwell at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>32</sup> Among the good deeds of the Abbess Eufemia (1226–57) enumerated in the cartulary was the building of 'a new mill, some distance from the hall,' constructed 'with great care, in order that more work than formerly might be done therein for the service of the house.'<sup>33</sup>

At the present time there is a mill close by the church and another at Fullerton. In 1730 a water grist-mill with its appurtenances, in Wherwell, was the object of a conveyance between George Luke and William Hunt.<sup>34</sup>

WESTOVER is not mentioned as a separate manor in Domesday, nor does it occur in 1228 among the possessions of Wherwell Abbey in the privilegium of Gregory IX.<sup>35</sup> It was one of the manors, however, granted to Thomas West Lord De La Warr by Henry VIII, from the property of the dissolved monastery.

After the Wests parted with the property it again disappears. It is named as a manor in the indenture made on the sale of the Wherwell property by Lord De La Warr to Edmond Boulter in 1695,<sup>36</sup> but there seems to be no record of a subsequent sale. Certainly it had not been sold in 1706, when, in an indenture drawn up for creating new trustees of this property, the manors already disposed of are enumerated.<sup>37</sup> Boulter died early in 1709 and there is no mention of Westover in his will, but he bequeathed all his manors in Wherwell and Goodworth Clatford to his nephew John Fryer.<sup>38</sup> It is probable, therefore, that it became merged in Wherwell about this date, and has continued to descend with that manor.

In 1773 Robert Dowling and others assigned to Joshua Iremonger all manner of tithes in Westover, and other premises, for a term of three lives.<sup>39</sup>

At the time of the Survey the manor of FULLERTON was held by Hyde Abbey,<sup>40</sup> to which, as the 'vill of Wherwell,' it had been bequeathed by King Edred, who died in 955.<sup>41</sup> According to Thomas Rudborne, who wrote in the 15th century, Wherwell was among the lands escheated from Hyde by William the Conqueror, but this statement is, of course, proved false by the Domesday entry.<sup>42</sup> At the taxation of Pope Nicholas, Fullerton and the neighbouring manor of Leckford, wherewith it is ever to be found coupled, were valued among the temporalities of Hyde Abbey at £15 17s. 3d.<sup>43</sup> In the following century the abbey obtained licence from Adam of Orlton, Bishop of Winchester (1333-45), to celebrate divine service in the oratory of the manor of Fullerton.<sup>44</sup> In 1388, since it was found by inquisition that this manor with that of Abbotts Ann and other premises had from time immemorial belonged to the convent separately from the abbot's portion, the king granted that such premises should be exempt from seizure in times of voidance, saving only the advowsons to the Crown.<sup>45</sup>

Fullerton remained abbey land until the Dissolution. In 1541 Augustine de Augustinis, a Venetian and physician to the king, had a life grant of the manor and tithes of hay in Fullerton, together with other lands taken from religious houses, in lieu of certain annuities.<sup>46</sup> In July 1545 he was granted in fee the reversion of these lands and rights,<sup>47</sup> but in the following September he and his wife Agnes had a licence to alienate Fullerton and other premises to Lord Chancellor Wriothesley.<sup>48</sup> However, in 1549 the manor was conveyed to John Mill and John his youngest son by Thomas Pace, John Capleyn and Thomas Goddarde, a merchant of Southampton, to be held of the king in chief by the service of one-fortieth part of a knight's fee and a rent of 29s. 8d.<sup>49</sup> This John Mill the elder, a cadet of the Mills of Greatham (co. Sussex), died in 1551,<sup>50</sup> and was duly succeeded by John the younger, whose marriage with Catherine Lewkenor daughter and co-heir of Sir Roger Lewkenor brought him Camois Court, in Sussex. His grandson John Mill, son of Lewkenor Mill, was created a baronet in 1619 and died in 1648, when the manor of Fullerton descended to Thomas Mill, his second son and uncle of the second baronet.<sup>51</sup> Exactly when the Mills parted with the manor has not been ascertained, but by 1717 it was in the hands of John Chetwynd,<sup>52</sup> who four years later conveyed it to his brother Walter Viscount Chetwynd of Bearhaven and Edward Carteret.<sup>53</sup> This John Chetwynd, who succeeded as second viscount in 1736, married Hester only daughter and heir of Richard Kent of the Close, Salisbury and Katherine his wife. It seems that this match brought him Fullerton; for when returned as M.P. for Stockbridge in 1727 he was described 'as of Fullerton'<sup>54</sup> and in an indenture of 1730<sup>54a</sup> another of two years earlier is quoted by which trustees were created of this manor and all other premises late of Hester Chetwynd and now of John Chetwynd in Fullerton and Wherwell. In 1730 John Chetwynd sold the manor and its appurtenances to William Heathcote of Hursley (co. Hants),<sup>55</sup> created a baronet in 1733. In 1825 Sir William Heathcote, fifth baronet, was vouched as warranty in a recovery between Samuel Foster and George Frere.<sup>56</sup> The Heathcote property was sold in 1892 to Mr. William Cory, the present lord of the manor.<sup>57</sup>

During the episcopate of William Edendon (1346-66) licence was granted to Isabel Cormeilles to celebrate divine service in the oratory of the house called TALLEMACHE in the vill (villula) of Wherwell.<sup>58</sup>

The church of ST. PETER AND CHURCH HOLY CROSS consists of a chancel 26 ft. 6 in. by 16 ft., nave 49 ft. 3 in. by 18 ft. 8 in., with north and south aisles 11 ft. wide, north vestries, timber south porch, and a bell-turret over the west end of the nave.

The building is entirely modern and was erected on the site of an old church in 1856. Two prints in the choir vestry show what this church was like in 1830. It then consisted of a nave and north aisle continued into chancel and north chapel. Over the west end of the aisle was a low wooden bell-turret, and on the south of the nave there was a rough timber porch. All the windows of the nave had cinqvefoiled lights with flat heads. The west window of the aisle had three cinquefoiled lights and a cinquefoiled label. To the south of this was a small window of two plain pointed lights. Three angle buttresses show, one in the centre of the east wall and two on the south wall.

In the churchyard are several old stones coming either from the earlier church or else from Wherwell Priory, which was situated close by on the south side. At the west end of the church are a stone coffin without a lid, a mullion of a 13th-century window, and half of a flat four-centred arch, c. 1540, with Renaissance ornament and a defaced shield in the spandrel.

Against the vicarage wall at the east end of the churchyard is an altar tomb to Sir Owen Weste of good early Renaissance detail, undergoing a slow destruction by weather and ivy. The inscription in two cartouches reads in the first, 'Of yowre charite pray for the soolles off Syr Owen Weste Knyte and Mary his wiffe who died' | in the second, 'the which died the 18 day of July anno domini 1551.' On either side are shields, one of ten quarters, thus: (1) a fesse dancetty; (2) crusilly fitchy a lion; (3) per saltire four martlets; (4) a bend engrailed; (5) barry and a chief paly and paly an escutcheon with three piles; (6) as (2); (7) three lions' faces jessant de lis; (8) as (5); (9) as (3); (10) as (4). The second has 1, 2, 6 and 7, and coat one; a crescent for difference on both. Near this is a modern brick recess in which is placed the recumbent figure of a nun. The arch of this recess is apparently of early 14th-century date and is of stone with eight foils and rests on short attached shafts with moulded capitals and bases.

Built into this same wall is a stone with two shallow arched recesses of late 13th-century date, containing two groups of figures, one showing the Harrowing of Hell and the other, much damaged, two figures, the smaller with hands raised in fear or astonishment.

Near this stone is another old one carved with a four-leaved flower. Another stone in this wall represents an angel and a four-leaved flower.

There are several loose stones of various dates, one a 13th-century corbel made from the shaft of a Saxon cross, with interlacing patterns on two sides, and two others form apparently bases of niches or the like of 15th-century date, bearing shields inscribed 'Thos. beow' and 'Ihæ beow,' perhaps for Johanna, with a Tudor rose between.

There is also a small piece of a stone coffin slab on which part of a marginal inscription remains: dictus fructus and eterne, amen, and in the gable of the vicarage stable is inserted a 14th-century gable cross.

The bell-turret contains five bells, the treble being by Warner, 1858, and the other four by William and Robert Cor, 1707.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten (probably of local make) of circa 1650, given by Richard Finch Humphrey, another silver paten of 1662,<sup>59</sup> two glass cruets, a plated flagon and two plated alms plates.

The registers are bound up in three books, the first containing baptisms, marriages and burials mixed from 1634 to 1708. The second book contains mixed entries from 1708 to 1742 and then baptisms from 1782 to 1813, marriages 1783 to 1814, and burials 1777 to 1813. There is also a brief in this book dated 1724. A third book, which really belongs in the middle of the second, contains mixed entries from 1742 to 1771.

The Abbess and convent of ADVOWSON Wherwell presented to the prebend of Wherwell until the Dissolution, when the advowson was granted to Lord De La Warr,<sup>60</sup> Richard Parkhurst, the resigning rector and prebendary at that time, receiving an annuity of £30.<sup>61</sup> In February 1545 a second grant of the advowson was, by an error, made to one John Eyer,<sup>62</sup> who in the following August had his purchase money returned to him by a decree of the Court of Augmentations.<sup>63</sup> When he sold the manor to Edmond Boulter in 1695, John sixth Lord De La Warr sold also the advowson of the prebend of Wherwell,<sup>64</sup> which was vested in the lords of the manor until its suppression.

At the beginning of the 17th century, when Lord De La Warr's Hampshire estates were forfeited to the Crown, the advowson of the prebend or rectory of Wherwell with all tithes and profits was granted to Sir Thomas Edmonds, treasurer of the royal household.<sup>65</sup>

Matthew Nicholas, Secretary Nicholas's brother, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, was chosen prebendal rector of Wherwell in 1637. There seems to have been some dispute as to his election, for immediately after his induction he wrote to his brother Edward that there remained nothing else to be done (if the young Lady De La Warr did not prosecute her pretended title) than to thank his noble patron; that the old Lady De La Warr had withdrawn her caveat and the young lady sent in no man at the day appointed by the bishop to show her title, whereupon the bishop had taken a bond of £200 of the writer to save him harmless and had given him institution.<sup>66</sup> In 1686 John West, although a layman, was presented to the prebend by Lord De La Warr, and the king granted a dispensation for his institution and induction.<sup>67</sup>

In 1852 the prebend of Wherwell was declared an ecclesiastical rectory without cure of souls, and in 1857 the prebendary, the Rev. Thomas Lascelles Iremonger, resigning, it was suppressed.<sup>68</sup> Since that date the vicarage has been in the gift of the lords of the manor.

There is a Wesleyan chapel in the parish, erected in 1846, and a Primitive Methodist chapel, erected in 1887.

In 1691, as appears from a stone CHARITIES tablet in the church, Philadelphia Whitehead purchased from John Lord De La Warr 12s. a year for ever out of the yearly rent of the White Lion Inn to be paid to twelve old men and women at Christmas. The annuity is paid by Mr. W. H. Iremonger, the owner, and duly applied.

<sup>59</sup> It is thought that this paten, which is obviously the stand of a caudle cup, may at one time have belonged to the caudle cup now used as a flagon at Chilbolton.

At the time of the Domesday Survey the hundred of Barton Stacey included Barton Stacey, Bransbury, Colemore, Headbourne Worthy, Kings Worthy, Newton Stacey, Norton Valery, Sutton Scotney and Wonston.<sup>2</sup> The land assessed amounted to 17½ hides and 1 virgate, but Barton Stacey, of which Kings Worthy was then an appurtenance, had not, with the exception of half a hide, been assessed.<sup>3</sup> Drayton and Abbots Worthy, which are now tithings of Barton Stacey and Kings Worthy respectively, were then in the hundred of Micheldever,<sup>4</sup> and Pamber was perhaps in Basingstoke Hundred, of which it was a member in 1260.<sup>5</sup>

By 1316 the hundred was considerably changed; Pamber and Inhurst had been added,<sup>6</sup> while Bransbury, Norton Valery and Wonston were included in Buddlesgate Hundred.<sup>7</sup>

In the 16th century the hundred of Barton Stacey remained unaltered,<sup>8</sup> but Inhurst does not seem to have been included in 1652,<sup>9</sup> and it is given in the return of Baughurst in 1831,<sup>10</sup> in which year Bransbury, Drayton and Newton Stacey were returned as tithings of Barton Stacey parish, while Sutton Scotney was added to the parish of Wonston.<sup>11</sup>

Colemore and Priors Dean, though the latter is not mentioned in the Domesday Survey, belonged to the hundred of Barton Stacey till they were included in the upper half-hundred of East Meon in 1834,<sup>12</sup> in which year the Worthies were transferred to Fawley and Pamber to Basingstoke Hundred,<sup>13</sup> so that the hundred of Barton Stacey was reduced to the parish of that name, with its tithings of Bransbury, Drayton and Newton Stacey.

The hundred of Barton Stacey was granted by King John to Rogo de Sacy or Stacey in 1206,<sup>14</sup> and afterwards remained in the possession of the lords of the manor of Barton Stacey. When the estate was divided between the daughters and co-heiresses of Aimery de Sacy, the profits of the court which was held at Barton Stacey were also divided,<sup>15</sup> and they were shared by the lords of the moieties till the whole manor came into the hands of Thomas Salmon in 1577.<sup>16</sup>

A survey of the hundred was taken by the Parliamentary Commissioners in 1652,<sup>17</sup> but this seems to have been owing to a mistake, for it was never in the possession of Charles I.

BARTON STACEY

Bertune (xi cent.); Berton Sacy (xiii cent.); Bertone Stacy, Barton Sacy (xiv cent.).

Barton Stacey parish includes the tithings of Barton Stacey, Bransbury, Drayton, and Newton Stacey, and contains 5,026 acres of land, of which 407½ acres are arable land and 213 woodland<sup>1</sup>; it is bounded on the eastern side by a long line of trees known as Barton Stacey Belt.

The village of Barton Stacey lies in the valley of the Test, and is intersected by two roads, which run south from Longparish and east from Chilbolton. The church of All Saints stands on high ground north of the cross-roads and on its churchyard wall are the remains of a cross made of Lower Oolite limestone, which is not found in Hampshire but in Gloucestershire near the abbey of Lanthony (Lanthonia Secunda), to which the rectory of Barton Stacey belonged from early in the 13th century until 1541. The house that was once the farm-house of Church Farm, the property of Mr. R. K. Hodgson, has signs of considerable antiquity in one wing, which is built of large timbers with a heavy timbered roof. It was probably a single-storied hall at first, but has now been divided up, and its windows and other features are modern.

West of the village and close to that of Newton Stacey is a grass-grown track, said to be a disused part of the Roman road from Winchester to Cirencester, which runs northwards past Bransbury Common. This road divides between Barton Stacey and Newton Stacey, and close to it are six tumuli, one of which is long.<sup>1a</sup> East of the common is the village of Bransbury with a water-mill, possibly on the site of the mill mentioned in Domesday Book. The country is low-lying and liable to floods; between Bransbury and Drayton the River Test and Micheldever Brook form the boundaries to a long peninsula, across the landward end of which is the entrenchment known as Andyke.<sup>1b</sup> Drayton Park lies to the north.

The soil is loam, the subsoil chalk. The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips.

Among place-names in extant local records are the following:—Ladycroft, Hamelescroft, Sheppark, Ron-seldespathe, Brokholee, Sinocacre, Syngnyngland, Cocum, Bertonesdowne, Coudowne and Westmere (xv cent.).<sup>2</sup>

The manor of BARTON STACEY, MANORS according to the Domesday Survey, formed part of the ancient demesne of the Crown and provided half a day's farm of King Edward's farm.<sup>3</sup> It seems to have belonged to the Crown till 1199, when it was granted, probably with NEWTON,<sup>4</sup> which in 1086 had belonged to William son of Manne,<sup>5</sup> to Rogo de Sacy or Stacey by King John. From this date Barton and Newton followed the same descent, the estate being at first called the manors of Barton and Newton, but subsequently Barton Stacey only. Rogo was succeeded by his son Aimery,<sup>6</sup> who in 1215 obtained from King John a charter granting him a weekly market every Saturday at Barton Stacey.<sup>7</sup> Aimery forfeited his land in 1219,<sup>8</sup> but was restored before 1226, in which year a lawsuit between him and his men of Barton and Newton was postponed 'that the king might try to make peace between them.'<sup>9</sup> He obtained in 1231 a confirmation of the grant of 1199,<sup>10</sup> and in 1241 a confirmation of the charter of 1215 with an additional grant of a yearly fair on the vigil and feast of St. Margaret.<sup>11</sup> On his death, c. 1253, the manor was divided between his two daughters, Isabel, who was twice married, first to Warin de Bassingbourn and secondly to Ralph Gascelyn, and Agnes, afterwards the wife of Peter Coudray.<sup>12</sup> Warin was given the custody of the land of Agnes 'while she is under age and lives with her mother,' on condition that he provided her with sufficient food and clothing and paid £15 yearly to the king.<sup>13</sup> A final settlement of the division of the estate between the sisters was made in 1269.<sup>14</sup>

Before 1313 Agnes was succeeded by her son Thomas de Coudray,<sup>15</sup> who about 1324 settled his moiety of the manor of Barton Stacey on himself for life with remainder to his kinsman Fulk de Coudray and Joan his wife.<sup>16</sup> Thomas was afterwards knighted and died in 1348,<sup>17</sup> when the manor passed in accordance with the settlement to Fulk and Joan, who in 1370 granted it to Elizabeth de Coudray their kinswoman.<sup>18</sup> It was perhaps by her marriage that the estate passed to the Popham family, for in 1397 Philip Popham is said to have held it 'of the inheritance of his late wife Elizabeth.'<sup>19</sup> Their son and heir Philip died in 1400,<sup>20</sup> and upon the death of his infant son in the following year<sup>21</sup> the inheritance was divided between his daughters Margaret and Maud,<sup>22</sup> but it was re-united in 1420 when Maud, who had married Peter Coudray, died, leaving her 'moiety of the moiety of Barton Stacey manor' to her sister, then the wife of John Coudray.<sup>23</sup> Margaret was thrice married, but had children only by her second husband, Thomas Wayte. She died before her third husband, Robert Longe, who held the estate for life and was succeeded in 1447 by her son Thomas Wayte.<sup>24</sup> This Thomas died in the following year, and the estate then passed to the Longe family as the inheritance of his sister Margaret the wife of John Longe,<sup>25</sup> the younger son of Robert Longe by his first wife Alice. The Longes continued in possession until 1576,<sup>26</sup> when Robert, the great-grandson of John and Margaret, sold the manor to John Henton.<sup>27</sup> In the following year it was bought by Thomas Salmon,<sup>28</sup> the owner of Ringbourne, the moiety of the original manor of Barton which had belonged to Isabel daughter and co-heiress of Aimery de Sacy.

The history of that moiety had been as follows:—

Isabel had alienated her share of the manor in 1293 to John de Berewick,<sup>29</sup> who was succeeded in 1312 by his infant kinsman, Roger Husee.<sup>30</sup> Roger was born on 1 August 1307<sup>31</sup> and was declared to be of full age in July 1327.<sup>32</sup> The custody of his possessions in Barton Stacey during his minority was sold for £100 to the elder Hugh le Despenser,<sup>33</sup> in whose keeping the manor seems to have suffered, for in 1322 he complained that Roger Mortimer and others had 'entered with force into Berton Sacy and carried away all goods and chattels moveable and immoveable, to wit . . . with other necessities they took the chessboard, made partly of nut-wood and partly of ginger-root with the set of ivory and ebony . . . they broke the fish ponds and carried away the fish, without leaving anything, and tore down and carried away all the doors, locks, bars, windows, and lead from the house . . . they destroyed the hedges and sold and carried away all the wood for felling.'<sup>34</sup> In yearly was reserved to Stephen Haym,<sup>43</sup> and was afterwards granted by him to Nicholas Carew and Mercy his wife,<sup>44</sup> who alienated it to Robert Longe and Margaret.<sup>45</sup>

William Ringbourne was sheriff of the county of Southampton in 1381<sup>46</sup>; a commission of array 'to resist invasion in case of war after the expiration of the present truce' was sent to him in 1392,<sup>47</sup> and he received a like commission in 1399,<sup>48</sup> in which year he was also made a commissioner of the peace.<sup>49</sup> He died in 1400,<sup>50</sup> leaving as his heir his son William, who was sheriff in 1421.<sup>51</sup> The inquisition taken on the death of this second William in 1423<sup>52</sup> gives the extent of the estate; there were 200 acres of arable land, 20 acres of meadow and 400 acres of pasture, which were held by military service of half a knight's fee, and William also held four messuages and 5 virgates of land in Barton Stacey from William Wayte<sup>53</sup> and Margaret his wife. Further details are given in the second part of the inquisition which concerns the dowry claimed by Agnes, now the wife of John Holcombe, formerly the wife of the said William Ringbourne—one chamber called the "Presteschamber" and one stable in the eastern part of the said chamber and one "yatelyms" with two chambers . . . a third part of the garden, namely from the furnace outside the garden as far as the common field' with one-third of the profits of the manor, over 500 acres of land and rents from numerous tenants. The estate belonged to the Ringbournes for more than a hundred years,<sup>54</sup> during which it came to be regarded as a separate manor, and was given the name of Ringbournes. It passed in 1512 to Thomas Brune, the grandson of the last William Ringbourne, who alienated it in 1538 to John Salmon, retaining for himself and his heirs £5 rent yearly.<sup>55</sup> Sir John Brune died seised of this rent in 1560,<sup>56</sup> and the manor of Barton Stacey continued to be burdened by this annuity at least as late as 1657.<sup>57</sup>

Thomas the son of John Salmon bought the other moiety of Barton Stacey from John Henton,<sup>58</sup> and the re-united manor remained in the hands of this family till 1620,<sup>59</sup> when it was sold to Sir Robert Payne.<sup>60</sup> Since that time it has belonged to the owners of Cranborne in Wonston (q.v.), and is now the property of Mr. McCreagh Thornhill.<sup>61</sup>

One virgate of land in Barton Stacey was held of King Edward the Confessor in parage by Cheping,<sup>62</sup>

and afterwards came into the hands of Ralf Mortimer, of whom it was held at the time of the Domesday Survey by the church of St. Victor-en-Caux,<sup>63</sup> a Benedictine abbey which had been founded by Roger Mortimer in 1074.<sup>64</sup> To this alien priory and its cell at Clatford (co. Wilts.)<sup>65</sup> the land belonged until 1444, when it was granted by Henry VI to Eton College.<sup>66</sup>

BRANSBURY (Brandesbere, xi cent.; Brandesbiri, xiii cent.; Bransebury, Bramsbury, Braundesburie, xvi cent.) was held of the bishop at the time of the Domesday Survey by Richer the clerk, and before that date it had been held by Abbot Alsì 'of Stigand and the monks . . . for the support of the monks.'<sup>67</sup> It seems to have been held of the Prior and convent of St. Swithun at fee-farm until 1321, when William Yellebeon<sup>68</sup> obtained licence to alienate it to them in mortmain.<sup>69</sup>

After the Dissolution Henry VIII granted the manor of Bransbury to the Dean and Chapter of Winchester and their successors for a yearly rent,<sup>70</sup> and the estate was rented from the Dean and Chapter by John Ryves of Drayton in 1641 for the term of twenty-one years.<sup>71</sup> Bransbury was sold by the trustees under the Act for 'abolishing of Deans and Chapters' to Stephen Hurst and Richard Tutt in 1649,<sup>72</sup> but it seems to have been returned to the Dean and Chapter after the Restoration.<sup>73</sup>

At the present day (1910) Bransbury belongs to Mr. R. K. Hodgson and Mr. P. C. Tarbutt, but all manorial rights have long ceased. Mr. Hodgson's part, the larger, has come to him partly by inheritance, partly by purchase, Mr. Tarbutt's by purchase.<sup>73a</sup>

DRAYTON (Droegton, Draitone, xi cent.; Dreyton, xiv cent.) appears to have been granted by Edward the Elder (901-24) to the abbey of Hyde,<sup>74</sup> to which house Cnut restored it in 1019, after an unjust deprivation,<sup>74a</sup> and it was among the lands held of the abbey by a freeman in the reign of the Confessor.<sup>75</sup> At the time of the Domesday Survey part of the manor was held by Hugh de

Port,<sup>76</sup> while the remainder was retained by the abbey in demesne.<sup>77</sup> In the 13th century Hugh de Port's successors the St. Johns enfeoffed the Braibœufs of their holding,<sup>78</sup> while the actual tenant under the Braibœufs in the reign of Henry III was Sir Herbert de Calne, who held also the rest of the manor at fee-farm from the Abbot of Hyde.<sup>79</sup> Sir Herbert's son and namesake succeeded to the estate before 1272,<sup>80</sup> in which year he granted his brother Baldwin, for the yearly rent of a clove gilly-flower, one messuage with 2 carucates of land in Drayton, with reversion to himself and his heirs after the death of Baldwin.<sup>81</sup> Herbert died seised of the manor in 1294,<sup>82</sup> leaving a son Herbert,<sup>83</sup> who seems to have died a minor, and a daughter Marjory, who married Sir Roger Woodlock<sup>84</sup> and became her father's heiress.<sup>85</sup> After her death her possessions were for many years the subject of dispute between her kinsfolk. In 1316 Sir Roger Woodlock made a quitclaim of the Calne lands in Dorset from himself and his heirs to William des Roches,<sup>86</sup> the great-grandson of Euphemia daughter of Sir Herbert de Calne,<sup>87</sup> who seems in return to have recognized the right of the Woodlocks to Drayton, for Roger the son of Roger Woodlock<sup>88</sup> was seised of the manor in 1330.<sup>89</sup> In 1346, however, a suit was brought against him by Thomas de Dummer, a descendant of Sibyl, the sister of Sir Herbert de Calne, who disputed the legitimacy of Euphemia and declared that her descendants had no right to deal with the manor.<sup>90</sup> It is not known how the case was decided, but the succession to the estate was still in dispute in 1383,<sup>91</sup> in which year Joan the wife of John Penros declared that it was her right, and that she had been unjustly disseised of the manor by John Baker (Pyser).<sup>92</sup> John Baker was the grandson of Ursula Woodlock, who was probably a daughter of Roger and had married Ralph Baker,<sup>93</sup> but the ground on which Joan Penros claimed the manor is not stated; she was the daughter of Richard Carnver,<sup>94</sup> but whether she was of kin to the Woodlocks or had revived the claim of Thomas de Dummer is uncertain. Her suit was unsuccessful, and the Bakers remained in possession of the estate until 1446, in which year they sold it to Robert Ingpen.<sup>95</sup> separately from the portion of the abbot thereof the rents from Drayton' until 1448,<sup>96</sup> when they released all their right therein to Robert Ingpen and Alice his sister,<sup>97</sup> members of a family which had been established in the neighbourhood at least as early as 1336.<sup>98</sup> John Ingpen died seised of a holding in Drayton in 1510,<sup>99</sup> but the lord of the manor in the reign of Elizabeth was Sir Matthew Carew. He had married Alice the granddaughter of John Ingpen,<sup>100</sup> and in 1607 they sold the estate to Edmund Ryves.<sup>101</sup> In 1614 John Ryves died seised of the manor and was succeeded by his son Edmund,<sup>102</sup> who died in 1639, leaving the estate to his infant son and heir John.<sup>103</sup> In 1684 Drayton was sold to the owners of Cranborne in Wonston,<sup>104</sup> and it has since followed the same descent as that manor.

The church of ALL SAINTS consists CHURCH of a chancel 30 ft. 11 in. by 16 ft. 9 in., north transept 16 ft. 11 in. wide by 12 ft. deep, south transept 16 ft. 7 in. wide by 14 ft. 8 in. deep, nave 38 ft. 2 in. by 17 ft., north aisle 9 ft. 11 in. wide, south aisle 10 ft. 4 in. wide and west tower 10 ft. 9 in. by 12 ft. deep. All these measurements are internal.

The oldest work in the church is part of a nave of two bays which had narrow aisles, and a chancel of which no evidence remains; this was built late in the 12th century. About 1250 the building was enlarged almost to its present size, the nave being increased to three bays, and the chancel and transepts added as they now stand and the aisles widened. The aisles were remodelled, though probably not rebuilt, in the 15th century, and near the end of the same century the tower was added. It was brought partly into the nave, breaking the westernmost bays of the arcades; doubtless because of the nearness of the west boundary of the churchyard. Since then no important alterations or additions have been made beyond the porch (built in 1862) and the usual restorations, &c. Much plain stone surface in the church has been retooled in modern times, causing it to lose almost all appearance of age.

The 13th-century scheme of enlargement eastward is very well planned, giving a great deal of floor space with the minimum of obstruction by the supports required. Similar cruciform enlargements are not uncommon at the date, Milford-on-Sea being a very fine example.

The east window of the chancel has old quoin-stones to the inner jambs and an old chamfered rear arch, but the rest, consisting of three plain lancet lights, is modern. On either side of the window are half-octagonal brackets, both cut away below; the south one has a face carved on its chamfered front edge. In the south wall is a piscina with a filleted edge roll on its jambs and trefoiled head; at the springing are the grooves for a wooden shelf. The window in this wall has two lancet lights with a chamfered rear arch, and is all modern except the inner jambs and rear arch. The north wall is unpierced, but there are signs in the flintwork outside of the former existence of a window.

The church has north and south arcades of four bays, the western bay being broken into by the east wall of the tower.

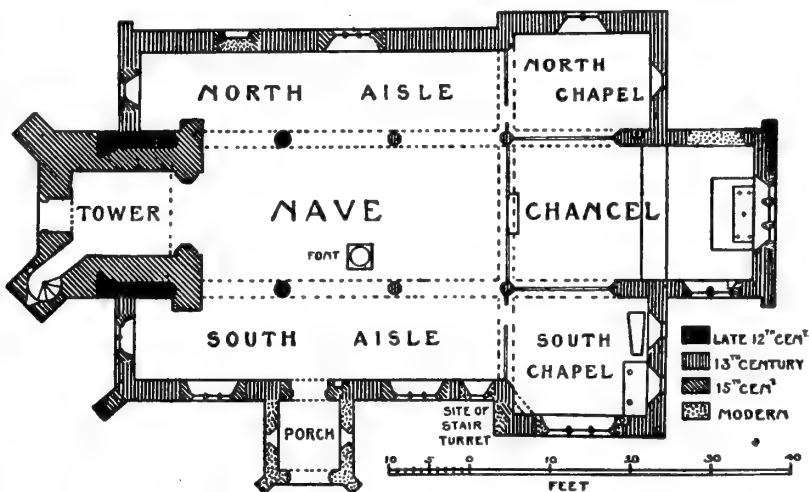

One bay is in the chancel, the chancel arch and the western arches of the transepts springing from the first pillars, which are no larger than the others in spite of their extra burden and add to the general effect of lightness. The two eastern bays of the arcades are of 13th-century work and have slender octagonal pillars with bases of two rounds, and moulded bell capitals; the second pair of pillars, which take the place of the former east responds of the 12th-century nave, have plain chamfered abaci, and the capitals, except that of the second pillar of the south arcade, are enriched with nail-head or dog-tooth ornament. The arches are two centred and of two chamfered orders, they spring from an octagonal die rising above the capital, after a manner common in the latter part of the 13th century. The chancel arch is like the others, and the two west bays of the arcades are of 12th-century date, the pillars (the third on either side) being round and more substantial than the others. The bases are moulded with a round and ogee, and are obviously of later date. The capital in the north arcade is scalloped, and square in plan above, with a grooved and chamfered abacus, while that on the south is moulded. The arches, which are of a single chamfered order with grooved and chamfered labels on both faces, hardly find room on the abacus, suggesting that they are cut through an older wall, which is probably the case, and an aisleless nave must have existed before the late 12th-century enlargements. The western responds are buried in the later walling of the tower which encroaches on the arcades, but the face of the north respond and part of its arch are visible in the walling beyond the tower buttress in the north aisle, and the western angles of the nave show outside on the tower walls.

The north transept has a lancet window in its east wall with a modern head and some new stones in the jambs. In the south wall is a small plain piscina with a chamfered two-centred head, and in the north wall a window of two lancets with a quatrefoil over within a segmental inclosing arch; it has a chamfered rear arch and appears to be entirely original.

The arch between the transept and north aisle is similar in detail to the others, but its north jamb is chamfered only on the east side, the soffit being flush with the aisle wall; its capital is moulded and has a hollow-chamfered abacus.

The only window in the north wall of the north aisle is one of the 15th century, which has three cinquefoiled lights under a four-centred arch with a moulded outer label. West of the window is a blocked doorway of the same date, with chamfered jambs and four-centred arch; the west window of the aisle is a trefoiled single light with a four-centred head and label similar to that of the north window.

The south transept has two lancets in its east wall, although it is of little greater depth than the other; both are original but partly restored. The south window of the transept appears to be all modern; it has three lancet lights, the middle one taller than the others, with a moulded label outside; below it is a plain pointed piscina with a round basin. In the angle west of the window is the entrance to a rood-stair turret, the three lowest steps of which, now shown, were discovered in 1901; the bottom step is 4 ft. 5 in.

above the floor. The arch into the aisle corresponds with that opposite. The lancet window to the west of it, in the south wall, is all modern, and occupies the place of the doorway from the turret; west of it is a 15th-century window of three cinquefoiled lights under a four-centred head, which is interesting as having cut on its outer sill a 15th-century inscription: 'Hic jacet humatus Ihon Pann (or Paull) civellia natus.' The south doorway is of two chamfered orders, with a two-centred drop arch; it is all modernized except a part of the arch, which is of 15th-century date, and has to the east, inside the church, a holy water recess. Over the doorway are set two carved stones. The third south window is of three lights resembling the second; and the west window is one of the same date with two lights.

The tower is built of ashlar in three stages with diagonal buttresses at its western angles, and at the north-east and south-east smaller buttresses flush with the wall and stopping below the aisle roofs. The arch opening from the nave has semi-octagonal jambs and an arch of three chamfered orders dying on the jambs. The west wall is pierced by a doorway and a window, the former with double hollow-chamfered jambs and four-centred arch under a square head with a plain cut label; the window has three lights with plain four-centred heads under a square plain cut label.

The stair turret is set diagonally at the south-west angle. The second stage has rectangular lights on the west and south, and the third, or bell-chamber stage, has three-light windows like that on the lowest stage. The parapet is embattled, and has grotesques projecting from its moulded string-course; at the angles are crocketed pinnacles, probably later restorations. The stair turret rises in octagonal form above the parapet.

The walling of the church is of the local flint with stone dressings, and the roofs are covered with tiles. The chancel roof is modern, open timbered below, with half-round trusses to each rafter; the nave has a half-round plastered ceiling, and both transepts have ceilings plastered below the collar-beam trusses; the north aisle roof is half gabled, and the south aisle has a flat lean-to roof.

The altar table is of the 17th century, and has its front legs carved with figures of Faith, Hope and Charity.

The other furniture is all modern except the font, which is contemporary with the late 12th-century church; it has a square bowl of Purbeck marble, the sloping sides being relieved with shallow round-headed panels. The basin is circular and lines have been cut in the spandrels of the top; it is supported on a round stem and four round shafts with moulded bases standing on a modern chamfered plinth. The cover is a flat one of nine small quatre-foiled panels made up in 1870 from a screen formerly in Longparish Church.

There are no old monuments beyond some 17th-century gravestones and later mural wall tablets, &c.

There are five bells, all but the second by Cor of Aldbourne, 1725; the second is by T. Mears, 1828. On the third bell is 'C. WINKWOTH GAVE FIVE GUINEAS, 1725,' and on the fourth, 'MARTIN WRIGHT ESQUIER GAVE TEN GUINEAS, 1725.'

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten cover of 1569, an undated paten, a flagon of early 19th-century workmanship given by Mr. J. W. B. Birch, of Cavendish Square, W., tenant of Drayton Park from May 1868 to October 1880, and a plated paten and two glass cruets. There are also a pewter flagon and two pewter plates.

The registers are in two books, the first containing baptisms and burials from 1713 to 1812, and marriages from 1713 to 1750; the second containing marriages from 1761 to 1812.

The church of Barton Stacey ADVOWSON stood upon the land held by Walter son of Roger de Pistes in 1086<sup>105</sup> and afterwards by his son Miles Earl of Gloucester, who gave it, circa 1136, to the abbey of Lanthony, co. Gloucester.<sup>106</sup> A question as to the right of presentation which arose between the king and the Prior of Lanthony in 1260<sup>107</sup> was decided in favour of the latter, and licence to appropriate the church was afterwards granted to the priory.<sup>108</sup> After the Dissolution the advowson was granted in 1541 to the Dean and Chapter of Winchester,<sup>109</sup> the present patrons. Dependent on the church of Barton Stacey was the chapel of Newton Stacey, which was appropriated to the priory of Lanthony with the mother church.<sup>110</sup> It seems to have been destroyed about 1635, for in that year Sir Robert Payne complained that some of the parishioners had demolished the chapel at Newton Stacey and maliciously opposed his intent to restore at his own charge the church of Barton Stacey which he had found ruinous.<sup>111</sup>

A Primitive Methodist chapel was built in Barton Stacey in 1844.

In 1774 Jacob Hinxman by will CHARITIES devised a field in the parish, containing 1a. 1r. 21p., now let at £3 a year, for the distribution of bread. In 1907 52 gallons of bread were given to sixty-six persons.

In 1784 Dorothy Wright and Elizabeth Wright (sisters) by deed (enrolled) gave £700 stock upon trust that the income should be applied for the education of twelve poor children, and subject thereto for the poor. The trust fund now consists of £700 consols, producing yearly £17 10s., of which the sum of £12 10s. is paid to the Education Committee of the Hants County Council and £5 to the managers of the Barton Stacey School.

In 1791 the same Elizabeth Wright by deed (enrolled) gave a further sum of £700 stock upon trust that the income should be distributed every St. Thomas's Day among poor inhabitants not in receipt of parish relief. The trust fund now consists of £700 consols producing yearly £17 10s. In 1907 sixty-six persons received gifts of money.

In 1905 Mrs. Martha Sharrow, by will proved 29 July, bequeathed to the vicar and churchwardens £100 upon trust to invest the same and apply the income—subject to the repair of grave—to some deserving old man or woman resident in the parish. The legacy was invested in £115 2s. 1d. consols, producing yearly £2 17s. 4d.

The several sums of stock are held by the official trustees.

COLEMORE

Colemere (xi cent.); Colemeare, Connere (xiv cent.); Colemore (xviii cent.).

The parish of Colemore or Colmer contains 1,472 acres of land; though less picturesque than the neighbouring parish of Priors Dean, it is in the midst of well-wooded and undulating country. There are 779 acres of arable land, 558½ under permanent grass and 31 acres of woodland.<sup>1</sup> Colemore village lies in the north-east part of the parish. John Greaves, the celebrated mathematician, was born at Colemore Rectory in 1602. He was appointed sub-warden of Merton College, Oxford, and ejected by the Parliamentary visitors in 1648, when he lost many of his books and manuscripts. Some of these were afterwards recovered for him by his friend Selden, but after his death they were dispersed; his astronomical instruments, however, were left to the Savilian Library, Oxford. John Greaves was the eldest son of the rector of Colemore, Rev. John Greaves, the tutor of George Wither, the poet, who wrote an affectionate epigram to him in 1613, and the father of three celebrated sons. Edward, the second son, studied medicine at Padua and Leyden, and was appointed Linacre Reader of Physic at Oxford in 1643; he is supposed to have been created a baronet by Charles I in 1646, and afterwards became physician in ordinary to Charles II. Thomas Greaves, the orientalist, was the youngest of the three; he became Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1636, and deputy Reader of Arabic in 1637.

Richard Pococke, rector of Colemore from 1660 to 1719, was also the father of a distinguished man, Richard Pococke the traveller, who published descriptions of his travels in the East in 1743 and 1745.

A little to the south of the church is Colemore Farm, and close to the farm at the corner where Shell Lane meets the road is the Knap, which occurs in the 13th century as the Knappe<sup>2</sup>; almost opposite is a road which leads past Becksettle Farm (Bucsetle, Bikesettle, xiii cent.)<sup>3</sup> and across Colemore Common to the south-west. At the turn of the road into Colemore village beyond the Knap stands the school, and Hermitage (oc. xvi cent.)<sup>4</sup> is some distance away to the south. Field Farm is close to the boundary between Colemore and Priors Dean. Blountysmere<sup>5</sup> is another place-name occurring in the 13th century.

The soil is clay, the subsoil chalk. The chief crops are cereals.

The manor of COLEMORE 'with MANORS all its appurtenances except Dene' was granted in free alms to the priory of Southwick by John Count of Mortain, whose charter was confirmed by King Richard in 1198.<sup>6</sup> Other confirmations of the grant were made by Henry III<sup>7</sup> and by Edward II,<sup>8</sup> who also granted the prior and convent free warren in all their demesne lands in Dean and Colemore in 1320.<sup>9</sup>

The manor continued to belong to the priory until the Dissolution in 1538,<sup>10</sup> when it fell into the hands of the king, who granted it in 1539 to Anne of Cleves<sup>11</sup> and in 1541 to Katherine Howard.<sup>12</sup> In 1544 it was granted to Edward Elrington and Humphrey Metcalf,<sup>13</sup> who received licence to alienate it to Sir John Williams and Christopher Edmondes,<sup>14</sup> from whom Richard Compton obtained it the same year.<sup>15</sup>

The Compton family retained the estate until 1634,<sup>16</sup> when John the grandson of Richard Compton died, leaving as his heir his sister Elizabeth, who had married Sir Benjamin Tichborne.

On the death of their son Compton in 1657 the manor passed to the descendants of Sir Benjamin's brother Francis, whose great-grandson, Sir Henry Tichborne, bart., was the owner in 1689.<sup>17</sup> Edward, the grandson of Sir Henry Tichborne, in 1826 assumed the name of Doughty in pursuance of a direction contained in the will of his kinswoman Elizabeth Doughty of Snarford Hall; he held the manor of Colemore in 1831, and died in 1853, when he was succeeded by his brother, Sir James Francis,<sup>18</sup> whose great-grandson, Sir Joseph Henry Bernard Doughty-Tichborne, bart., is the present owner. However, a large part of the Tichborne land, namely, 390 acres, was sold to Mr. George Arthur Jervoise Scott in 1876 and belongs now to his younger brother and heir, Mr. Archibald Edward Scott of Rotherfield Park.<sup>19</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

COLEMORE FARM—The only entry concerning Colemore in Domesday Book is that which states that 1 hide of land there was held by Humfrey the Chamberlain.<sup>20</sup> This holding does not seem to have been included in the grant to Southwick Priory, for its tenants often styled themselves lords of the manor of Colemore, and had usually the patronage of the church.<sup>21</sup> The name Kernet first occurs about 1166, when Hugh de Kernet rendered account at the Exchequer of half a mark.<sup>22</sup> Hugh was still living in 1176, but he seems to have died before 1184, in which year Henry de Kernet and Isabel his wife paid 40s. for an assize against Michael de Versona.<sup>23</sup> Another Henry owned the estate in 1221,<sup>24</sup> and a 'William de Kernet lord of Colemore' was a witness to a grant of land to Southwick Priory in 1278.<sup>25</sup> The manor still belonged to the Kernets in 1299, when William, who was probably a son of the 'lord of Colemore,' held it from his brother John for the yearly rent of one rose,<sup>26</sup> but before 1339 the estate had passed to Thomas de Westcote,<sup>27</sup> whose descendants remained in possession and were patrons of the church till the beginning of the 16th century.<sup>28</sup> In 1522 'the lands which formerly belonged to John Westcote' were held by Richard Norton of Colemore, who was also patron of the church,<sup>29</sup> and in 1536 Richard Norton of East Tisted died seised of the reversion of the manor of Colemore after the death of his namesake.<sup>30</sup> He was succeeded by his son and heir John,<sup>31</sup> who probably gave the estate to his daughter Margaret on her marriage with Thomas Uvedale of Wickham (co. Hants) in 1549.<sup>32</sup> Their daughter Ellen married Peter Bettesworth of Milland (co. Sussex),<sup>33</sup> whose father Thomas Bettesworth bought Colemore Farm from the Uvedales for £80.<sup>34</sup> Peter Bettesworth was knighted in 1608. He quarrelled with his son Thomas because of the 'wasteful expenses' and 'unnatural and dysobediente disposyon' of the latter, who had married, against his father's will, Bridget the daughter of Sir Richard Hyde near Abington before 1614, whose marriage portion was only £600 or £700.<sup>35</sup> Sir Peter afterwards granted to the young couple a twenty-one years' lease of Colemore Farm,<sup>36</sup> but he ultimately sold it to Robert Ball,<sup>37</sup> reserving a rent of which Bridget the 'widow of Thomas Bettesworth' was seised as jointure in 1637.<sup>38</sup> Robert Ball was succeeded by his nephew William in 1640.<sup>39</sup> At this time the farm was probably sold or leased to a John

Palmer who lived at Colmer from 1668 to 1680.<sup>40</sup> Thus in 1728 John Palmer, probably a son of the former, sold it to Henry Read and others, and in 1742 it was bought by Sir John Peachey, bart., who in 1744 obtained an Act of Parliament to exchange the estate for land in West Dean (co. Sussex) which belonged to Thomas Knight of Chawton.<sup>41</sup> Edward Knight of Chawton was seised of Colemore Farm in 1815,<sup>42</sup> and sold it in 1824 to James Scott of Rotherfield Park, on whose death in 1835 Colemore passed to his son James Winter Scott, who died in 1873. Archibald Edward Scott, fourth but only surviving son of James Winter Scott, holds the estate at the present day.<sup>43</sup>

The church of ST. PETER AD VIN-CHURCH CULA has a chancel 16 ft. wide by 17 ft. 2 in., nave 15 ft. 6 in. by 43 ft., north transept 12 ft. 5 in. by 13 ft., and south porch. The walls are of flint rubble with sandstone dressings, 2 ft. 6 in. thick, and belong for the most part to the first half of the 12th century, the principal structural changes which have taken place being the rebuilding of the chancel in the 19th century and the destruction at some earlier date of a south transept balancing that on the north. A plan in the library of the Society of Antiquaries shows that the chancel before rebuilding was narrower than the nave, instead of a few inches wider as now, and was separated from it by a chancel arch. At the present time it has three trefoiled lancets in its east wall and two uncusped in the south, all of modern stonework, and in its north wall is a round-headed light, which also seems to be modern, and has beneath it and partly breaking into its sill a segmental arched recess in the wall, with a sunk four-centred panel in its east jamb. This is in part of old masonry, and to the west of the round-headed light is a plain lancet, through the west jamb of which passes a squint from the north transept.

At the west of the chancel is a screen with clumsy Gothic detail, the original parts of which, including the tracery of the central opening and the ovolo-moulded head and rails, are probably of 17th-century date. The transept opens to the nave by a plain semicircular arch 6 ft. 6 in. wide, with a chamfered string at the springing, its centre being set considerably to the west of the centre line of the transept. The lower parts of the jambs of a similar arch are to be seen in the south wall of the nave in a corresponding position, marking the entrance to the destroyed south transept. The north transept is lighted from the east by a small round-headed light of original date, and from the south by a wide lancet set near the north-east angle, of uncertain date. In the west wall, at the north end, is set a blocked round-headed arch, as of a doorway, of which no traces are to be seen on the outer face of the wall. At the south-east angle of the transept is a round-headed piscina recess, and near it in the south wall part of a 15th-century stair to a now destroyed rood loft.

The nave has three modern three-light windows on the south and a plain pointed south doorway, which may be a late 13th-century insertion, while in the north wall is a small lancet window with an outer reveal for a frame, set high in the wall. It is of chalk ashlar, and probably of 13th-century date. The west window of the nave is modern, of two lights with a quatrefoil in the head. Over the west end of the nave is a wooden bell turret, and the west parts of the north and south wall of the nave are carried up in masonry higher than the rest of the wall, the floor of the bell-chamber being laid at a level with the tie-beams of the nave. The chancel roof is modern, but retains the wall plates of an older roof, while that of the nave is of plain 15th-century work, the only ornament being a four-leaved flower on the wall plates in the middle of each bay. It is plastered between the rafters, and covered externally with red tiles, like the rest of the building. The transept has an old roof with plain trussed rafters, but no detail to fix its date. In the transept are an old chest and a 17th-century altar table, and on the ladder leading to the bell-turret is cut R W 1694, the timbers of the turret being modern, though the bell frame it contains is old.

The font, near the south door of the nave, is of a late 12th-century type, of Purbeck marble, with a square bowl arcaded on two sides, and having a double-scalloped pattern on the west side and an interlacing pattern on the east. It has its original base and round central shaft, but the four angle shafts are modern. There are two bells, the treble c. 1500, with Roger Landon's marks of the lion's face and groat, and a third indistinct mark which is neither his cross nor founder's shield. The tenor, inscribed E K 1627, is the work of Ellis Knight.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1568, a paten of 1719, purchased in 1853, and a pewter flagon and two plated alms basins.

There are four books of registers; the first contains baptisms and burials from 1563 to 1762 and marriages from 1565 to 1754; the second, marriages from 1754 to 1812; the third, baptisms and burials from 1763 to 1812; the fourth (a transcript on parchment), baptisms and burials from 1800 to 1812.

The patronage of Colemore ADVOWSON Church seems to have belonged in early times to the owners of the independent hide of land. It was successfully claimed against the Abbot of Hyde in 1221 by Henry de Kernet,<sup>44</sup> whose family continued to exercise the right of presentation for the next hundred years.<sup>45</sup> When the manor passed to the Westcotes the advowson went with it; Thomas de Westcote presented to the living in 1346,<sup>46</sup> and left the right of presentation to his son Richard at his death in 1364.<sup>47</sup> Ten years later, however, the Abbot and convent of Waverley were the patrons,<sup>48</sup> and it was not until the time of Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, that the right of presentation again belonged to the owner of Colemore Farm.<sup>49</sup> John Norton presented to the living between 1530 and 1549,<sup>50</sup> in which year he sold the advowson to the Comptons.<sup>51</sup>

The owners of the large manor continued to be the patrons for nearly two hundred years. Sir Henry Joseph Tichborne, bart., presented to the living in 1719,<sup>52</sup> but in 1732 he sold the advowson to John Tarrant of Fordingbridge,<sup>53</sup> whose son and heir, Robert Thorpe Tarrant, sold it in 1758 to John Unwin,<sup>54</sup> from whom it was bought in 1762 by Thomas Harrison.<sup>55</sup> In 1767 the patron of the living was James Cookson,<sup>56</sup> who obtained a quitclaim of the advowson from Constance wife of William Webb and daughter of Thomas Harrison, in 1777.<sup>57</sup> The right of presentation belonged in 1835<sup>58</sup> to Mr. Fowler and in 1853 to the Rev. Thomas Hervey,<sup>59</sup> to whose heir, the Rev. Alfred Cyril Hervey, it now belongs.

HEADBOURNE WORTHY

Hideburninga (x cent.); Ordie (xi cent.), Wurthye, Hyldborne Worthy, Hedborne Worthy, Worthy Mortimer (xiii cent.).

Headbourne Worthy is a scattered parish lying north of Winchester, containing altogether 1,813 acres of land, of which 1,059½ acres are arable, 579½ permanent grass and 51½ woodland.<sup>1</sup> A brook flows south through the parish to join the Itchen near Headbourne Worthy village, which lies in the water meadows about a mile and a half up the Itchen valley from Winchester. A building known as Kent's Alley House, belonging to the corporation of Winchester, and traditionally connected with John Kent, have been given to St. Swithun's, Winchester, by King Egbert,<sup>4</sup> and it is mentioned as marking the boundary of the land belonging to that abbey in a charter of Edward the Elder.<sup>5</sup> In the reign of the Confessor it was sold on the condition that it should revert to the church after the death of the third possessor,<sup>6</sup> but Ralph Mortimer, who held the manor at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>7</sup> seems to have denied the obligation, for the Earls of March<sup>8</sup> continued in possession till the 15th century, though certain rents from the estate were paid 'to the Convent of St Swithun . . . separately from the portion of the abbot thereof,' at least until 1389.<sup>9</sup>

The church of St. Swithun is south of the village. Opposite it is Pudding House Farm, while the Manor Farm lies to the north-west. Headbourne Worthy House is occupied by Mr. William Alexander Hunt. The soil is chalk and loam, the subsoil chalk. The chief crops are wheat, barley and oats. The common lands were inclosed under an Act of 1788.<sup>3</sup> de Greyville in aid of the acquittance of his debts.<sup>17</sup> After his death in 1304 his widow Margaret, who held the land in dower, granted it to Aline la Poer for life.<sup>18</sup> Roger, the son of Edmund Mortimer, was executed in 1330, and his wife Joan shortly afterwards died seised of the manor,<sup>19</sup> leaving a son Edmund, who was still under age. In 1335 Edward III granted the custody of the manor to John de Hampton to hold for life for the yearly payment of 100s.,<sup>20</sup> but two years later he gave it with the right of the marriage of the heir to William de Montagu.<sup>21</sup> This evidently caused some confusion, for in 1345 Montagu's executors complained that, although John had continued to hold the manor in custody, yet the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer distrained them to answer for the issues of the said manor.<sup>22</sup> They therefore petitioned for redress, and the king replied by an order that they should be permitted to hold the estate until the heir was of age.<sup>23</sup>

MORTIMER. Barry or and azure a chief or with two pales between two gyrons azure therein and a scutcheon argent over all.

About 1351 Roger Mortimer granted the manor and advowson of Headbourne Worthy to Sir Ralph Spigurnel, kt., for life,<sup>24</sup> but this grant seems to have been afterwards vacated; for although Roger died in 1361,<sup>25</sup> when Sir Ralph Spigurnel was still living,<sup>26</sup> Katherine the wife of Thomas Spigurnel was afterwards seised of two-thirds of the manor 'which she held conjointly with Thomas her late husband for terms of their lives by gifts and feoffment of Roger Mortimer, late Earl of March.'<sup>27</sup> On her death in 1374 the estate reverted to Edmund son of Roger Mortimer, her 'kinsman and heir.'<sup>28</sup> Edmund, on his death in 1382,<sup>29</sup> was succeeded by his son Roger, who died in 1398,<sup>30</sup> leaving an infant heir Edmund, during whose minority £5 yearly from the issues of the manor were granted to his mother Eleanor, then the wife of Lord Powys, for the support of his sisters.<sup>31</sup> One of these sisters, Anne, married Richard Earl of Cambridge, and her son, Richard Duke of York, succeeded to the estate on the death of his uncle Edmund in 1424.<sup>32</sup> In 1461 Headbourne Worthy was granted by Edward IV to his mother, Cecily Duchess of York, for life.<sup>33</sup> Elizabeth queen of Henry VII presented to the living in the time of Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester,<sup>34</sup> but whether the manor had been granted to her by Henry VII as part of her jointure or whether she was holding it in her own right as one of the daughters and co-heirs of Edward IV is uncertain. The right of Henry VIII to the manor was substantiated by a quitclaim from his aunts, Katherine Courtenay and Anne Howard, the other two daughters and co-heirs of Edward IV, in 1511,<sup>35</sup> and in the same year he settled the reversion of the manor, which was then held in dower by Catherine of Aragon,<sup>36</sup> upon Katherine Courtenay and her heirs by William Earl of Devon.<sup>37</sup> However, on the attainder of Henry Marquess of Exeter, the son of Katherine Courtenay, in 1539, the manor reverted to the king, who afterwards bestowed it on his queen, Jane Seymour.<sup>38</sup> In 1543 the king granted it at a rent of £20 for a term of twenty-one years to Edmund Clerke,<sup>39</sup> who obtained renewals of the lease from Edward VI,<sup>40</sup> Queen Mary<sup>41</sup> and Queen Elizabeth.<sup>42</sup> James I granted the estate in 1607 to Robert Earl of Salisbury and his heirs,<sup>43</sup> but the earl by his will of 1614 granted it to Sir Walter Cope and others as trustees 'that they should sell it to pay his debts.'<sup>44</sup> It was bought by Sir Thomas Clerke, the lessee of the manor, who was holding Worthy Pauncefoot (q.v.). He settled both manors on his son Henry in 1625,<sup>45</sup> and died seised in 1630.<sup>46</sup> Henry evidently died without children, for in 1652 the owner of Headbourne Worthy was Edmund Clerke, grandson and heir of Edmund Clerke, of South Stoneham,<sup>47</sup> who was probably a younger son of Henry the Eighth's lessee.

There were three mills in the parish at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>53</sup> One of these was afterwards burdened by a yearly rent of one mark to Godstow Abbey (co. Oxon.),<sup>54</sup> but in 1257 a fine was levied between Emma, Abbess of Godstow, and Roger Mortimer, by which the abbess quitclaimed for herself and her successors any right which she had in the rent to Roger and his heirs.<sup>55</sup> There was one water-mill in the parish in 1826.<sup>56</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

WORTHY PAUNCEFOOT (Pancevolt, xi cent.; Pancevot, xiii cent.; Pauncefote, xiv cent.; Pantefoote, Paunsford, xvii cent.). A small manor called Worthy, which had been held of King Edward the Confessor by Earl Godwine,<sup>57</sup> was held at the time of the Domesday Survey by Bernard Pauncefoot,<sup>58</sup> and continued in the possession of his descendants for more than 400 years.<sup>59</sup> The land was assessed at 1 hide in 1086,<sup>60</sup> and was described as the fourth part of a knight's fee in the 13th century, when it was held of Humphrey de Bohun Earl of Hereford by Lemuel Pauncefoot.<sup>61</sup> The overlordship of the Bohuns, Earls of Hereford, here as in other instances, began, as Mr. Round infers from the fact that they do not appear as holders in Hampshire in 1086, with the growth of the Bohuns to power in the 12th century. With the merging of their honours in the Crown in 1372-3 the overlordship ceased.

In the 15th century the owner was Robert Pauncefoot, whose daughter and heir Elizabeth married James Daubeney, the High Sheriff of Dorset, about 1488.<sup>62</sup> After her death in 1528<sup>63</sup> the manor passed to her only son Giles, who married Elizabeth sister of Hugh Oldham, Bishop of Exeter.<sup>64</sup> Their eldest son Hugh sold Worthy Pauncefoot in 1562 to William Bethell,<sup>65</sup> who died shortly afterwards, for Richard Bethell was seised of the manor before 1565,<sup>66</sup> with remainder to William his son. Zachariah, the eldest son of this William,<sup>67</sup> sold the estate to Thomas Clerke in 1594. Thomas Clerke was afterwards knighted and died seised of the manor in 1617,<sup>68</sup> when he was succeeded by his son of the same name who was also a knight.<sup>69</sup> This Sir Thomas Clerke bought Headbourne Worthy from the trustees of the Earl of Salisbury, and Worthy Pauncefoot has followed from that date the same descent as the larger manor (q.v.).

The church of ST. SWITHUN CHURCH consists of a chancel 26 ft. 3 in. by 14 ft. 10 in., nave 42 ft. by 19 ft. 7 in. with a tower at the south-west end 10 ft. 8 in. square, and beyond the west end of the nave a building 14 ft. 2 in. by 9 ft. 11 in., formerly of two stories. A south porch is built against the east wall of the tower.

The building is of great interest, preserving in its nave and the western part of its chancel the plan and a good deal of the walling of a pre-Conquest church, probably of the early part of the 11th century. The site is unfortunately very wet, and it is clear that from an early date the foundations have caused trouble. The original chancel arch was doubtless a narrow one and its outward thrust slight, but when it was replaced by a wider opening the nave walls must soon have proved unequal to the strain, and as early as the 13th century repairs became necessary. The south wall of the nave seems to have been entirely rebuilt at this date and the south-west tower added, while the north-east angle of the nave was partly and the south-east angle wholly rebuilt about the same time. The chancel also seems to have been rebuilt in the 13th century, with the exception of the western part of its south wall, and it was evidently lengthened eastwards at the same time. In the 15th century buttresses were added north and south of the nave, and early in the 16th century the western chamber was built against the west wall of the nave.

The south porch is a modern addition. In modern times the chancel has been practically rebuilt, and very extensive repairs have been made in the nave; at the present time the chancel arch is in a very shaky condition, and only held up by wooden shores, and the west chamber has been tied by iron rods to prevent it from falling. The walling is of flint rubble, the ashlar in the early work being Binstead stone. Three pilaster strips of this stone remain on the north wall of the nave and one on the south wall of the chancel and the original long and short quoins at the north-east angle of the nave are also of this material.

The chancel has a modern east window of three trefoiled lights with foiled arches in the head, a modern lancet on the south above the sedilia, and at the south-west a 14th-century window of two trefoiled lights, the lower parts cut off by a transom, and rebated on the inner face for wooden frames.

The north wall is unpierced and has only a modern arched recess for the organ.

Below the south lancet is a large square-headed piscina recess with stop-chamfered jambs and a stone shelf. The bowl of the drain projected from the wall face, but has been broken away. To the west, forming part of the same work, are three sedilia separated by stop-chamfered mullions and having low segmental heads, evidently of much later date than the jambs and built in hard chalk, the older work being of Binstead stone. The springing, however, at either end is in Binstead stone and apparently original, so that the lines of the head must be nearly the same as those of the original work, the date of which was probably c. 1230.

The chancel arch is modern and has chamfered jambs and a two-centred arch of two chamfered and moulded orders. It is nearly as wide as the chancel and, as has been said, is in a very shaky condition.

In the north wall of the nave are three windows, the easternmost being a small trefoiled lancet appa-knights made by Humphrey de Bohun under Wiltshire in 1166, it is possible to say for certain that Worthy Pauncefoot was held of the Bohuns, Earls of Hereford. Thus in 1166 Humphrey Pauncefoot held one and a half knights' fees of Humphrey de Bohun (Red Bk. of Exch. i, 243), and this is represented in the Testa by Lemuel Pauncefoot's holding in Headbourne Worthy, Little Somborne, and Mainstone in Romsey. Vide also under Over Wallop (Thorngate Hundred) rently of late 13th-century date. The second window is a 15th-century insertion and has two cinquefoiled lights with a quatrefoil in the head and hollow chamfered internal jambs and rear arch, and the third window is a modern single light of 15th-century style.

The two south windows of the nave are like the middle window on the north but with modern tracery.

Near the east end of the south wall is a much defaced 13th-century piscina of very beautiful design, with a trefoiled head enriched with foliage and attached shafts with moulded bases and capitals in the jambs. It has a groove for a wooden shelf.

The south doorway, also of the 13th century, has double chamfered jambs and a pointed arch with modern abaci and a modern trefoiled inner order. The doorway into the tower in the south wall of the nave has chamfered jambs and a four-centred chalk head and rear arch probably of 15th-century date. The west wall of the nave is the most complete part of the pre-Conquest church, and preserves its original doorway of Binstead stone. It has square jambs and semicircular arch of a single order with a small projecting pilaster strip on the west side which continues round the arch and jambs, mitreing with the chamfered abaci and bases. The strip is cut away in the head for the 16th-century floor of the western chamber, and the inner face of the arch is rebated for a door, this being also a late mediaeval alteration, but otherwise the whole is very perfect. Immediately from the head of the doorway rose the base of a large stone rood, having figures of our Lady and St. John on either side, and above it a hand from clouds as at Romsey. It is clearly part of the original work, and, though only its outline remains, the figures having been cut away to the wall face, the effect is exceedingly imposing and must have been much more so before the 16th-century building was set up. The figures are of more than life size, and were evidently in rather low relief, such lines of drapery as have survived being excellently drawn and the pose of the figures dignified. The deplorable mutilation they have suffered is usually laid to the account of Bishop Horne of Winchester, 1560-80, who ordered the destruction of all crucifixes in his diocese. Whoever the miscreant may have been, he has defaced a very fine and valuable specimen of old English sculpture. The only untouched part is the cloud over the Hand of God above the rood and a horizontal course of stone with beaded edges immediately above it.

The western chamber has in the lower stage a small loop light in the south wall and a west doorway with chamfered jambs and four-centred head. Above these the walls set back, the upper room having been lighted by north and south windows with four-centred uncusped lights under square heads. The north window is of two lights and the south of three; to the east of it is a small four-centred piscina recess and all round the walls are remains of the monograms in black, showing that the whole upper room was decorated and fitted up as a chapel, with an altar below the stone rood.

The tower is low and has a top stage of weatherboarding which has been recently restored. The west face has two windows, the lower of which is a small 13th-century lancet with rebated jambs and the one above it is a restored lancet of the same date. There was also another window in the south face of the bottom stage, as indicated by jamb stones inside the wall. The inside of the tower has large posts in the angles which entirely support the bells and cage above. The south porch is modern and has an outer archway with shafted jambs and moulded pointed arch. On the east face of the tower within the porch is a small four-centred recess with carved spandrels which no doubt once served as a holy water stoup. The walls generally are of flint with stone dressings; the south chancel walls have stone bondings and the nave and tower walls have been repointed. The western chamber has a coat of plaster over the flint. The buttresses to the tower and the one at the north-west end of the nave are of stone, the others are of flint with stone facing and weathering. The roofs are tiled.

The chancel has a modern open timber roof, but that to the nave is of the 15th century and has a moulded ridge and at the west end a tie-beam. It is of four bays, and was designed to have a low arched plaster ceiling, divided into panels by the ridge purlins and braces on the principals. At the intersections of the timbers meant to project from the plaster there are carved bosses.

The desk, which serves as a pulpit, incloses a very beautiful piece of open tracery in the spandrels of pierced foliage, very like the work of the cathedral stalls at Winchester and dating from c. 1280-1300. Its moulded two-centred head incloses two trefoiled arches with a cinquefoiled circle over, resting on modern ringed shafts with foliate capitals. Against the uprights of the desk are set wooden busts of much later date.

The font is circular and has a moulded bowl and base. The upper part is of Binstead stone and is probably a recutting from an older shape.

On the floor of the western chamber are some mediaeval floor tiles, four of which form a circular design with an inscription which is too worn away to be legible.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

In the small loop light in the south wall of the chamber is a fragment of 15th-century glass representing an angel in a shield, &c.

The only monument of any importance is an undated brass on the north wall of the chancel which bears an inscription to John Kent, a scholar of Winchester College, who was the son of Simon Kent of Reading. Above the inscription is the figure of a boy in the loose college gown buttoned at the neck and a scroll with 'Misericordias dñi in et'nū cantabo' issues from his mouth.

The tower contains three pre-Reformation bells, all by the same founder. The treble has no inscription, but has the three marks used by Roger Landon and the Reading foundry, the lion's face, cross, and groat. The second bell bears the inscription 'Sancte Gabriel' in black letters with crowned capitals, and it also has the lion's face and coin as on the treble, and also a form of crowned cross. The tenor is inscribed 'Sancte Nicolae' and bears exactly the same marks as the second.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten of 1877 and a silver-gilt flagon of the same date.

There are two books of registers; the first contains baptisms and burials from 1637 to 1812 and marriages from 1637 to 1753, with a few earlier entries from 1615, and a gap from 1644 to 1660; the second contains marriages from 1755 to 1812.

There was a church in Headbourne Worthy at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>70</sup> and the right of presentation early belonged to the lords of the manor. It was exercised by Lord Powys in right of Eleanor his wife, the widow of Roger Earl of March, in 1403,<sup>71</sup> but with this exception the patron until the middle of the 15th century was always a Mortimer, though on two occasions the king presented 'by reason of his guardianship of Edmund the heir,' namely,

Edmund the son of the Roger Mortimer who died in 1283, and Edmund the son of the Roger who was executed in 1330.<sup>72</sup> Cecily Duchess of York thrice presented to the living,<sup>73</sup> and after her death the advowson passed with the manor to her granddaughter Elizabeth.<sup>74</sup> It was not included in the grant to Katherine Courtenay, and Queen Katherine was the patron when Gardiner was Bishop of Winchester.<sup>75</sup>

James I granted the advowson with the manor in 1607 to Robert Cecil,<sup>76</sup> and the Earls of Salisbury continued to be the patrons till 1686.<sup>77</sup> Before 1695 the right of presentation had been bought by Dr. Radcliffe, who presented his friend Joseph Bingham, the author of Origines Ecclesiasticae, in that year.<sup>78</sup> His trustees presented to the living in 1738,<sup>79</sup> and the advowson afterwards passed, in accordance with his will, to the Master and Fellows of University College, Oxford, who are the patrons at the present day.

In 1686 the Rev. Robert Fishwicke, CHARITIES rector, bequeathed £50 for the poor, augmented by his widow, Mary Fishwicke, to £80. The principal sum was in 1699 laid out in the purchase of a rent-charge of £4 charged on land known as Rotherley Coppice, part of the Worthy Park estate. The annuity is paid by Captain Fryer and distributed in money to thirty poor persons.

Church Land.—This parish has been in possession from time immemorial of about 3½ acres, known as 'Chisslands,' now let at £3 10s. a year, which is applied towards the expenses of the church.

In 1888 James Dear by deed settled a house, known as the Old Rectory, for the benefit of deserving parishioners. The trust property now consists of two cottages, forming three tenements, and a garden, occupied by various poor. About £6 a year is paid by way of rent, which is required for repairs.

KINGS WORTHY

Ordie (xi cent.); Worthy (xii cent.); Kyngeswordeye (xiii cent.).

Kings Worthy parish, which includes the tithing of Abbots Worthy, contains 2,241 acres of land, of which 1,091 are arable and 853½ permanent grass.<sup>1</sup>

The village is in the south of the parish in the Itchen valley about 2 miles from Winchester, and on the line of the Roman road from Silchester to Winchester.<sup>2</sup> The church of St. Mary is at the south-west end of the village. Thomas Vowler Short (1790–1872), successively Bishop of Sodor and Man and St. Asaph, resided at Kings Worthy from 1829 to 1834, when he accepted the rectory of St. George's, Bloomsbury, from the Lord Chancellor Brougham.<sup>2a</sup> His successor was Charles Thomas Baring, afterwards Bishop of Durham, who held the living, then in the gift of his brother, Sir Francis Thornhill Baring, until 1847.

Kingsworthy House is occupied by Miss Turnor; Kingsworthy Court by Mr. Hubert James Austin; The Mount by Captain Bernard Granville. Abbots Worthy House is the property and residence of the Right Hon. Lord Eversley, P.C., J.P.

The soil is chalk and loam, the subsoil chalk. The chief crops are wheat, barley and oats. The common lands known as Worthy Down were inclosed in 1852.<sup>3</sup>

Among place-names in local records are the following:—Nursery Field, Durnells, Rotherley Coppice, Barton Croft and Dry Knoll (xix cent.).<sup>4</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey MANORS Kings Worthy was one of the appurtenances of Barton Stacey,<sup>5</sup> but it was granted away from the Crown lands before the rest of that manor. A rent of £15 'blanch' from the estate was granted to Hugh Tyrrell in 1158,<sup>6</sup> and to Geoffrey le Moyne nine years later.<sup>7</sup> Between 1181 and 1189 Henry II granted the manor to Walter the usher of the king's chamber to hold in chief by the annual rent of a pair of gilded spurs.<sup>8</sup> Walter was succeeded by his brother Aimery le Despenser, who in 1205 obtained from King John a confirmation of 'the land of Worthy which King Henry our father gave to Walter the son of Thurstan.'<sup>9</sup> Ralf le Moyne as heir of Hugh Tyrrell sued Thurstan the son and heir of Aimery<sup>9a</sup> for the manor in 1219-20<sup>10</sup> and Adam le Despenser, who succeeded Thurstan, was sued by William le Moyne in 1265,<sup>11</sup> but he evidently won the case, and was still the owner in the reign of Edward I, when a plea of quo warranto was brought against him, and it was decided that 'Adam had more right to the said manor than the lord king.'<sup>12</sup>

In 1286 Adam granted Kings Worthy to John Kirkby to hold of him and his heirs by the rent of a rose.<sup>13</sup> John Kirkby was created Bishop of Ely in the same year and died in 1290, leaving as his heir his brother William,<sup>14</sup> who married Christine Heringaud and died without issue.<sup>15</sup> William Inge, the heir to Christine's lands in Kent, was in possession of the manor before 1303,<sup>16</sup> in which year he obtained a grant of free warren in his demesne lands of Kings Worthy.<sup>17</sup> He was a justice of the King's Bench, and seems to have been much occupied in the public service.<sup>18</sup> In July 1310 he was sent 'on the king's business' to Aquitaine,<sup>19</sup> where he remained about a year,<sup>20</sup> during which time his kinsman Fromond Inge acted for him in England.<sup>21</sup> Before going beyond the sea William obtained from Edward II a promise that in case he should die while his heir was still under age his executors should have the marriage of the heir without hindrance of the king.<sup>22</sup> William Inge died in 1322,<sup>23</sup> after which the manor was held by his widow Iscult St. Pierre in accordance with a settlement of 1312<sup>24</sup> until her death in 1370, when it passed to William de la Zouche, the son of Joan wife of Eudo de la Zouche and daughter and heir of William Inge by his first wife Margaret.<sup>25</sup> William de la Zouche was a commissioner of the peace for the counties of Northampton and Rutland for some years,<sup>26</sup> and in July 1377 he also received a commission of array.<sup>27</sup> He died in April 1382, leaving as his heir his son and namesake,<sup>28</sup> who had been associated with him as a commissioner of the peace since the previous year.<sup>29</sup> This William granted the manor in 1393 to his paternal uncle, Thomas de la Zouche, with remainder to his son Sir

John de la Zouche and Margaret his wife in fee-tail.<sup>30</sup> On the death of Thomas de la Zouche in 1405 the manor passed in accordance with the settlement to Sir John de la Zouche, who had by Margaret his wife an only daughter and heir Elizabeth.<sup>31</sup> She left two daughters and co-heirs, Margaret, who became the wife of John Chaworth,<sup>32</sup> and Elizabeth, who married first Sir William Chaworth and secondly John Dunham.<sup>33</sup> Margaret died without issue, and her moiety was inherited by her sister,<sup>34</sup> who died in 1501, leaving the manor to her son Sir John Dunham.<sup>35</sup>

Sir John Dunham alienated the estate in 1511 to Sir William Capell,<sup>36</sup> who died four years later and was succeeded by his only son.<sup>37</sup> This was that Giles Capell who was knighted by Henry VIII for his gallantry and good services at the sieges of Terouenne and Tournay and at the Battle of Spurs.<sup>38</sup> In 1529 he held the shrievalty of the counties of Essex and Hertford, a post which was afterwards filled by more than one of his descendants.<sup>39</sup> Sir Henry Capell, the elder son and heir of Sir Giles, was succeeded by his brother Edward,<sup>40</sup> whose grandson dealt with the manor by fine in 1600,<sup>41</sup> and died seised twenty-seven years later.<sup>42</sup> His grandson and heir, created Lord Capell of Hadham on 6 August 1641, attached himself zealously to the king's cause in the Civil War, and fell a victim to his loyalty, being beheaded in Old Palace Yard on 9 March 1649.<sup>43</sup> The manor of Kings Worthy had been sequestered before 1645, in which year the Treasurers for Sequestrations complained that no rent had been paid for two quarters by the lessee William Capell, uncle of Lord Capell, 'by which it is easily conceived which way the rents are gone and how converted.'<sup>44</sup> This protest against the tenderness shown to 'the most desperate delinquents' was not without effect, for in 1650 the estate was let to Widow Wayte,<sup>45</sup> and a short time afterwards it was granted to Philip Stone on a three years' lease.<sup>46</sup>

Arthur, the son and heir of Lord Capell, sold Kings Worthy in 1657 to Bartholomew Smith,<sup>47</sup> whose elder son James joined a religious order in 1685, when his estate passed to his brother Bartholomew, who left three sons and four daughters.<sup>48</sup> The sons all died unmarried, and one of the daughters became a nun; the estate was therefore divided among the other three daughters, Elizabeth, Anastasia and Frances. Elizabeth and Frances both died without issue, and the manor became vested in Edward Sheldon, the grandson of Anastasia, who sold it in 1773 to Sir Chaloner Ogle, bart.<sup>49</sup> Sir Chaloner was succeeded by his second son, Sir Charles Ogle, bart., by whom the estate was sold to Mr. Samuel Wall in 1826,<sup>50</sup> since which time it has belonged to the owners of Martyr Worthy in the hundred of Fawley (q.v.).

There was a mill in Kings Worthy, which in 1564 was the subject of a dispute between Margaret the widow of Thomas Wayte the younger and her late husband's family, who expelled her from the mill after her second marriage.<sup>51</sup> The mill was sold to Mr. Samuel Wall by Sir Charles Ogle, bart., in 1826.<sup>52</sup>

The manor of ABBOTS WORTHY formed part of the original endowment of Hyde Abbey—the Abbey of St. Peter of Winchester, as it was called in Domesday Book.<sup>53</sup> It continued in the possession of the abbot and convent<sup>54</sup> until the Dissolution, when it fell into the hands of King Henry VIII, who granted it for life to his physician, Augustine de Augustinis, a Venetian, in 1542.<sup>55</sup> Three years later he released the reversion of the manor remaining in the Crown to Augustine, and at the same time gave him leave to alienate it to the Lord Chancellor Wriothesley,<sup>56</sup> created Earl of Southampton in 1547.<sup>57</sup> The Earls of Southampton continued in possession till the end of the 17th century,<sup>58</sup> when the estate passed to the Russells through the marriage of Lady Rachel Wriothesley, daughter and heir of the last Earl of Southampton, to William Lord Russell.<sup>59</sup> Since that date Abbots Worthy has followed the same descent as the manor of Micheldever (q.v.), the present owner being the Earl of Northbrook.

There was a mill in Abbots Worthy at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>60</sup> It was granted in 1545 to Augustine de Augustinis with the manor,<sup>61</sup> and was alienated by him to Wriothesley, afterwards Earl of Southampton, in the same year.<sup>62</sup> The owner in 1731 was John Russell.<sup>63</sup>

The church of ST. MARY, situated CHURCH on the main road from Winchester to Basingstoke at the south of the village, consists of chancel 23 ft. 3 in. by 14 ft., small north vestry, south chapel 17 ft. 7 in. by 16 ft. 11 in., nave 43 ft. 4 in. by 21 ft. 4 in., south aisle 47 ft. 5 in. by 14 ft. 3 in., and west tower 11 ft. 1 in. by 10 ft. 9 in., all these dimensions being taken internally.

Modern repair and rebuilding have removed all traces of antiquity, the tower being now the only old part of the church, and nothing of its past history can be deduced from the building. Great part of it dates from 1864, when the whole of the eastern part was rebuilt and a vestry added to the north of the chancel. The south chapel was built some years later, opening from the chancel by an arcade of two four-centred moulded arches.

The church is built of flint rubble, with limestone dressings, the modern truss rafter roofs being covered with red tiles. The tower is also of flint, but so covered with ivy that little of it can be seen; it appears to be of 15th-century date, and has an eastern arch of two chamfered orders and a west window of two cinquefoiled lights.

There is a little 15th and 16th-century stonework re-used in some of the windows of the south chapel and aisle, but otherwise there is nothing old in the building except the font and a brass inscription.

The principal entrance is by the west doorway in the tower, which has a round arch of two orders, with edge rolls continued down the jambs, and is probably late 12th-century work re-used and altered. The second stage of the tower is pierced only on the north side by a small square-headed light partly covered by a clock face; and the belfry has a small single light on each face, with square heads on the east and west, and pointed heads on the north and south, all of which are hidden by the ivy.

The octagonal font dates from the early years of the 15th century, each face of the bowl being panelled with quatrefoils inclosing shields or with traceried circles; the stem has on each face two long cinquefoiled panels, and stands upon a Purbeck marble base belonging to a font of late 12th-century type, with a bowl carried on a central and four flanking shafts.

The brass plate is on the south wall of the chancel and is inscribed 'Hic jacet Johes Rowdon Pater magri Johis Rowdon nup Rectoris Eccleie de Kingesworthy cuius anime propicietur Deus Amen.'

There are four bells cast by John Warner & Sons, 1861.

The church stands in about the centre of an irregular churchyard, which is surrounded by a wood paling with a lych-gate at the north. The houses of the small village lie mostly at the junction of the roads to Basingstoke and Alton, and are built of half timber work and brick, and the roofs covered with tiles, slate and thatch.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, paten and almsdish of 1822 and a plated flagon.

There are six books of registers. The first (an original paper book, the earlier sheets copied in 1553 or 1554) contains baptisms from 1540 to 1594 and baptisms and marriages from 1538 to 1594; the second, a parchment copy of the first, contains baptisms from 1558 to 1767 and burials and marriages from 1559 to 1767; the third contains burials from 1738 to 1773; the fourth baptisms and burials from 1754 to 1794; the fifth marriages from 1754 to 1812; the sixth baptisms from 1794 to 1812.

The advowson of the church of ADVOWSON Kings Worthy has throughout followed the descent of the manor of Abbots Worthy (q.v.).<sup>64</sup> The living is at the present

PAMBER

Penebere, Pembre, Panbere (xiii cent.); Pamber (xv cent.).

Pamber is a scattered parish north-west of Basingstoke. It contains 2,184 acres of land, of which about two-sevenths are arable, three-sevenths are permanent grass and two-sevenths are woodland.<sup>1</sup> At the northern end of the parish is Pamber Common, where the boundary between Pamber and Mortimer is marked by the Impstone.<sup>2</sup> North-east of Little London, which is itself north-east of the scattered village of Pamber, is Froglane Farm, east of which and close by the Roman road from Winchester to Silchester is Latchmore, now included in the parish of Bramley, but mentioned in the records of Pamber as early as 1282.<sup>3</sup> Pamber Farm, Pamber End, Elm Farm, Wigmore Farm and Ravens Cot Farm are in the parish. Court Corner, where Pamber Court used to be held, lies south of Wigmore Farm.

The soil is clay and gravel; the crops are wheat, barley and oats. The common lands were inclosed under an Act of 1824.<sup>4</sup>

Among place-names in local records are the following:—Welberewe, Lachemere, Blakewatere (xiii cent.);<sup>5</sup> Tyghcroft,<sup>6</sup> Cnovylleslond,<sup>7</sup> Brodehalewyk, le Hole Mouse (xiv cent.);<sup>8</sup> Long Towe,<sup>9</sup> Marles Copse,<sup>10</sup> Gold Oak, now Gold Oak Copse (xvii cent.).<sup>11</sup>

The land which is now included in MANOR the parish of PAMBER was in early times within the metes of Pamber Forest, and though grants of assart and licences for inclosure were given to various families in the neighbourhood,<sup>12</sup> there was, as far as can be ascertained, no court held for Pamber until the 17th century, and hence there was no manor.

The bailiwick of the forest was held in the reign of Edward I by John de St. John,<sup>13</sup> who conveyed it to his son Hugh about 1324,<sup>14</sup> and Margaret widow of Hugh was seised of it at the time of her death.<sup>15</sup> She was succeeded by her son Edmund,<sup>16</sup> who died in 1347, leaving the bailiwick to the elder of his two sisters, Margaret the wife of John de St. Philibert.<sup>17</sup> Margaret died before 1353, when the bailiwick passed to her sister Isabel the wife of Sir Luke de Poynings,<sup>18</sup> who was succeeded on her death in 1393 by her son Sir Thomas de Poynings.<sup>19</sup> He died about 1429,<sup>20</sup> but his descendants remained in possession of the bailiwick during the next hundred years, and in 1535 Henry VIII granted the governorship of Pamber Forest to Sir William Paulet, afterwards Marquess of Winchester, 'in consideration that Hugh St. John, whose heir he was, had been seised of that office as of fee and inheritance.'<sup>21</sup> Lord St. John in 1669 had still the title of 'Keeper of all woods and underwoods in Pamber Forest,'<sup>22</sup> though the woods had been sold more than fifty years before, when the land was granted by James I to John Waller and Thomas Purcell, with the right of holding courts within the liberty of the forest.<sup>23</sup>

This property seems to have been bought, before the death of Waller in 1618, by William Marquess of Winchester,<sup>24</sup> who died in 1628, leaving as his heir his son John, the celebrated defender of Basing House.<sup>25</sup> John Marquess of Winchester died 10 March 1675, and was succeeded, in accordance with a settlement made on his marriage to Lady Honora Bourke in 1645,<sup>26</sup> by Lord Francis Paulet or Powlett, her eldest surviving son, who married Anne Breamore and had two sons and one daughter.<sup>27</sup> The sons both died unmarried, but the daughter, Anne Paulet, married the Rev. Nathan Wright, the second son of Sir Nathan Wright, keeper of the Great Seal.<sup>28</sup> She had two sons, Powlett and Nathan; the elder married Mary daughter of Francis Tyssen of Hackney in 1740, and died leaving one son, Powlett, who died unmarried in 1779, and was succeeded by his uncle Nathan.<sup>29</sup> The widow of the elder Powlett Wright in 1745 married Richard Benyon, the Governor of Fort St. George, and had one son Richard, who was born in 1746 and succeeded to the estate in Pamber, in accordance with the will of his half-brother Powlett, after the death of Nathan Wright.<sup>30</sup> Richard Benyon married Hannah Hulse<sup>31</sup>; their eldest son Richard died without children in 1854 and left the property to his nephew Richard, the second son of Edward Fellowes,<sup>32</sup> who assumed the name of Benyon on his succession to the estate. He died in July 1897, and was succeeded by his nephew, Mr. James Herbert Fellowes, now Benyon, the present owner of the greater part of the parish.

BENYON. Vairy sable and or a chief wavy or with an eastern crown between two molets gules therein.

FELLOWES. Azure a fesse dancetty ermine between three lions' heads rased or with mural crowns argent.

The grant of the forest land to Waller and Purcell 1615 had included the right to 'have within the said premises a court leet, view of frankpledge, swainmote, and all other courts, liberties and privileges, and all waifs and strays,' and consequently disputes arose between the successors of William Paulet Marquess of Winchester and the self-styled lords of Pamber—probably the freeholders in the parish—whose custom it was to hold an irregular court. This court was 'kept yearly 20 July in an Orchard under an Aple tree within the parish of Pamber but out of the Liberty of the Forrest . . . when the Tythingman for the time being sits in an Elbow Chair with his Hatt on as Lord of the Manour; the other people uncovered stand while the Steward swears the Jury and gives them a Charge usuall as at other Courts Leet. Then their Court Rolls were brought, being a large bundle of Squar'd sticks about two foot and a half long, on which were entred their Customs and usuall presentments.'<sup>33</sup> The 'Tythingman Lord' was chosen for the ensuing year, during which he had the right to hunt and hawk as far as Windsor, and might keep or sell for his own profit 'such stray Cattle as are taken up and put into the Pound and have no Owners and so become to the Lord of the Manour.'<sup>34</sup> These 'Pamber Lords' about 1740 refused to recognize Powlett Wright's claim to 'the manor,' though they admitted that the timber growing on the waste land within the forest was his.<sup>35</sup> The case was tried at the summer assizes at Winchester in 1793, when the verdict was given in favour of the plaintiff, Mr. Benyon,<sup>36</sup> but nevertheless the court of the tithingman lord was held as late as 1817.<sup>37</sup>

Another large holding in the parish was sometimes also given the name of the manor of Pamber; in 1488, for example, when it was claimed from Sir Morgan Kydwelly by Peter Coudray, who stated that it had been given to his grandfather by William Brocas, Ingram atte Moure and others.<sup>38</sup> The 'manor' is not mentioned before this date, and it seems to have been merely the union of several holdings under one owner.

About 1206 King John granted to Rogo de Sacy such seisin of his land of Pamber as he had held when he departed from the king's service,<sup>39</sup> and in 1217 the grant was confirmed to Aimery,<sup>40</sup> Rogo's son and heir, who 'gave to Peter his son' all the rents from Pamber before 1253.<sup>41</sup> Possibly an heiress of Peter the son was Cecily the wife of Walter de St. Manifeo, who alienated to William le Kenne<sup>42</sup> 10s. rent which he had been accustomed to pay to her, and 1½ virgates of land about 1271.<sup>43</sup> William and Joan his wife must have had other property in Pamber, for in 1298 they alienated a rent to Roger de Coudray,<sup>44</sup> and William, who was probably their son, was still holding 40s. rent and lands there in 1346.<sup>45</sup>

It is impossible to say whether Beatrice the wife of Richard atte Moure was of kin to Cecily de St. Manifeo, but she certainly held in Pamber of the king in chief the land which her brother-in-law, John atte Moure, acquired of her in 1348.<sup>46</sup> John was succeeded before 1387 by his son Robert, who in that year granted to Sir Bernard Brocas all his interest in 'a rent of forty shillings and twelve pence from the land which his father had lately acquired from the Prior of Sherborne.'<sup>47</sup> One of the witnesses to this grant was Henry atte Moure, who seems to have been Robert's heir, for he quitclaimed to Sir Bernard the lands granted by his kinsman,<sup>48</sup> and in 1391 he was dealing with certain lands which had formerly belonged to John atte Moure.<sup>49</sup> Henry had married Joan le Kenne, who was probably the daughter of the second William, and by this means had no doubt become possessed of the lands which he held in Pamber in 1381.<sup>50</sup> They made a grant of land to Sir Bernard Brocas in 1377,<sup>51</sup> and, though Joan seems to have denied part of this grant after her husband's death, she quitclaimed the disputed land to Sir Bernard's son, William Brocas, in 1402.<sup>52</sup>

perhaps the grandson of Henry and Joan, died seised of six messuages, four tofts and 40 acres in Pamber and Inhurst in 1482.<sup>53</sup> He was the son of John atte Moure of Wyford in the parish of Tadley, and his holding in Pamber seems to have followed the descent of that manor; it afterwards belonged to the Ludlows, who were descendants of the atte Moures, and was sold by Edmund Ludlow to Daniel Blagrove in 1641.<sup>54</sup> The present lord of the manor of Wyford, Major Hicks Beach, is one of the principal land-owners in the parish of Pamber.

The Brocas of Beaurepaire gained possession of several holdings in Pamber parish during the 14th century. Sir Bernard Brocas acquired land there from Peter Lytlewerke and Agatha his wife in 1349,<sup>55</sup> and from the trustees of John Inge in 1393;<sup>56</sup> he also obtained a small holding, besides the grant already mentioned, from Henry atte Moure in 1391.<sup>57</sup> Finally, certain lands in Pamber and Tadley were granted by John Fabyan, a member of a family which had been established in the neighbourhood at least as early as 1316,<sup>58</sup> to Oliver Brocas, who conveyed them to his kinsman, William Brocas, in 1420.

A grant of 'land between Pamber Forest and William atte Moure's croft' was made in 1428 by William Brocas to Ingram atte Moure and Alice his wife. This holding was perhaps part of the land that was afterwards granted to Peter Coudray of Herriard,<sup>59</sup> who conveyed it to trustees 'to hold to the use of William Coudray and Avice his wife for their lives, and afterwards to make estate of the premises to Peter Coudray,' his grandson.<sup>60</sup> The younger Peter seems to have thought that the grant was for the life of William only, for in 1488 he sued Avice and her second husband, Sir Morgan Kydwelly, for 'the manor of Pamber.'<sup>61</sup> Avice died in 1496,<sup>62</sup> but Peter Boyle, the only surviving trustee, refused to give up the estate, and Peter Coudray brought a suit against him in Chancery to recover it.<sup>63</sup>

There is no record of the church
ADVOWSON used by the villagers of Pamber until 1564, in which year they complained that the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford, who had succeeded to Sherborne Priory lands, had neglected to provide a minister.<sup>64</sup> They declared that it had been the custom time out of mind for the inhabitants of Pamber to attend divine service at the church of Sherborne Priory, and that it had been enacted by Parliament at the time of the dissolution of the priory that those who held the land thereto belonging should depute a priest to be resident there. The Provost and Fellows replied that only a chantry priest had been appointed, that the chantry had been dissolved in the reign of Edward VI, and that in the time of Queen Mary, when a like suit had been brought against them, the Chancellor had decreed that the inhabitants of Pamber should resort to Monk Sherborne Church (q.v.) as parishioners thereof.<sup>65</sup>

It was eventually arranged that the dwellers in Pamber should keep their tithes and profits to provide for a priest, and that the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College should give them leave to use the old Priory church.<sup>66</sup> The parish is still annexed to Sherborne for ecclesiastical purposes, and the parishioners use the priory church by permission of Queen's College. There is also a mission church, which was built by the late Mr. Benyon, on Pamber Heath, and a cottage in Little London is used for divine service on Sunday. There is a Primitive Methodist chapel.

On the suppression of the Bene-
CHARITIES dictine priory of Monk Sherborne in 1414 an annual sum of £1 3s. 4d. was reserved for the poor, which is duly received from Queen's College, Oxford, under the title of Adam de Port's Charity.

The poor also receive 50s. a year, being one-sixth part of a rent-charge of £15 issuing out of lands at Baughurst, devised by will of Thomas Sympson, 1674, of Sherborne St. John. These charities are administered together and applied in the distribution of money.

In 1700 Samuel Wheat, by will, charged his estate in Silchester with 30s. a year to be employed in buying coats for three poor people to be distributed on 1 November yearly. Coats or jackets are duly given.

PRIORS DEAN

Ladene, Dene (xii cent.); Priors Dene, Priors-deane (xvi cent.); Dean Prior, Priors Dean (xviii cent.).

The parish of Priors Dean lies to the east of Colemore and partly upon a hill called the Barnet, in a well-wooded district. The parish contains 1,595 acres of land, of which 687½ are arable, 244¼ permanent grass and 111 woodland.<sup>1</sup>

In the village, which lies in the north-eastern part of the parish, the church and the Manor Farm stand near together, while a road leads north from the village past Baker's Farm to Goleigh, which lies on the eastern border of the parish to the north of Abbots Copse. Barefield Copse, Goleigh Bottom, Buttons Copse, Buttons Lane (Buttons, xvi cent.),<sup>2</sup> Holtham's Lane, Slade Farm (Slade, xiii cent.),<sup>3</sup> Baker's Farm and Windmill Farm, which is said to mark the site of a mill mentioned in the earliest records of Priors Dean, are in the parish. Other place-names found in local records are Heryngesdeene alias Heryngesland,<sup>4</sup> Puppellebere (xiii cent.), Jochys (xvi cent.).<sup>5</sup>

The soil varies from a stiff clay to a very light soil; the subsoil is chalk. The chief crops are wheat and oats.

The manor of PRIORS DEAN followed the same descent as Colemore from 1203, in which year King John, while confirming his former charter to Southwick Priory, made an additional grant of 'all the land of Dene with its appurtenances which Theodoric Teutonicus formerly held, in return for the rent of £7 18s. 5d. to be paid yearly at Michaelmas.'<sup>6</sup> This money seems to have been used generally for the maintenance of some servant of the king,<sup>7</sup> but in 1439 it was granted temporarily to Humphrey Duke of Gloucester.<sup>8</sup> In 1346 the prior and convent were excused payment 'in consideration of the losses inflicted on them by the destruction of their property by frequent invasion of alien enemies of the king and by frequent coming to the priory of him and his household and magnates and others going with him to foreign parts,'<sup>9</sup> but this pardon was afterwards vacated.<sup>10</sup>

GOLEIGH (Golley, xiii cent.; Gollegh, xiv cent.; Gollye, Golleys, xvi cent.), a farm in Priors Dean, was held of the priory of Southwick in the 14th century by Winchester College,<sup>11</sup> and was bought by John Baker, the warden of the college, for 200 marks in 1480.<sup>12</sup> The actual tenants for more than 200 years were the Newlyns.<sup>13</sup> Thus a Richard Newlyn was the tenant of the farm in 1539,<sup>14</sup> and his great-grandson, John Newlyn, died at Goleigh in 1646, leaving, among other children, two sons, John and Philip.<sup>15</sup> The elder died childless in 1706, after which the manor was held by his widow Elizabeth till her death in 1711.<sup>16</sup> The younger branch does not seem ever to have occupied Goleigh Farm, though three of Philip's children were buried in Priors Dean Church.<sup>17</sup>

FRENCH'S (Franchays, xiii cent.; Frenches, xvi cent.) has formed part of the Goleigh property since 1480, when it was acquired by John Baker, warden of Winchester College.<sup>18</sup> It is mentioned in the earliest rental of Priors Dean, when Richard Franceys held 10 acres of land, for which he paid 3s. yearly and could not marry his daughter without the lord's licence.<sup>19</sup> It was sold in 1387 by John French to Thomas Sylvester of Blackmore in the parish of Froxfield.<sup>20</sup> The Sylvester family is still established at the Slade in the parish of Priors Dean.

Almost as long a connexion with the parish as the Sylvesters' was that of the Beles, who seem to have held land in Priors Dean before 1256, in which year Richard le Bele declared that the Prior of Southwick had unjustly exacted from him other services than his ancestors had been accustomed to pay, and 'it was adjudged that the aforesaid Richard and his heirs should hold land for ever in Dene by the services acknowledged, and that the prior and his successors cannot and must not exact other services from them.'<sup>21</sup> The name 'Bel,' 'Bele' occurs several times during the 14th century,<sup>22</sup> usually among the witnesses to grants of land to Southwick, and in the rent roll of 1522 William Bele is said to hold 'Beleys, Cokespyrks and Bedylls freely,' and 'Pypulbere and Heryngesland by copy' of the priory.<sup>23</sup> William son of this William Bele<sup>24</sup> died early in 1552,<sup>25</sup> having appointed his father-in-law, John Chase, the guardian of his infant heir John.<sup>26</sup> When John Chase died Thomas his son took up the execution of the will of William Bele,<sup>27</sup> but on the plea that money was owing to him he refused to deliver up the lands, goods and chattels when the heir came of age.<sup>28</sup> A suit between the Beles and Thomas Chase was carried on in Chancery for many years, but Peter, the grandson of William Bele,<sup>29</sup> seems to have been in possession of the estate by 1579, and his descendants continued to hold it till 1707, when the last of the family, Major Richard Bele,<sup>80</sup> died at Southampton.

The church of unknown dedication is CHURCH a little red-tiled and plastered building with a wooden bell-cote on the west end of the nave and a modern south porch. The nave, measuring internally 32 ft. 4 in. by 15 ft. 2 in., is of the 12th century, probably c. 1120-30, and the chancel, which has a very marked deviation to the north from the axis of the nave, appears to be a 13th-century rebuilding, and is of irregular shape, none of its angles being right angles. It has a mean width of 13 ft. 2 in., and is lighted on the east by three modern windows of 12th-century style. There are no windows in the north wall, and only one, a trefoiled 14th-century light, at the west angle of the south wall, but further east in this wall are the remains of a small 13th-century lancet, blocked by the large monument of Sir John Compton, described below. In the south wall near this monument is the bowl of a piscina, and in front of it a plain and heavy 15th-century bench serves as a sedile.

The chancel arch is a modern imitation of 12th-century work, and the same may be said of all the nave windows, plain round-headed lights, two in the west and south walls and one in the north, though some of these may occupy the places of original windows. The only entrance to the church is by the north doorway, a good specimen of 12th-century work, set nearly midway in the nave, as often happens at this early date,<sup>81</sup> with a lofty rear arch, 10 ft. to the crown, and a plain semicircular outer arch with a label ornamented with billet and zigzag, and sunk star on the chamfered strings at the springing. The arch and labels are in a ferruginous sandstone, but the jambs, which have a small angle chamfer, are in chalk.

Both nave and chancel have old roof timbers with trussed rafters, and the bell-turret is carried on four heavy posts resting on the floor of the nave. The south wall of the nave has failed and is supported by heavy buttresses at both ends, and evidence of former repair is given by a date on the plastering of the east gable of the chancel, 1752.

The font, near the door, is a modern imitation of 12th-century style, and none of the other fittings of the church are old, except those already mentioned. The monuments in the chancel are, however, notably good examples of their time. On the north wall is that of Bridget wife of Nicholas Stoughton and daughter of Sir John Compton, who died in 1631, aged twenty-one, leaving two children out of four to survive her, and close to it is that of her sister Elizabeth, 1623, wife of Benjamin Tichborne. On the south wall is a monument set up by Compton Tichborne to his grandparents, Sir John Compton (ob. 1653) and his wife Bridget (ob. 1634). It is of alabaster and black marble, with portrait busts of alabaster in oval frames, of excellent workmanship. To the west is the monument of Compton Tichborne, 1657, of the same materials, with a singularly pleasing portrait bust, and an earlier generation of the family is represented by a brass with figures of John Compton, 1605, and Joan (Michelborne) his wife, 1586, with the arms, ermine on a bend three helms.

There are two bells, both of 1703, the treble having a defaced inscription of which only RICHARD . . . GRACE C W 1703 is now legible, while the tenor bears nothing but the date.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten cover of 1609, a silver flagon of 1902 presented by Mrs. Nicholson, of Basing Park, in that year, and a pewter alms plate with the badge of Thomas Alderson.

The registers are in three books, the first containing baptisms and burials from 1538 to 1762 and marriages from 1547 to 1751, the second marriages from 1754 to 1812, the third baptisms and burials from 1763 to 1812.

The chapel of Priors Dean was ADVOWSON situated in the king's demesne, and was transferred to the church of Colemore by Richard, the son of Turstin, the sheriff,<sup>82</sup> who was parson of Alton and Colemore.<sup>83</sup> The living is still a chapelry annexed to the rectory of Colemore.

LITTLE SOMBORNE

The above list represents the extent of the hundred at the time of the Population Returns of 1831. Before 1841 the parishes of Ashley and Little Somborne were transferred to Buddlesgate Hundred (q.v.), Leckford and Longstock to Thorngate (q.v.), and Farley Chamberlayne to Micheldever (q.v.). Probably at the same time Houghton and North Baddesley were added to King's Somborne. Upper Eldon, now a parish in the hundred, was apparently in the parish of King's Somborne in 1831.

is not entered as under any hundred, but simply as the land of the abbey of Romsey.<sup>21</sup> The total assessment of the hundred, including Romsey and excluding the royal manor of King's Somborne, was 99½ hides in the time of Edward the Confessor, and only 55 hides 4 virgates and 5 acres at the time of the Survey.<sup>22</sup> In the 14th and 15th centuries the hundred remained practically the same. Ashley and Upper Eldon<sup>23</sup> were mentioned by name in the assessments of 1316, 1346 and 1428; the tithing of North Houghton alone remained of the parish of Houghton in King's Somborne Hundred; and the manor of Awbridge in Michelmersh was finally transferred to Buddlesgate Hundred.<sup>24</sup>

In 1086 the hundred was appurtenant to the royal manor of King's Somborne (q.v.) and it has followed its descent.

<sup>23</sup> At what date Upper Eldon (see infra under King's Somborne) became a separate parish is uncertain, but its parish church dates from the 13th century. In 1831 it was not counted as a separate parish.

ASHLEY

Esleg, Assele, Ashele, Eissele, Estle and Essele (xiii cent.); Asshele, Assheleigh, Asshely (xiv cent.).

Ashley parish covers an area of 1,834 acres, including 449 acres of arable land, 939 acres of permanent grass and 400 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> Ashley House was built by the Misses Taunton in 1854 and is now the property of Mr. Herbert Johnson, J.P., of Marsh Court, Stockbridge. It is situated in the north of the parish, whence the ground slopes down towards the south, to rise again to a height of 529 ft. on the southern boundary. Vestiges of the Roman road from Old Sarum to Winchester exist in the south of the parish, and the remains of two camps are to be seen, one adjoining the parish church of St. Mary, the other situated at the south-eastern corner of Ashley Wood at the entrance to Forest Walk. Ashley Wood, covering a large area, was once part of the forest of West Bere, the custody of which belonged to the lords of Ashley Manor. King John frequently stayed at Ashley with his friend and favourite William Briwere,<sup>2</sup> probably on his way to West Bere for hunting expeditions. The village is grouped round the church of St. Mary and Ashley House.

The soil is a clayey loam with a subsoil of chalk, and disused chalk-pits are numerous.

There is no mention of the manor of MANOR ASHLEY in the Domesday Survey, but as in the 13th century it was held partly of the Talemaches as of their manor of Upper Somborne and partly of the Walerans as of their manor of Little Somborne,<sup>4</sup> it was in 1086 probably included in the lands held by William de Ow<sup>5</sup> and by Waleran the Huntsman<sup>6</sup> in the hundred of King's Somborne.

In 1200 the manor was in the hands of William Briwere the elder, who in that year had licence to fortify a castle in Hampshire either at Ashley or Stockbridge.<sup>7</sup> His son William was seised of the manor at his death without issue in 1233,<sup>8</sup> when Ashley temporarily formed part of the dower of his widow Joan,<sup>9</sup> but was finally assigned the same year to William Percy, who had married Briwere's sister and co-heir Joan.<sup>10</sup> William and Joan had six daughters and co-heirs, one of whom, another Joan, married Henry Farlington,<sup>11</sup> and died in 1275 seised of the bailiwick of the forest of Ashley, more usually called La Bere or West Bere, and 2 carucates of land in Ashley.<sup>12</sup> At this date one and a half carucates were held of Hugh Talemache, and half a carucate of the heir of Walter Waleran.<sup>13</sup> The manor was held in 1331 of the king by the serjeanty of keeping the forest of Ashley or West Bere except seven messuages which were held of Robert Talemache.<sup>14</sup>

In 1280 John Farlington, son and heir of Joan, was summoned to show his title to the custody of the forest, and claimed to have inherited it from William Briwere.<sup>15</sup> He held the manor until 1312,<sup>16</sup> when he released it with the bailiwick of the forest to Hugh le Despenser the elder in return for an annuity of 20 marks of silver.<sup>17</sup> Hugh obtained a grant of free warren in his demesne lands of Ashley in 1317,<sup>18</sup> and after his return from exile<sup>19</sup> was reinstated in Ashley as in his other manors in 1322<sup>20</sup> and continued in possession until his execution in 1326.<sup>21</sup> Ashley, then escheat to the Crown, was in 1327 granted for life by Edward III to John Chalcombe and Cecily his wife, in compensation for the losses and perils endured by Cecily in the company of Queen Isabel.<sup>22</sup> The next year Giles Farlington, thinking perhaps that the disgrace of the le Despensers might be his opportunity, claimed the manor which his father had conveyed to Hugh le Despenser on the plea that Hugh had taken the manor by force.<sup>23</sup> His attempt, however, was unsuccessful, and on the deaths of John Chalcombe and Cecily<sup>24</sup> the manor again reverted to Edward III, who granted it to John Maltravers, steward of the household, in 1330, and to Robert Woodhouse, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1331.<sup>25</sup> The next year Edward III, who had promised to make some provision for Hugh le Despenser, son of Hugh le Despenser the younger, ordered Robert Woodhouse to deliver up the manor to him,<sup>26</sup> and his title was finally confirmed in 1337.<sup>27</sup> Hugh settled the manor on himself and his wife Elizabeth in fee-tail in 1344,<sup>28</sup> but died without issue in 1349, leaving as his heir his nephew Edward son of his only brother Edward.<sup>29</sup> His widow Elizabeth, however, continued to hold the manor, and it was not until her death in 1359<sup>30</sup> that it passed to Edward, then Lord le Despenser,<sup>31</sup> who died seised in 1375.<sup>32</sup> Edward left a widow, Elizabeth,<sup>33</sup> who in 1377 granted the custody of the manor during the minority of her son and heir Thomas to Henry Yaxley at a rent of £13 14s. 10d.<sup>34</sup> Thomas le Despenser, Lord le Despenser,<sup>35</sup> became a favourite of Richard II, and, adhering to him in his misfortunes, was attainted for high treason in 1400 and beheaded.<sup>36</sup> However, through settlements in trust, his estates escaped forfeiture, and descended to his only son Richard,<sup>37</sup> who died without issue in 1414, leaving as his heir his only sister Isabel.<sup>38</sup> She married, firstly, Richard Beauchamp Earl of Worcester, and, secondly, his nephew Richard Beauchamp Earl of Warwick,<sup>39</sup> and died in 1440,<sup>40</sup> when she was followed by her son Henry Beauchamp, who was created Duke of Warwick in 1445,<sup>41</sup> and died seised of the manor the following year.<sup>42</sup> Anne, his only child, died an infant in 1448–9,<sup>43</sup> and the manor then apparently passed to George Nevill Lord Abergavenny, son of Sir Edward Nevill by Elizabeth only daughter and heir of Richard Beauchamp Earl of Worcester by Isabel le Despenser.<sup>44</sup> On his death in 1492 he was succeeded by his son George Nevill Lord Abergavenny,<sup>45</sup> who died seised of the manor of Ashley in 1535, leaving a son and heir Henry Nevill Lord Abergavenny.<sup>46</sup> Henry obtained a confirmation of the manor from the Crown in 1552,<sup>47</sup> but subsequently alienated it to Edward Bellingham, who in 1554 had licence to settle it on himself and his son Edward,<sup>48</sup> and held it until 1571, when he conveyed it to William Waller.<sup>49</sup> The latter held it until his death in 1616,<sup>50</sup> when it passed to his daughter Charity wife of Thomas Phelipps.<sup>51</sup> The manor followed for a time the same descent as Stoke Charity (q.v.),<sup>52</sup> but was in the possession of Abraham Weekes in 1744.<sup>53</sup> He died in 1755, leaving a widow, who was holding the manor in 1756.<sup>54</sup> After this date the manor was in the possession of Frances wife of James Donnell, Millicent wife of Leonard Cropp, and Mary wife of Harry Harmood,<sup>55</sup> possibly daughters and co-heirs of Abraham Weekes. Leonard Cropp's daughter married Robert Ballard, who presented to Ashley Church in 1793.<sup>56</sup> Robert Ballard had two daughters and co-heirs: Millicent, who was holding half the manor and was unmarried in 1795,<sup>57</sup> and Frances<sup>58</sup> wife of William Leonard Thomas Pyle Taunton, who eventually came into sole possession.<sup>59</sup> He died in 1850, leaving two daughters and co-heirs: Lydia, who died unmarried in 1865, and Frances, who, at her death unmarried in 1904, left the manor to three sisters: Miss Sarah Barbara Taunton, Mrs. Millicent Seth Smith and Mrs. Charlotte Fozier. They sold Ashley Manor in 1906 to the present owner, Mr. Herbert Johnson of Marsh Court, Stockbridge.<sup>60</sup>

The church of ST. MARY consists of CHURCH chancel, nave, south porch and west bell gable. The exterior, excepting the east wall of the chancel, is plastered. Inside the walls are plastered, but all quoins and ashlar dressings have been carefully cleaned. It is a small 12th-century building, perhaps of the first quarter of the century. The details are very simple, but the masonry is not of a particularly early character, nor are the joints wide. The chancel is disproportionately long, and, though preserving its original width, has probably been lengthened later in the 12th century, as it has small 12th-century windows at the north-east and south-east of somewhat later style than that in the north wall of the nave, which belongs to the original work. Its east window is of three lights, the head being of 16th-century date, with uncusped four-centred lights, but the jambs are probably 14th-century work. The north-east and south-east windows are narrow round-headed openings, with an external chamfer and internal rebate, and wide internal splayed jambs and head.

In the south wall is a second 12th-century window further to the west and set at a lower level. It seems to be of earlier type, having no external chamfer or internal rebate, and originally had no ashlar sill. Its original head has been replaced by a small pointed one, and it is perhaps the south-east window of the original chancel. No window corresponds to it on the north, the position being occupied by an 18th-century monument, but at the north-west and south-west of the chancel are square-headed 15th-century windows of two cinquefoiled lights. The floor of the chancel follows the westward slope of the ground, and falls considerably from the altar rails to the chancel arch.

Below the north-east window is a small round-headed recess with a hole bored in the soffit of its arched head, but running apparently eastward and not upwards. The whole seems to be a modern insertion. On the east splay of the second window on this side is a poorly drawn 14th-century painting of a female (?) saint holding a book and perhaps palm branch under a cusped and crocketed canopy; the lower part of the figure is destroyed. The roof and fittings of the chancel are modern.

The chancel arch is round headed, of a single square order with plain jambs and quirked abaci, and on each side of it the wall is pierced by a round-headed opening half as wide as the arch, to throw the chancel as open as possible to the nave.

In the north wall of the nave is an original round-headed light, plain externally, but with an internal rebate and narrow inner splay; it is set high in the wall. There is no trace of a north door, but just west of its normal position is a modern two-light window of 15th-century style. A stone head wearing a close-fitting cap is set on the inner face of the wall near the window; it seems to be 15th-century work. In the south wall is a modern two-light window of 15th-century style, and west of it, about halfway down the nave, is the south doorway, round-headed with plain jambs and head, and a quirked abacus which has been cut off on the external wall face. Inside the church, east of the door, is a holy water stone, with a pointed head and mutilated bowl. The porch is of brick with wood benches on each side, and has on the external face the date 1701 with churchwardens' initials.

The west window is of 15th-century date, partly restored, of two cinquefoiled lights with moulded mullions and jambs. The roof is modern, but four old tie-beams are preserved. The plate level is apparently original, and at this level above the chancel arch the wall sets back, as if a flat plaster ceiling were part of the 12th-century design. There is a wooden alms box, probably of 16th-century date, cut from a solid post, the upper part, once with some kind of finial, being supported above the actual box by four shafts.

The chancel arch and head of the early north window show traces of colour. The font is of Pur-beck marble, and has a square bowl moulded below, and originally deeper, on a circular stem and square base; it is of 12th-century date, and perhaps early. The rest of the nave fittings are modern.

Two bells, both apparently not old, are hung in arches in the west gable wall.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and chalice cover of early 17th-century date, also two plated patens.

There is only one book of registers containing baptisms from 1725 to 1812, burials from 1727 to 1812, and marriages from 1732 to 1812.

In 1204 and again in 1227 the ADVOWSON Prior and convent of Mottisfont obtained a royal charter confirming to them the church of Ashley, which they held of the gift of William Briwere.<sup>61</sup> In 1254 the church was appropriated to the priory, and from this date the prior and convent presented the vicars.<sup>62</sup> A pension of 6s. 8d. from the vicarage was granted to William first Lord Sandys in 1536,<sup>63</sup> and the advowson itself was subsequently acquired by the Sandys family, Sir William Sandys, grandson of the last-named William, dealing with it by fine in 1577.<sup>64</sup> The advowson remained in the Sandys family for over a century.<sup>65</sup> Presentations to the church were made by Elizabeth Miller in 1679, John Davis in 1680, and Thomas Hobbes in 1728,<sup>66</sup> and in 1749 Abraham Weekes, the then lord of the manor, was patron.<sup>67</sup> The advowson followed the descent of the manor until 1843,<sup>68</sup> when it was purchased by the Rev. James Hannay, who, dying in 1892, bequeathed it to Miss Catherine Wrangham Morison of Asheldon Copse, Torquay, the present patron of the living, which is a rectory.<sup>69</sup>

On the appropriation of the rectory to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont in 1254, and the endowment of the vicarage, all the tithes, great and small, were assigned to the vicar as his portion, he paying a yearly pension of two marks to the prior.<sup>70</sup> An inquiry was made into the value of the living at the instance of the vicar in 1384, when it was found that the prior took two marks yearly from the great tithes over and above the pension payable by the vicar, whose income was thus rendered inadequate.<sup>71</sup> The vicarage accordingly received a new endowment the same year by which the vicar was to receive in future all tithes, legacies and obventions whatsoever, and the pension was reduced to 10s. payable at Easter. Neither side seems to have been satisfied with this arrangement, the prior claiming four marks as before, and the vicar after the first year apparently paying nothing at all, as appears from a writ of 1400 issued by the prior against the vicar to recover fifty-six marks, arrears of a pension of four marks unpaid for fourteen years.<sup>72</sup>

There are no endowed charities in this parish.

FARLEY CHAMBERLAYNE

Ferlege (xi cent.); Ferlega Camerarii (xii cent.); Farlig (xiii cent.); Farle Chaumberleyn (xiv cent.).

The parish of Farley Chamberlayne covers an area of 1,795 acres, including 768½ acres of arable land, 572¾ acres of permanent grass and 82¾ acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup>

The church occupies a secluded position in the centre of the parish near the summit of a lofty range of chalk downs. On the north and west are extensive woods. A farm-house and school are the only buildings near it, but the broken ground round the churchyard shows that a settlement formerly existed here. The highest point of the downs, 563 ft. above the ordnance datum in the northern extremity of the parish, has a conspicuous obelisk, erected by Sir Paulet St. John, first baronet, to commemorate the feat of a favourite hunter which leaped into a chalk pit 25 ft. deep without injury to itself or its rider.

The tithing of Slackstead is about a mile south of the church, whence it is approached by Farley Lane. The soil is clay and loam with a subsoil of chalk, and the chief crops are wheat, barley and oats.

In 1086 FARLEY CHAMBERMANORS LAYNE was held by Herbert son of Remi (Remigii), and was composed of two holdings, both of which had been held of Edward the Confessor, one by Alwin and Ulwin, the other by Norman.<sup>4</sup> William de Ow claimed Norman's holding, probably as an appurtenance of his manor of Upper Somborne, but his claim was not allowed by the men of the hundred.<sup>5</sup> In 1167 Farley was in the hands of one Chamberlain, whose Christian name is not given,<sup>6</sup> while at the beginning of the 13th century Geoffrey Chamberlain held land in Farley of the ancient enfeoffment from Ingram de Préaux, who held in chief by the service due from half a knight's fee.<sup>7</sup> Geoffrey also held another tenement in Farley in serjeanty by his office of chamberlain,<sup>8</sup> and thus his son Robert Chamberlain was returned in the Testa de Nevill as holding land worth 40s. in Farley by the service of being chamberlain to the king.<sup>9</sup> However, the king gave the service by serjeanty to William de la Berton,<sup>10</sup> to whom Geoffrey Chamberlain had previously granted the lands in Farley, and in 1267 Robert gave up his right to William in return for a payment of 80 marks of silver.<sup>10a</sup> The Chamberlains retained the overlordship until 1394, when the manor was held of the heirs of Richard Chamberlain.<sup>11</sup> It was held in 1533-4 of the king in socage as of the Duchy of Lancaster.<sup>12</sup>

The manor apparently remained in the Berton family for nearly a century. Thus in 1316 it was held by Nicholas de la Berton,<sup>13</sup> who was apparently sometimes also called Nicholas de Ocle or Oakley.<sup>14</sup> In 1346 John, heir of James de la Berton, granted the reversion, after the death of Mary, widow of James, who had become Mary Languish by a second marriage,<sup>15</sup> to Thomas Missenden.<sup>16</sup> Mary Languish had died before 1354, in which year Thomas Missenden, described as the king's groom, obtained a grant of free warren in Farley Chamberlayne.<sup>17</sup> He died about 1369, and his wife Isabel soon afterwards married Sir John Golafre,<sup>18</sup> who presented to the church of Farley Chamberlayne in 1378.<sup>19</sup> In 1394 Sir Edmund Missenden, son of Thomas and Isabel, died seised of the manor, leaving as his heir his son Bernard, who was under age,<sup>20</sup> and the next year the king granted the custody of the manor with the marriage of the heir to Sir Bernard Brocas, senior, and to Juliana widow of Sir Edmund.<sup>21</sup> Sir Bernard Brocas died in 1396,<sup>22</sup> and Juliana married as her second husband Sir Thomas Shelley, who held the manor in her right until he was beheaded for high treason in 1400.<sup>23</sup> The custody of the manor was granted successively to John Poynter, John Frome and John Boys.<sup>24</sup> In 1406 Bernard son and heir of Edmund Missenden came of age,<sup>25</sup> but apparently did not succeed at once to the manor of Farley Chamberlayne, as in 1428 John Boys was stated to be holding half a knight's fee in Farley Chamberlayne which Nicholas de Ocle formerly held.<sup>26</sup>

Katherine Missenden, daughter and heir of Bernard, married John Iwardby son of John Iwardby of Mapledurham,<sup>27</sup> and was followed by her son Nicholas Iwardby, who was confirmed in the lands of his maternal ancestor Thomas Missenden in 1449-50 and died in 1462.<sup>28</sup> His son and heir John Iwardby granted the manor in 1475 to Roger Gery, sub-dean of the college of Wallingford (co. Berks.),<sup>29</sup> who in 1482 regranted it to his son John Iwardby, junior, in tail.<sup>31</sup> On the death of the latter in 1525 his daughter Joan St. John, widow of John St. John, inherited the manor,<sup>31</sup> and made a settlement of it in 1544 on herself for life with remainder to her son John St. John and his wife Elizabeth in tail male.<sup>32</sup> The manor thus passed into the hands of the St. John family, with whom it remained for three centuries.

In 1567 John St. John dealt with the manor by recovery.<sup>33</sup> He was followed by his second son<sup>34</sup> William St. John, who continued to hold the manor until his death in 1609,<sup>35</sup> when it passed to his son Henry.<sup>36</sup> Henry died in 1621, leaving a son and heir John,<sup>37</sup> who came of age in 1624, but died three years later.<sup>38</sup> His only son, born after his death, lived only one day, dying on 25 February 1628, and the manor consequently passed to his brother Oliver St. John.<sup>39</sup> From that date Farley Chamberlayne followed the descent of the manor of King's Somborne (q.v.) until 1830, when it was purchased of the St. John - Mildmay family by Mr. Thomas Woodham.<sup>40</sup> By his will dated 1850 he left the manor to his son the Rev. T. Fielder Woodham, late rector of Farley Chamberlayne, who held it until his death in 1907.<sup>41</sup> In that year it passed by sale to Sir George Cooper, bart., of Hursley Park, who is the present lord of the manor.

to be held by the abbot and convent<sup>43</sup> until the Dissolution, when it was taken into the king's hands.<sup>44</sup> It was granted in 1547 to Ralph Sadler,<sup>45</sup> but apparently soon afterwards passed by purchase to Thomas Sternhold, groom of the Robes to Henry VIII, who composed<sup>46</sup> the first metrical version of the Psalms, which obtained general currency alike in England and Scotland. He died in 1549, leaving two daughters and co-heirs, Judith and Philippa,<sup>47</sup> who joined with their husbands, Richard Pescod and William Tytherley, in conveying Slackstead to William Wright in 1573.<sup>48</sup> William settled the manor in 1609 on himself and his wife for life, with remainder to his son George,<sup>49</sup> and died in 1611, leaving a son and heir William.<sup>50</sup>

Slackstead subsequently fell to the Crown, and was granted by James I in 1624 to Sir Edmund Plowden,<sup>51</sup> an eminent lawyer,<sup>52</sup> whom James I created Governor of Virginia and Earl Palatine of New Albion. He disinherited his eldest son Francis in 1646, and by his will dated 1655 left his estates in England and Virginia to his second son Thomas,<sup>53</sup> who succeeded him at his death in 1659.<sup>54</sup> James son and heir of Thomas sold Slackstead in 1705 to William Guidott, who died in 1745.<sup>55</sup> His widow Patience held the estate until her death in 1749, when it passed to their kinsman and heir William Woodroffe, who took the name of Guidott,<sup>56</sup> and dealt with the manor by recovery in 1772.<sup>57</sup> The later history of the manor is uncertain, but at the end of the 19th century it was in the possession of Mr. David Faber, who held it until 1903.<sup>58</sup> It apparently changed hands soon afterwards, passing to Sir George A. Cooper, bart., of Hursley Park, the present lord of the manor.

FARLEY CHAMBERLAYNE CHURCH : MONUMENT TO SIR WILLIAM ST. JOHN

The church of ST. JOHN consists of CHURCH chancel 24 ft. long and 15½ ft. wide, nave 41 ft. long and 17½ ft. wide, with a bell-turret of wood at the west and a south porch.

The walls are probably of 12th-century date, 2 ft. 7 in. in thickness, and the south door of the nave, c. 1160, probably gives the date of the work. No other mediaeval details remain, except the trefoiled west window, which may be of 14th-century date, all other windows being plastered round-headed openings of 18th-century date. The church was evidently 'beautified' at this period, the flat wood and plaster arch between chancel and nave being part of the work, as well as all the fittings of the nave, high deal pews, pulpit with tester, and west gallery. The altar rails belong to the same time, but the chancel seats are of later date. The roof timbers of nave and chancel are however mediaeval, of very plain character, ceiled to the underside of the braced rafters, leaving the king-posts and ties exposed. The font, which stands under the west gallery, is of baluster shape with a very small bowl, and is in part of 18th-century work. The south doorway has a plain round head with shallow chamfered abaci, and a label moulded with a roll and hollow, of a type occurring at Romsey; it ends in large beasts' heads, placed horizontally at each end holding the label in their teeth. The porch is probably of 18th-century construction. In the chancel are a number of monuments of the St. John family, the most important being that of William St. John, 1609. It consists of a panelled altar tomb on which an effigy rests, above which is a canopy supported by three Ionic columns, and surmounted by heraldry. On the front of the tomb are four shaped shields, now blank, in panels, with guilloche borders of delicate work in low relief, and the whole monument is covered with small detail of the same character. The effigy, a rather stiff piece of work, is bare-headed, wearing a small ruff above a plate gorget, articulated shoulder pieces and complete body armour of a plain design. The hands are bare and have frilled cuffs at the wrists. Long hose with tassels strapped over them reach as far as the knee pieces; and leg pieces and round-toed plate solerets complete the defences. A short sword hangs at the left side. The original decoration and inscription were painted, and have nearly disappeared; the existing inscription being a modern transcript of the old, cut on one of the panels at the back of the tomb. The original inscription is, however, still partly legible, but has had another painted over it. The arms over the tomb are St. John differenced with a crescent, quartering: 2, a fesse between six martlets, with a molet for difference; 3, a cross engrailed, and in chief two molets; and 4, three lions passant, impaling a chevron between three bulls' heads, with a crescent for difference. On the east wall is a mural monument to John St. John, son of Henry St. John, who died in 1627, aged twenty-four, his wife Susan, daughter of Sir Richard Gifforde, who died the next year, aged twenty-three, and their infant son John, who died a few months before his mother. Below the inscription are the kneeling figures of husband and wife with the cradled infant between them. Above a shield bears St. John impaling Argent ten roundels gules for Gifforde. On the chancel floor are several 17th-century gravestones of the St. John family, two having inscriptions on white marble borders.

There are three bells, the treble a late 15th-century bell by William Hasywood with his initials and the inscription 'Sancte Rafael ora pro nobis'; the second an earlier bell, inscribed 'In honore Tri (nitatis)' in Gothic capitals below a line of cresting, and the tenor by A. W., 1603, inscribed 'In God is my hope.'

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1636 and undated paten inscribed 'Ex dono Robert (sic) London Armigeri.'

The registers are in three books, the first containing baptisms from 1593 to 1764, burials from 1612 to 1737, and marriages from 1645 to 1762; the second containing baptisms from 1700 to 1812 and burials from 1766 to 1813; the third containing marriages from 1765 to 1813.

The living of Farley Chamber-ADVOWSON layne is a rectory of the net yearly value of £240. The advowson has always belonged to the lord of the manor.<sup>59</sup>

Mary St. John by will, dated 25 CHARITIES September 1801, proved in the P.C.C. 5 January 1803, bequeathed (after the death of her servant) 100 guineas to the clergyman of this parish for the benefit of the poor, the interest to be laid out every Christmas in whatever way he should think most for their advantage.

The trust fund, with accumulations, consists of £151 5s. 2d. consols, standing in the name of the rector, producing yearly £3 15s. 6d., which, in 1906, was divided between eight recipients, as a supplement to their subscriptions to the clothing club.

LECKFORD

Leghford, Legford (x cent.) ; Lechtford, Lecford (xi cent.) ; Lekford (xiv cent.).

The parish of Leckford covers an area of 2,267 acres, of which 35 acres are land covered by water. Low-lying meadows intersected by tributary streams from the Test stretch to the Andover and Redbridge branch of the London and South Western Railway, which passes the village on the west. From here the ground slopes upwards to the south-east, reaching a height of 500 ft. above the ordnance datum near Woolbury Ring in the south. South of the village is the manor-house of Abbess Grange, the residence of Mr. G. M. Miles-Bailey, and about a mile south-east of the latter to the north of the main road from

Calcott, Sturmore Watergarden, Place Meade<sup>3</sup> (xvi cent.).

In 947 King Edred granted ten MANORS mansae at Leckford to the mass priest Edulf on condition that at his death five mansae should remain to the abbey of St. Mary, Winchester.<sup>4</sup> The estate subsequently called the manor of LECKFORD ABBESS (Leckford Abbatisse, xvii cent.) was in the possession of the abbey at the time of the Domesday Survey, being then assessed at 1 hide,<sup>5</sup> and continued to be held by it until its dissolution in 1539.<sup>6</sup>

In 1544 Henry VIII granted the manor to Sir Richard Lyster and William Thorpe,<sup>7</sup> the latter of Stockbridge to Basingstoke is New Farm, which once formed part of the manor of Leckford Abbess.

The soil is light and chalky with a subsoil of chalk, and the chief crops are oats, wheat, barley and roots. There are 1,375 acres of arable land, 407½ acres of permanent grass, and 48 acres of woods and plantations in the parish.<sup>1</sup> The common fields were inclosed by authority of a Private Act of 1780.<sup>2</sup>

The following place-names occur :—Gascons, whom died seised in 1548, leaving a son and heir Francis, aged fifteen.<sup>8</sup> Francis died three years later, and his brother George, then thirteen and a half years old, succeeded him in due course.<sup>9</sup>

In 1567 George conveyed Leckford Abbess to William Skilling and in 1569 joined with him in selling it to William Waller,<sup>10</sup> who died in 1616, leaving two daughters and heirs, Susan wife of Sir Richard Tichborne, and Charity wife of Thomas

Phelipps.<sup>11</sup> Charity and Thomas succeeded to the Leckford estate after the expiration of a lease to John, brother of William, in accordance with a settlement of 1616,<sup>12</sup> and from this date Leckford Abbess followed the same descent as the manor of Stoke Charity (q.v.) for over a century.<sup>13</sup>

In 1736 Elizabeth Bolney, the sister and heir of Sir James Phelipps, fourth baronet, devised the manor to her kinsman, Sir Henry Joseph Tichborne, bart., who died in 1743, leaving a will by which the manor finally devolved on his two daughters, Mary Blount, widow, and Frances wife of George Brounlow Doughty.<sup>14</sup> Frances Doughty, by her will dated 1743 and proved 1745, left her share of the property to her second son, George, who sold it in 1776 to John Poore.<sup>15</sup> Henry King had purchased Mary Blount's share in 1774, and they held the manors jointly until 1780, when Leckford Abbess was assigned to John Poore, from whom it was bought by Mr. William Longman and Mr. Lywood, who subsequently divided the estate between them, Mr. Longman taking the house and the manorial rights and Mr. Lywood New Farm, part of the property.<sup>16</sup> Mr. G. M. Miles-Bailey, the present lord of the manor, bought Abbess Grange in 1900 from Mr. Francis Pemberton Longman, executor of Mr. William Longman, and the manorial rights in 1906.<sup>17</sup>

New Farm passed to Mr. Lewis by his marriage with a daughter of Mr. Lywood, and was purchased from him by Mr. Joshua East, who subsequently sold it to Mr. G. M. Miles-Bailey, the present owner of the manor and the chief landowner in the parish.<sup>18</sup>

The origin of the manor of LECKFORD RICHARDS or LECKFORD RICHES is obscure, but it was possibly represented by the carucate of land in Leckford of which William de Leckford died seised early in the 13th century.<sup>19</sup> In 1315 one Richard de Leckford held a mill-pond in Leckford.<sup>20</sup> A year later he is returned as holding land in the parish, and it is probable that it was he who gave his name to the manor.<sup>21</sup> In a court roll of 1498 Sir Richard Darell, who died in 1489 seised of a messuage and 100 acres of land in Leckford held of the Abbess of Romsey,<sup>22</sup> is mentioned as having held land formerly belonging to Richard

Leckford.<sup>23</sup> The manor next passed to Sir Richard Lyster, who in 1536 conveyed it to William Thorpe and Barbara his wife.<sup>24</sup> After William's death in 1548<sup>25</sup> Barbara continued in possession until her death in 1554, when the manor descended to her son, George Thorpe, who was seised of it in 1561.<sup>26</sup> He must, however, have alienated it before 1590, when it was sold by John Cupper to John Thornburgh,<sup>27</sup> who in 1595 sold it to Thomas Mompesson.<sup>28</sup> From the latter it passed by sale in 1602 to Sir Richard Grobham,<sup>29</sup> to whom it had been mortgaged in 1599.<sup>30</sup> Sir Richard Grobham died in 1629 seised of the capital messuage and farm of Leckford Richards, leaving as his heir his brother, John Grobham, of Broomfield (co. Somers.).<sup>31</sup>

The subsequent history of the manor is obscure, but it seems to have been ultimately amalgamated with Leckford Abbess. The name still survives as Riches, the manor being now known as Leckford Abbess and Riches.

Edufr granted the other five mansae in Leckford which he had of the gift of King Edred to the New Minster of Winchester, afterwards called Hyde Abbey, where he wished his body to rest after death.<sup>32</sup> The abbey held the estate subsequently called the manor of LECKFORD ABBOTTS (Leckford Abbatis, xvii cent.) at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>33</sup> and continued in possession until its dissolution in 1538.<sup>34</sup> It remained Crown property until 1542, when Henry VIII granted it for life to his Venetian physician, Augustine de Augustinis, in part payment of a debt.<sup>35</sup>

Augustine obtained a grant of the reversion remaining in the Crown in 1545,<sup>36</sup> and three months later alienated it to Thomas Lord Wriothesley,<sup>37</sup> who in turn conveyed it to William Thorpe.<sup>38</sup> From this date Leckford Abbots followed the same descent as Leckford Abbess and Leckford Riches (q.v.) until 1780, when it was assigned to Henry King.<sup>39</sup> The manor was bought in 1830 from Henry King's executors by Arthur Eden, who sold it in 1858 to Henry R. Baines. The latter left a will, dated 1858, in pursuance of which the administrator, Martha A. E. Baines, sold the manor in 1863 to Joseph Anderson, who conveyed it in 1869 to Mr Joshua East.<sup>40</sup> Mr. G. M. Miles-Bailey, the present lord of the manor, bought it in 1902 from Mr. East.<sup>41</sup>

Free warren was granted in 1329 to the Abbot of Hyde in his manor of Leckford Abbots.<sup>42</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey the abbey held a mill there,<sup>43</sup> and in 1538 a mill still formed an appurtenance of the manor.<sup>44</sup>

The church of ST. NICHOLAS CHURCH consists of a chancel 25 ft. 8 in. by 16 ft. 8 in., a nave 42 ft. 6 in. by 22 ft. 3 in., and a south porch. The present chancel appears to have been rebuilt early in the 16th century, but the nave probably contains much older masonry. Its axis is very much to the north of that of the chancel, an irregularity for which no explanation is afforded by the building itself. The north-east angle of the nave is not in line with but to the west of the chancel arch, and a length of wall forming the east wall of the nave at this point stands forward inside the nave in front of the line of the arch. A possible explanation is to be found in the fact that the churchyard boundary comes near to the north-east angle of the chancel, and, if the chancel were in its normal position, set on the same axis as the nave, it would be still nearer. The absence of any window in its north wall, except one at the west, and the face of modern plaster with which the wall is covered externally suggest that a north-east vestry formerly existed. This must have come very near to the churchyard boundary, and, if the chancel had not been set out of centre, would have left no room for the usual procession-way round the churchyard. The expedient adopted, therefore, was to set the chancel some feet further to the south. The font is of late 12th-century date, but no other features seem older than the 15th century.

The east window of the chancel is of three cinquefoiled lights with a slightly cambered hollow-chamfered rear arch, and is of 16th-century date. To the south is a large image-corbel and the mediaeval altar-stone is set in the paving of the floor. In the north wall to the west is one rather low square-headed window of uncertain date, and opposite on the south a 16th-century window of two cinquefoiled lights, with a four-centred hollow-chamfered rear arch. East of this window is a small door with head which seems to have been clumsily reset; it is of 16th-century detail. The chancel arch of 16th-century date is of two continuously moulded orders, the outer an ogee, the inner a hollow chamfer, and closely resembles that at Thruxton.

In the north wall of the nave are two 16th-century windows of two cinquefoiled lights with square-headed external labels. The jambs of the inner splays and the four-centred rear arches are moulded. Between them is the blocked north door with a two-centred head, which seems to be 13th-century work. In the south wall are two windows of the same date of two cinquefoiled lights under square heads, and with moulded four-centred rear arches, the moulding treated as shafts in the jambs, and having small capitals. Between these is the south door with a continuously moulded two-centred head and jambs, perhaps of 15th-century date. The west window is of similar date and detail, a plain splay and rear arch. In the north respond of the chancel arch is a narrow trefoiled image niche, and near it a small half-octagonal bracket in the form of an inverted pyramid, perhaps to carry a light. There is another niche of the same kind in the east wall of the nave near the north-east angle, and there may have been, owing to the abnormal plan, an additional altar here, besides the two usual ones on either side of the chancel arch.

The south porch is an open timber one and bears an inscription recording its construction in 1899.

The font has a square bowl ornamented with a plain arcade of round-headed arches in low relief, and is of late 12th-century date. The stem is circular and quite plain, the base square and hollow chamfered.

The roofs are possibly of 16th-century date and barrel vaulted in plaster with plain and chamfered tie-beams but no king-posts or struts. The bell-cot is a small and simple affair with a flat lead roof, and is covered externally with weatherboarding. It is supported upon rough square posts in the nave. Externally the roofs are tiled and the walls much patched with brick, and brick and stone buttresses of 17th-century date have been added. The walls are plastered inside and out.

The pulpit is of early 17th-century date with flat arabesque panels and an octagonal sounding board with consoles and turned pendants at the angles. The initials R. S., I. H., doubtless of churchwardens, occur on it. Some traceried heads belonging to a 15th-century rood screen also remain worked up into desks and stalls.

On the north wall of the chancel is a monument of plain design to Sir John Thornburgh, 1630, and Dame Jane, his wife, 1646, with the inscription:

'Heer lye (now twice conioyned) a worthie payre
Who livd in love, in grace and reputation.
Plovs to God and men, in almes and prayer
And dyed examples fit for imitation.
By patience once, by death now, conqvr'd are Welth-wasting law-svtes and life wearing care.
Lament ther loss ye poor, ye sick and lame,
God hath ther sovles, the world will speake ther fame.'

1, Argent (a mistake for ermine) fretty gules and a chief gules with a bezant therein; 2, Sable an obliterated charge with a molet argent for difference, a chief argent with three crosslets fitchy sable therein; 3, Sable a chevron between three bulls' heads argent with a crescent gules on the chevron; 4, Ermine a fesse gules; 5, Gules a cross engrailed ermine; 6, Argent a chevron engrailed gules between three leopards' heads.

LONGSTOCK

The bell-cot contains three bells; the treble is inscribed 'I.B. E.M. T.N. 1629'; the second, 'God be our guyd R.B. 1595'; and the third, 'In God is my hope 1582.'

The plate consists of a silver chalice, a paten, a flagon and another paten with a foot.

There are two books of registers, the earliest book containing baptisms and burials from 1718 to 1812 and marriages to 1754 with a few duplicate entries beyond, the second containing marriages from 1755 to 1812.

The advowson of the prebend of ADVOUSON Leckford belonged to the abbey of St. Mary, Winchester, the prebendary presenting the vicar.<sup>45</sup> At the Dissolution the advowson of the prebend was granted with the manor of Leckford Abbess to Richard Lyster and George Thorpe,<sup>46</sup> the former of whom presented between 1543 and 1555.<sup>47</sup> The advowson of the prebend, afterwards the rectory, followed the descent of Leckford Abbess<sup>48</sup> (q.v.) until early in the 18th century,<sup>49</sup> when it came into the possession of St. John's College, Oxford, to which it still belongs.<sup>50</sup> In 1908 the vicarage and the rectory were united and the present incumbent is rector and vicar. Leckford Church was assessed in 1291 at £6 13s. 4d.<sup>51</sup> In 1535 the prebend was worth £12 7s. 11d. and the vicarage £8 16s. 9d.<sup>52</sup> The tithe is now worth about £340 a year.

The Primitive Methodist chapel here was erected in 1872.

In 1862 the Rev. F. H. Hutton CHARITIES by will left £100 consols, held by the official trustees, the dividends of which are in accordance with the trusts distributed by the vicar in small sums and in articles in kind.

A sum of £50, given by the late Mr. Longman, is also on deposit in the bank in the names of the churchwardens, the income of which is given to a clothing club.

LONGSTOCK

Stoches (xi cent.); Longestoke (xiv cent.).

The parish of Longstock covers an area of 2,985 acres, of which 27 acres are land covered by water. It is mostly on the southern slope of the range of hills which run parallel with the right bank of the River Test. The highest point is Moneyburst plantation 400 ft. above the ordnance datum. The straggling village is on either side of the road which runs down the bank of the river at the foot of the hills.

In the north-eastern corner of the parish is Longstock House, a modern building overlooking the Test valley. The soil is chalk, peat and gravel with a subsoil of chalk, and the chief crops are wheat, barley and oats. There are 2,017 acres of arable land, 829½ acres of permanent grass and 31 acres of woods and plantations in the parish.<sup>1</sup>

The manor of LONGSTOCK is perhaps represented by the hide of land at STOCHES which Edward held of Edward the Confessor and Hugh the son of Osmund was holding of the king in 1086.<sup>8</sup>

It was afterwards held of the king in chief by the service due from half a knight's fee.<sup>9</sup> The mesne lordship belonged to William Briwere the elder at the beginning of the 13th century, and passed from him to his son William Briwere the younger.<sup>10</sup>

In 1233 Longstock, which had been held by Joan widow of William Briwere the younger since her husband's death,<sup>11</sup> was assigned to William de Percy,<sup>12</sup> who had married Joan one of the five sisters and co-heirs of William. William de Percy, however, gave up his right to Margery de la Ferté, another sister of William,<sup>13</sup> and it was Margery who confirmed the grant of Longstock with Millstreet (q.v. infra) to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont.<sup>14</sup> From this date until 1407 Longstock followed the same descent as the manor of King's Somborne (q.v.) and passed with it to the Crown when Henry of Lancaster became Henry IV.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Various leases of the site were made by later kings,<sup>18</sup> and finally in 1604 James I granted the manor to Edward Gage and William Chamberlaine, trustees for Henry Wriothesley Earl of Southampton,<sup>19</sup> who died seised of it in 1624, leaving a son and heir Thomas.<sup>20</sup>

The latter died without male issue in 1667,<sup>21</sup> and Longstock passed to his elder daughter and co-heir Elizabeth wife of Edward Noel first Earl of Gainsborough. Their son Wriothesley Baptist succeeded to the earldom in 1689, but died the next year, leaving two daughters and co-heirs, Elizabeth and Rachel.<sup>22</sup> Longstock passed to Elizabeth wife of Henry Bentinck first Duke of Portland,<sup>23</sup> and remained in the possession of successive Dukes of Portland until 1777, when it was conveyed by William Henry Cavendish third Duke of Portland to Richard Bird of Snoddington.<sup>24</sup> The story runs that Richard Bird was proprietor of an inn in Andover where the duke frequently stayed but never settled his account in cash, and it was to discharge this debt that he parted with Longstock.<sup>25</sup> Elizabeth daughter of Richard Bird married Ralph Etwall of Andover in 1789,<sup>26</sup> and Longstock was settled on them in tail male.<sup>27</sup> Their eldest son Ralph by an indenture dated 1798 barred the entail and sold the manor to his brother William, who conveyed it in 1843 to Mr. Joseph Anderson, from whom it was purchased in 1849 by Joshua East, whose sons, Mr. Arthur East and Mr. A. E. East, are the present joint-owners of the manor, now known as the Upper or North manor of Longstock.<sup>28</sup>

A fishery and a warren were included in the lease of the site of the manor to John Power in 1491.<sup>29</sup>

The manor of LONGSTOCK HARANGOD or

LONGSTOCK HARRINGTON (Haring Woodes, xvi cent.) owes its name to the Harangod family, by whom it was held in the 13th and 14th centuries of the chief manor of Longstock.<sup>30</sup> William Harangod, son and heir of Stephen Harangod, did homage for his lands in Hampshire in 1257,<sup>31</sup> and is, perhaps, identical with the Sir William Harangod who granted a messuage, land and meadow in Hyford in the parish of Longstock to John de Posingeworth.<sup>32</sup> Margery Harangod was holding land in the parish in 1316,<sup>33</sup> and was succeeded by Thomas Harangod, who in 1331 granted the manor for life to Edmund de Kendale and Margaret his wife for a rent of 40s.<sup>34</sup> They in 1333 granted their interest in the manor to John de Hampton,<sup>35</sup> who the next year acquired two messuages, lands and a weir in Longstock from Andrew Payn and Alice his wife.<sup>36</sup> The manor next passed into the Fifhide family, William Fifhide dying seised of a capital messuage, lands, rents and pleas and perquisites of court in Longstock in 1361.<sup>37</sup> With the rest of the Fifhide property Longstock Harrington passed to the Sandys family on the death of William son and heir of William Fifhide without issue in 1386,<sup>38</sup> and continued with them until about 1684,<sup>39</sup> when, on the death of Edwin Lord Sandys, Longstock passed to Sir John Mill, bart., son of his sister Margaret.<sup>40</sup> Sir John <sup>39</sup> His heir was his cousin Joan wife of Sir John Sandys (ibid.). She was followed by Sir Walter Sandys, whose son and heir Thomas died in 1442, being succeeded by his son William. The latter's son William first Lord Sandys had a son and heir Thomas, who was followed by his grandson William (G.E.C. Complete Peerage, vii, 56). The latter's only son William died without issue in 1629 (Inq. p.m. [Ser. 2], cccclxxxvi, 141), leaving as his heir his half-sister Elizabeth Baroness Sandys. Her grandson William, son of Col. Henry Sandys, succeeded and died in 1668, being followed by his brothers Henry and Edwin, the latter of whom died without issue in 1684 (G.E.C. Complete Peerage, vii, 57-8). The following documents show the Sandys family in possession of the manor:—Inq. p.m. 24 Hen. VI, no. 40; Feet of F. Div. Co. Mich. 4 Edw. VI; Duchy of Lanc. Misc. Bks. cviii, cxvi; Feet of F. The manor of LONGSTOCK WITH MILL-STREET alias PRIORSCOURT<sup>43</sup> was in origin the estate in STOCHES which belonged to the Abbess and nuns of St. Mary, Winchester, or Nunnaminster, both before the Conquest and in 1086.<sup>44</sup> It was held of the abbess and nuns by William Briwere the elder, and after him by his son William Briwere the younger, who granted it to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont. His sister, Margery de la Ferté, confirmed to the canons 'all the tenement which her father and brother held in Longstock of the Abbess and nuns of Winchester, with two mills situated under a hill near the vill of Stockbridge,' together with 25 acres of land of the lordship of Longstock.<sup>45</sup> The prior and convent, to whom William Briwere the elder had also granted the right to the assize of bread and ale in Longstock,<sup>46</sup> purchased other lands in Longstock in 1240,<sup>47</sup> 1243<sup>48</sup> and 1392,<sup>49</sup> and continued to hold the manor until the Dissolution,<sup>50</sup> when it was granted to William Lord Sandys,<sup>51</sup> and from this date followed the descent of Longstock Harrington (q.v.).

A mill existed at Longstock at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>52</sup> Two mills were, as we have seen, granted by William Briwere to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont.<sup>53</sup> Only one survives and is appurtenant to the Lower Manor of Longstock.<sup>54</sup>

The church of ST. MARY is modern CHURCH (1876-80), and consists of a fair-sized chancel with a north vestry, nave with north aisle, a north-west tower and a south porch. The building is mainly designed in the style of the 13th century. The east window is of three trefoiled lights, and on the south are two single lights on either side of a door, above which is another small light. On the north is a double chamfered arch to the vestry, and at the south-east a piscina credence. The chancel arch is moulded, and has shafted jambs.

The nave is of four bays, three of which range with the arcade, which has, with plain responds, circular shafts with foliate capitals and hollow chamfered arches. The fourth contains an arch to the tower. The south wall contains three windows, between the western pair of which is the south door, and there is a two-light window to the west. The south porch is an open timber one.

The aisle is lit by two windows to the north, west of which is a north door, and opens to the tower by an arch.

The tower at the west end of the aisle is surmounted by a low shingled spire.

The roofs are all of the open timber type, and in chancel and nave are enriched with carved figures of angels.

The font is almost the only thing remaining belonging to the old church, and has a plain octagonal bowl, with an octagonal stem and a moulded base; it is apparently of early 14th-century date.

In the vestry are some fragments which are said to have come from the old church, the trefoiled drain of a piscina, part of the circular stem of a font, and a stone mortar. There are also a 13th-century lancet window head and a couple of 15th-century stone bosses, carved with draped figures holding scrolls; one has wings. The fittings, seating and glass are all modern, and there are no monuments of interest. A few mediaeval tiles are set in the floor at the back of the altar.

The tower contains five bells, the treble, second and fourth being modern or recast, the third and fifth being cast in 1591 and 1617 respectively.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1863, a paten of 1868, a credence plate of 1847 and a silver spoon of 1868.

There are two books of registers, the first containing baptisms and burials from 1718 to 1812 and marriages 1718 to 1754; the second containing marriages from 1755 to 1812.

Either William Briwere the elder ADVOWSON or his son granted the church of Longstock to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont.<sup>55</sup> It was subsequently appropriated to the prior and convent, who continued to present the vicars until the Dissolution.<sup>56</sup> In 1536 Henry VIII granted the rectory and advowson of the vicarage to William Lord Sandys,<sup>57</sup> and from that date it has followed the descent of the manor of Longstock Harrington (q.v.).

There is a Primitive Methodist chapel here erected in 1878.

ROMSEY

Romeseye (x cent.); Romesy (xi cent.); Romesie (xiii cent.); Romeseye (xiv cent.).

The scattered parish of Romsey includes Romsey Infra, almost coterminous with the municipal borough, and Romsey Extra, extending on all sides of Romsey Infra. The whole parish covers an area of 10,216 acres, sloping towards the town, which lies low near the middle of the parish, near Romsey station on the London and South Western Railway. The River Test runs past the town on its west side, dividing into two main streams at Greatbridge and re-uniting above Middle Bridge. The Abbey Church of St. Mary and St. Elfeda is necessarily the centre of architectural interest in the town. The old Town Hall at the west end of the Abbey Church was built in 1820 and is now used only for lectures and concerts. The modern Town Hall at the corner of Bell Street was built in 1866. It is of red brick with Bath stone facings. In the principal of the two market-places is a bronze statue of the late Lord Palmerston erected by public subscription in 1867, while between the two market-places is the Corn Exchange, in front of which is a drinking fountain given to the town by the late Lord Mount Temple in 1886.

Romsey has great natural advantages and had at one time a flourishing trade, which has now decreased. Its prosperity now depends mainly on the rich agricultural country of Romsey Extra, in which, just south of the municipal boundary, lie the Broadlands house and estate, formerly the residence of Lord Palmerston. The estate is bounded on the west by the River Test, famous for its trout fishing. Broadlands was visited by James I in 1607, his host being the then lord of the manor, Edward St. Barbe. To the west is Pauncefoot Hill, now part of the Broadlands estate, but once a separate manor. South-west of Broadlands on the other side of the river is Moor-court, opposite to which across the Test are Lee, Skidmore Farm and Toothill. North-west of the town is Stanbridge Hall and south of it is Sparsholt. Ashfield, Cupernham, Woodley, Crampmoor and Ridge are also in Romsey Extra. There are 3,122½ acres of arable land, 3,470¼ acres of permanent grass and 819½ acres of woods and plantations in Romsey Extra and 51 acres of arable land, 195 acres of permanent grass in Romsey Infra.<sup>1</sup>

The common fields of Romsey Extra, Abbotts Wood and Common, Carter's Common or the Warren and Parkridge Wood were inclosed in 1808 under an award of that date, authorized by an Act of 1804.<sup>2</sup>

Romsey was a mesne borough and BOROUGH followed the same descent as the manor of Romsey Infra (q.v.). It was from an early date a town of some importance, due partly to the presence of the famous abbey in its midst and partly to its happy situation on the River Test at the junction of the main roads from Salisbury, Winchester and Stockbridge. Henry I granted the abbess and convent a full market each Sunday and a four days' fair at the Feast of St. Elfeda the Virgin and the king's firm peace to all coming and going. This grant was confirmed by Henry II and in 1268 by Henry III.<sup>23</sup> In 1272 Henry III further granted a four days' fair at the Feast of St. Philip and St. James<sup>24</sup>; so it may be assumed that Romsey was then in a flourishing condition. However, in 1526 it was visited by the plague,<sup>25</sup> and in 1586 there was great dearth and want of work there, causing 'unlawful assemblie of the common people.'<sup>26</sup>

In 1544 Henry VIII granted to the inhabitants to be one body corporate in perpetuity and as such to hold the abbey church there.<sup>27</sup> Romsey was not regularly incorporated, however, until 1607, in which year the citizens obtained a charter from James I,<sup>28</sup> which was confirmed by William III in 1698.<sup>29</sup> By the terms of the charter of 1607 the corporation, which was to have a common seal, was to consist of a mayor, six aldermen, and twelve capital burgesses, the mayor to be elected by the aldermen from among themselves, the officers of the corporation to be a recorder and a town clerk.<sup>30</sup> The mayor held office for one year, the aldermen and capital burgesses for life.<sup>31</sup> A bye-law of 1743 regulated that the mayor was to be elected by the aldermen and capital burgesses from two aldermen nominated by their colleagues, while the aldermen were to be elected from capital burgesses only. Freedom, as appears from the returns of the Parliamentary Commission in 1835, was acquired by election by the corporation.<sup>82</sup> In addition to the recorder and town clerk, there were in 1835 a lord high steward, whose office was merely honorary, and two serjeants-at-mace, one of whom acted as town-crier and the other as gaoler.<sup>83</sup> The mayor, recorder and aldermen had power to hold a court of record every Thursday and a court of pie powder granted by the charter of 1607, which, however, was never held.<sup>84</sup> The mayor, late mayor, recorder and two senior aldermen were justices of the peace, the mayor presiding at quarter sessions and acting as clerk of the market and justice of the peace for the year following his year of office.<sup>85</sup> Petty sessions were held once a week. The borough was reformed in 1835, and is now governed by a mayor, four aldermen and twelve burgesses.

The two fairs with the weekly market were included in the grant of the manor of Romsey Infra to John Foster,<sup>86</sup> but were subsequently acquired by the lord of Broadlands, who was returned in 1891 as owner of the market, which he leased for a yearly rent of £20 to the corporation.<sup>87</sup> A third fair, to be held on the Monday and Tuesday following Easter, was granted to the town in 1607.<sup>88</sup> In 1891 the fairs were held on Easter Tuesday, 26 August and in winter.<sup>89</sup> The fair days are at present Easter Tuesday, 26 August and 8 November. The market day, originally Sunday, was subsequently changed to Saturday,<sup>90</sup> but since 1826 the market has been held on Thursday.

Romsey has tanyards, breweries, corn-mills, iron works, jam makers' works and leather-board and paper mills, and had at one time a flourishing trade in shalloons.<sup>91</sup> Berthon collapsible boats are also extensively manufactured, their inventor, the Rev. Edward Lyon Berthon, having been formerly vicar of Romsey. In 1835 the inhabitants complained that while the population was increasing trade was decreasing.<sup>92</sup>

The borough was never represented in Parliament, although in 1689 it petitioned for the privilege in the case of Stockbridge being disfranchised.<sup>93</sup>

Several distinguished men have been natives of Romsey, among whom are Sir William Petty, the political economist and one of the founders of the Royal Society; Giles Jacob, the compiler of the Law Dictionary; Samuel Sharp, geologist and antiquary, and Sir J. Russell Reynolds, physician in ordinary to the queen's household. Dr. John Latham, ornitholo-gist and archaeologist, spent a good part of his life at Romsey,<sup>94</sup> and collected material for a history of the town, which, however, remains in manuscript.<sup>95</sup>

The manor of ROMSEY was held by the abbey of Romsey at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>96</sup> and had no doubt been so held since the foundation of the abbey in 907.<sup>97</sup> The abbess and convent had a grant of free warren there in 1369,<sup>98</sup> and held the manor until the Dissolution,<sup>99</sup> when they surrendered to the king,<sup>100</sup> who in 1544 granted the manor of ROMSEY INFRA to John Foster, late steward of the abbey, and Richard Marden.<sup>101</sup> The latter granted his share in the manor in 1545 to John Foster,<sup>102</sup> who held Romsey Infra until his death in 1576.<sup>103</sup> His son and heir Andrew died in 1595, leaving a son and heir John,<sup>104</sup> who two years later conveyed the reversion of the manor of Romsey Infra to trustees for the payment of his debts,<sup>105</sup> and died in 1597, leaving as his heir his brother, Barrow Foster.<sup>106</sup> In 1600 the trustees, who had been sued by John Foster's creditors for the payment of the sums owing to them,<sup>107</sup> sold the manor to John More, serjeant-at-law,<sup>108</sup> who died seised in 1620. His son and heir John, aged nineteen,<sup>109</sup> died a minor, and his estates were divided between his two sisters and co-heirs, Dowsabell wife of Samuel Dunch and Anne wife of Edward Hooper.<sup>110</sup> Romsey Infra fell to the share of Edward Hooper and Anne, and passed from them to their son Sir Edward Hooper, who was holding in 1670.<sup>111</sup> On his death without issue the manor passed to the family of Fleming of North Stoneham, his sister Katherine having married Edward Fleming, who died in 1664.<sup>112</sup> This manor has since followed the descent of North Stoneham<sup>113</sup> (q.v.), the present owner being Mr. John Edward Arthur Willis-Fleming, J.P., D.L., of Stoneham Park and Chilworth Manor.

The site of the monastery of Romsey and the mansion called the Abbess' Lodging, with the adjoining chapel of St. Peter, the clerk's house, the gatehouse and meadows called Tappesham, Langley Meade, Colemede and South Garden, were granted in 1546 to John Bellowe and Robert Bigott,<sup>114</sup> but passed before 1557 to Sir Francis Fleming, with

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Broadlands (q.v. infra). The estate was then known as the manor of ROMSEY INFRA.<sup>65</sup> Sir Francis Fleming died in 1558, leaving a son and heir William,<sup>66</sup> who held the property until his death in 1605,<sup>67</sup> when it passed to his only daughter and heir, Frances the wife of Edward St. Barbe.<sup>68</sup> Henry St. Barbe, their son and heir, settled the manor in 1615 on himself and his wife Anna,<sup>69</sup> and was succeeded before 1653 by John St. Barbe,<sup>70</sup> who at his death in 1658 was followed by his eldest son Henry.<sup>71</sup> The latter died without issue three years later, his heir being his younger brother John, who was created a baronet in 1663 and died without issue in 1723, when his estates passed in accordance with his will to his great-grand-nephew, Humphrey Sydenham.<sup>72</sup> In 1736 Humphrey sold the manor of Romsey Infra and Broadlands to Henry Temple first Viscount Palmerston,<sup>73</sup> whose grandson and heir Henry followed him at his death in 1757.<sup>74</sup> The latter died in 1802, and his son and heir, Henry John third Viscount Palmerston, the eminent statesman, was dealing with the manor by recovery in 1808.<sup>75</sup> He died without issue in 1865, leaving Romsey Infra by will to his widow, with remainder to the Hon. William Francis Cowper, her second son by her first marriage with the fifth Earl Cowper.<sup>76</sup> The Hon. William Francis Cowper assumed the additional surname of Temple on succeeding to the property at the death of his mother in 1869, and was created Lord Mount Temple of Mount Temple (co. Sligo) in 1880.<sup>77</sup> He died without issue in 1888, leaving his Hampshire estates to his nephew, the Hon. Anthony Evelyn Melbourne Ashley,<sup>78</sup> who held the manor until his death in 1907, when he was followed by his son and heir, Mr. Wilfrid William Ashley, the present owner.

BROADLANDS, with other lands, was leased in

The manor of ROMSEY EXTRA, also part of the possessions of Romsey Abbey, was leased by Queen Mary in 1558 to Sir Francis Fleming for a term of forty years.<sup>83</sup> His son, William Fleming, held the manor on lease till 1598, when it reverted to the Crown.<sup>84</sup> It was finally granted by James I in 1604 to Edward Gage and William Chamberlayne, trustees of Henry Earl of Southampton.<sup>85</sup> The latter sold it in 1606 to John More,<sup>86</sup> lord of the first-named manor of Romsey Infra (q.v.), the descent of which it has since followed.

Lands in Romsey Extra were sold in 1606 by Henry Earl of Southampton to Walter Godfrey of Romsey,<sup>87</sup> whose descendants continued to hold them as the manor of ROMSEY until 1758.<sup>88</sup> After this date they were probably merged in the manor of Timsbury, which likewise belonged to the Godfreys.

Among the privileges of the Abbess of Romsey were sac and soc, toll and theam and infangenthef, or the right of punishing thieves taken within the manorial jurisdiction.<sup>89</sup> The gallows, which had belonged to the manor from the reign of King Edgar, were re-erected in 1263 on the petition of the Abbess Amice, since it was ascertained by inquisition that they had not been used since the time of the last Abbess, Maud Paricia, as no one had been condemned for theft, and that consequently they had fallen down.<sup>90</sup>

The abbess and convent claimed the amercements of the assize of bread and ale in Romsey, by virtue of their free market,<sup>91</sup> exemption from the payment of murder fines for their land below Bradebrigg,<sup>92</sup> and also exemption from lawing of their dogs by the keepers of the forest of Bere, both above and below the bridge.<sup>93</sup> Their land paid no Danegeld<sup>94</sup> and without their permission no Jew could reside in the town of Romsey.<sup>95</sup>

Romsey Manor contained three mills at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>96</sup> and as the town was well supplied with water-power other mills soon came into existence. In 1396 the abbess gave permission to William Berill to build a new fulling-mill in the watercourse called Chaby for a yearly rent of 4s. at Michaelmas and Easter.<sup>97</sup> William was to keep the mill in good repair and was not permitted to fish the water without licence.<sup>98</sup> In 1444 it was noted that a corn-mill belonged to one John Grenefeld, 'who ought to grind at the corn-mill of the abbess.'<sup>99</sup> This was possibly the windmill mentioned in 1298 as contributing to the issues of Romsey Abbey.<sup>100</sup> In 1545 two water-mills called Town Mills, and others called Mead and Malt Mills, with a fulling-mill and the fulling stocks, and a fishery formerly belonging to the dissolved monastery of Romsey, were granted to Thomas Thoroughgood and John Foster. Thomas Thoroughgood gave up his right to John Foster, who held them with his manor of Romsey Infra.<sup>101</sup> Another water-mill, known as Abbey Mill, and doubtless the site of an ancient mill, came with the site of Romsey Abbey into the hands of Francis Fleming,<sup>102</sup> and followed its descent. Two crofts in Romsey, called Fox Mills, apparently the site of a former mill, were acquired in 1585 from William Waller by Benjamin Tichborne.<sup>103</sup> Mills known as Town Mill, Mead or Burnt Mill, Abbey Mill and Fox Mill exist in Romsey at the present day.<sup>104</sup> Other mills in Romsey are Test Mill, Abbey Mill (no. 2)<sup>105</sup> and Saddler's Mill. Of the existent mills probably Abbey Mill (no. 1), Town Mill and Mead or Burnt Mill occupy the sites of the three mills mentioned in Domesday Book.

These mills were described in 1579 as serving not only the town of Romsey but the whole country adjoining.<sup>106</sup> The same year Andrew Foster and others, at a place called the 'Meade Myll Pilinge,' near Muckson and Baldham, diverted the main river of Test out of its ancient course into the grounds of Andrew Foster to serve his own mills, built upon a little creek issuing out of the River Test.<sup>107</sup>

Two manors, called MORE MALWYN and MORE ABBESS, in Romsey formed part of the possessions of the Abbess and convent of Romsey.<sup>108</sup>

More Abbess probably belonged at an early date to the abbess and convent. More Malwyn, on the other hand, is evidently represented by the manor of More, granted by Thomas de Aspale and Mirabel his wife to John Malwyn and his heirs in 1353.<sup>109</sup> In 1367 William Malwyn and his wife Joan granted the reversion of their lands in More after their deaths to the abbess and convent.<sup>110</sup> At the Dissolution More Malwyn and More Abbess were granted to Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford,<sup>111</sup> who granted them both in 1542 to Richard Dowce.<sup>112</sup> The latter granted a seventy years' lease of a moiety of the manors to his younger son John the same year,<sup>113</sup> and died in 1544.<sup>114</sup> His son and heir Thomas, at his death without issue in 1562, left by will two-thirds of the manors of More Malwyn and More Abbess to his nephew Thomas, younger son of his brother John, with reversion to his elder nephew Richard, who inherited the other third.<sup>115</sup> The next year Thomas sold his shares to his brother Richard.<sup>116</sup> Richard died in 1603, when he was followed by his son and heir George,<sup>117</sup> who in 1613 settled half the manors on himself and his wife for life, with remainder to his daughter Marie wife of Nicholas Fuller and their heirs male.<sup>118</sup> Marie Fuller, who by a second marriage had become Marie Lee, was left sole heir at her father's death in 1630,<sup>119</sup> but dying two years later was followed by Dowce Fuller, her son by her first marriage.<sup>120</sup> Margaret daughter and heir of Dowce Fuller married Samuel Pargiter,<sup>121</sup> and was succeeded by her son Samuel Pargiter, or Samuel Pargiter Fuller, who sold the manors in 1738 to Thomas Dummer,<sup>122</sup> from whom they passed by sale in 1766 to William Chamberlayne.<sup>123</sup> At his death in 1775 William Chamberlayne was followed by his son and heir William, who died unmarried in 1830.<sup>124</sup> The manors then passed to his sister and heir Charlotte, and at her death, unmarried, in 1831 to her cousin, Thomas Chamberlayne.<sup>125</sup> The latter sold them to Henry John third Viscount Palmerston,<sup>126</sup> since when they have followed the same descent as Broadlands and Romsey Infra (q.v. supra). However, the names More Malwyn and More Abbess have now disappeared, and the estate is called MOOR COURT, which was probably the name given to the house which John the younger son of Richard Dowce built on his leasehold property in the 16th century.<sup>127</sup> John Dowce died in 1559, leaving two sons, Richard and Thomas,<sup>128</sup> the latter of whom inherited the remainder of the lease which he settled in 1594 on his three sons, Francis, Gabriel and John.<sup>129</sup> On the expiration of the lease in 1612 this estate reverted to George Dowce, and Moor Court then became the possession of the lord of the manors of More Malwyn and More Abbess (see supra).

The manor of MAINSTONE (Maihiweston, xiii cent.; Mayhneston, xiv cent.; Mayweston, xv cent.), afterwards known as the manor of PAUNCEFOOT HILL (Paunesfotes Hill, xv cent.; Pawncefoteshill, xvi cent.), belonged at an early date to the Pouncefoot family. At the beginning of the 13th century Lemuel Pouncefoot was said to be holding half a knight's fee in Mainstone of the Earl of Hereford, who held of the king,<sup>130</sup> while John Pouncefoot was the owner in 1316.<sup>131</sup> Alexander Sampson was returned as the holder in 1346,<sup>132</sup> but he was probably only holding the manor on lease, as was Sir Nicholas Poyntz in 1351,<sup>133</sup> for Richard Pouncefoot was stated to be the owner in 1366.<sup>134</sup> Walter Pouncefoot was in possession in 1428,<sup>135</sup> and Walter Pouncefoot, probably his son, died seised in 1487, leaving an infant son and heir Peter.<sup>136</sup> Peter died a minor in 1492, leaving two sisters and co-heirs Maud and Anne.<sup>137</sup> Maud married John Brent<sup>138</sup> and held half Pouncefoot Hill until her death in 1521.<sup>139</sup> Her husband survived her until 1525,<sup>140</sup> when the moiety passed to his son and heir William, who soon inherited the other moiety<sup>141</sup> and settled the whole in 1530 upon himself and his wife Elizabeth.<sup>142</sup> He died in 1534, leaving a son and heir Richard, aged nine,<sup>143</sup> who seventeen years later leased Pouncefoot Hill to his brother-in-law, John Denham, for sixty years,<sup>144</sup> and in 1564 settled the reversion upon his daughter Anne on her marriage with Lord Thomas Paulet.<sup>145</sup> Elizabeth the daughter and heir of Thomas and Anne brought Pouncefoot Hill in marriage to Giles Hobey,<sup>146</sup> who sold it in 1588 to Sir Henry Portman of Orchard (co. Somers.).<sup>147</sup> Sir Henry died two years afterwards, and the manor passed to his eldest son John, who was sheriff of Somerset 1606-7 and was created a baronet in 1611.<sup>148</sup> He died in 1612, and his four sons, Henry, John, Hugh and William, succeeded in turn to the baronetcy and estates, dying respectively in 1621, 1624, 1629 and 1645.<sup>149</sup> Sir William Portman, bart., son and heir of the last-named, was in possession of the manor as late as 1680,<sup>150</sup> but it subsequently passed to Thomas Davies, who held it in 1750,<sup>151</sup> in right of his wife Elizabeth née Brett.<sup>152</sup> It passed by sale from him to Henry John third Viscount Palmerston, and from that date it has followed the same descent as Broadlands and the manor of Romsey Infra (q.v. supra).<sup>153</sup>

In 1346 Walter Sampson held land in Mainstone which had descended to him from Richard Sampson.<sup>154</sup> The reversion of this land after the death of Walter was granted by Alan Sampson to Richard Pouncefoot in 1357,<sup>155</sup> and from this date it followed the same descent as the manor of Pouncefoot Hill<sup>156</sup> (q.v. supra).

In 1245 Henry III granted licence to Matthew de Columbers, lord of East Tytherley, to inclose his grove of SPURSHOT (Perchet, xii cent.; Purschite, Pirishute, xiii cent.; Sparsholt, Sparshutt, xvi cent.) and to his tenants to keep inclosed their purpures and essarts in Spurshot provided that the beasts of the chase had free entry and exit.<sup>157</sup> Possibly these tenants were the Alexander de Cridho and Richard de Pershute who were returned by the Testa de Nevill as holding half a knight's fee in Spurshot of the old enfeoffment of Matthew de Columbers. Matthew held it of the Earl Marshal who in turn held it of the Earl of Devon.<sup>158</sup> This estate for a long period continued to be held of the manor of East Tytherley, and thus Ralf de Monthermer, to whom Edward II had granted the manor of East Tytherley in 1311,<sup>159</sup> was the overlord in 1316.<sup>160</sup> In 1327 it was stated to be held of his widow, Isabel de Hastings,<sup>161</sup> and in 1361 of the king as of the manor of East Tytherley.<sup>162</sup> Richard de Pershute, who was an agister of the New Forest, had been succeeded before 1279 by his son Nicholas de Pershute,<sup>163</sup> who died seised of a messuage, 60 acres of land, 5 acres of wood, 8 acres of meadow, and 20s. rent in Spurshot in 1327. His son Peter,<sup>164</sup> who at his death in 1361 was seized of a messuage, lands, rents, pleas and perquisites of court and a fishery in Spurshot, was succeeded by his son Nicholas,<sup>165</sup> who died in 1369-70. William the son of Nicholas<sup>166</sup> was in possession of the property in 1428,<sup>167</sup> but nothing further can be learned concerning its history until 1517,<sup>168</sup> in which year John Benger died seised of the manor of GREAT and LITTLE SPURSHOT.<sup>169</sup> It is probable that Great Spurshot represents the estate owned by the de Pershutes, while Little Spurshot is perhaps identical with the property owned by Alexander de Cridho in the reign of Henry III.<sup>170</sup> John Benger was succeeded by his grandson Richard Benger,<sup>171</sup> who died seised of the manor of Great and Little Spurshot in 1529.<sup>172</sup> Seventeen years later his widow Katherine and his sister and heir Anne,<sup>173</sup> in conjunction with their respective husbands John Whyte and Thomas Smyth, released their right to Great and Little Spurshot to John Dowce.<sup>174</sup> John at his death in 1559 was followed by his son and heir Richard,<sup>175</sup> who shortly afterwards acquired the manors of More Abbes and More Malwyn (q.v.). Great and Little Spurshot have since followed the same descent as the latter manors, the owner of Spurshot at the present day being Mr. Wilfrid William Ashley.

A fishery in the River Test was among the appurtenances of Great Spurshot, extending along the bank from a place called Muxene (possibly identifiable with 'Le Muxemede,' see below) to Middlebridge.<sup>176</sup>

To this manor belonged also a water-mill on the Test, commonly called a tucking-mill.<sup>177</sup>

There were at an early date two manors of STANBRIDGE (Stanbrigg, xiii cent.; Stanbrigg, xiv cent.) subsequently distinguished as STANBRIDGE RANVILLES and STANBRIDGE EARLS.

The manor known later as Stanbridge Ranvilles, from its 14th-century owners, was held in the reign of Henry III by Andrew de Portsea of Robert St. John by the service due from half a knight's fee,<sup>178</sup> and continued to be held of the St. John family and their descendants as overlords.<sup>179</sup> Andrew de Portsea was followed by Richard de Portsea, who held Stanbridge until his death in 1318.<sup>180</sup> His heir was his sister Alice Loverez,<sup>181</sup> but she seems soon afterwards to have alienated the manor to Richard Ranville and his wife Lucy, who in 1330 settled a messuage, a carucate of land, 30 acres of meadow, 10 acres of wood and 13s. 4d. rent in Stanbridge and Romsey upon themselves for life with remainder to Richard Ranville, son of Richard by a former wife Margaret.<sup>182</sup> This latter may have been the Richard Ranville who was holding the manor in 1346, when it is described as having formerly belonged to Richard de Portsea.<sup>183</sup> By 1428 Stanbridge Ranvilles had again changed hands, and was held jointly by John Brinkhale and John Roger.<sup>184</sup> The manor soon passed into the possession of John Kirkby, who died seised of Stanbridge Earls and Stanbridge Ranvilles in 1469, leaving a son and heir William,<sup>185</sup> who on his death in 1476 was followed by his son John.<sup>186</sup> The latter was holding Stanbridge in 1499, but died in a few years, leaving<sup>187</sup> a son John, who died seised in 1558 and was followed by his son and heir Thomas Kirkby.<sup>188</sup> The latter died in 1601, leaving a son and heir Thomas,<sup>189</sup> who was succeeded in 1614 by his son and heir Gerard,<sup>190</sup> who died in 1628, leaving an infant son and heir Thomas.<sup>191</sup> The manor passed before 1713, probably by sale, to

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Gilbert Serle,<sup>192</sup> whose family continued to hold it for about a century. Stanbridge Ranvilles now forms part of the Embley Park estate, the present owner of which is Mr. Archibald Coats.<sup>193</sup>

STANBRIDGE EARLS (Stanbrigg Comitis, xiv cent.; Stanbrigg Erles, Standbridge Earles, xv cent.) was held at the beginning of the 13th century by Ralph Mortimer, by the service due from half a knight's fee of Simon de Montfort, who held of the Earl Marshal, tenant in chief.<sup>194</sup> From the Marshal family the overlordship descended by inheritance to the Earls of Stafford.<sup>195</sup> The intermediate lordship of Simon de Montfort lapsed on his death and attainder in 1265.<sup>196</sup>

The immediate ownership passed from Ralph Mortimer to Richard Havering, who died seised of manor of Stanbridge Earls, held of Margaret Countess of Stafford for one knight's fee, as of her manors of Wexcombe and Bedwyn in 1469.<sup>206</sup> From this date the manor followed the same descent as Stanbridge Ranvilles (q.v. supra) until 1652, when Thomas Kirkby sold it to Roger Gollop of Southampton,<sup>207</sup> who died in 1681-2 and was followed by his son George.<sup>208</sup> The latter held Stanbridge Earls until his death in 1685,<sup>209</sup> when he was followed by his son and heir Roger, who died in 1701-2,<sup>210</sup> leaving three sisters and co-heirs: Elizabeth wife of the Rev. William Mayo, Katherine Gollop, spinster, and Margaret wife of John Nicholls of Child Okeford (co. Dors.).<sup>211</sup> Elizabeth and Katherine sold their share in the manor in 1702 to John Fifield,<sup>212</sup> who bequeathed Stanbridge at his death in 1737 to his nephew, Benjamin Fifield. The latter, who was mayor of Romsey in 1721, died in 1748, when he was followed by his son John, who held Stanbridge Earls until his death in 1796.<sup>213</sup> He was succeeded by his son and heir John, who died in 1827 without issue.<sup>214</sup> His only surviving brother Job succeeded to the estate and died in 1840, leaving Stanbridge to his daughter Katherine wife of John Charles Hall. The latter died in 1870, and Katherine sold the manor in 1871 to William Edward Shore Nightingale of Embley Park, who had two daughters: Frances wife of Sir Harry Verney, bart., and Florence the well-known pioneer of army nursing. He left the manor at his death in 1874 to his daughter Frances, who with her husband sold it in 1895 to Sir Basil Montgomery. It was purchased in 1905 from Sir Basil by Mr. H. L. Hansard, the present lord of the manor.<sup>215</sup>

The lord of the manor of Stanbridge Earls obtained licence to celebrate divine service in his manor between 1500 and 1528,<sup>216</sup> and in 1538 George Thorpe of Leckford was baptized in Stanbridge Chapel.<sup>217</sup> Traces of a chapel still exist in the architecture of the kitchen of the old manor-house of Stanbridge Hall, the residence of Mr. H. L. Hansard.<sup>218</sup>

A messuage and land with two mills in Stanbridge were held of the lord of the manor of Stanbridge Earls by Matthew Polayn and Aubrey his wife, who granted them to John Le Spicer of Salisbury in 1328.<sup>219</sup> Fourteen years later the latter sold them to William de Overton the younger,<sup>220</sup> who held them until his death c. 1361, when they passed to his heir Thomas,<sup>221</sup> who died in 1369.<sup>222</sup> Michael, posthumous son and heir of Thomas,<sup>223</sup> died without issue in 1389

It was assessed at 1½ hides (V.C.H. Hants, i, 490b). Ralph de Mortimer was followed by his son Hugh, who died in 1185, when his son Roger succeeded him. Roger at his death in 1215 was followed by his son Hugh, who died in 1227, leaving a half-brother and heir Ralph. The owner of Stanbridge Earls, Ralph, died in 1246, leaving a son and heir Roger (Burke, Extinct Peerage, 371-2).

and was followed by his cousin Elizabeth wife of Robert Tawke,<sup>224</sup> who died seised of a messuage, lands and a fishery in Stanbridge in 1401.<sup>225</sup> Thomas son and heir of Robert and Elizabeth at his death in 1405 left an infant son Robert,<sup>226</sup> who apparently parted with the property,<sup>227</sup> for he was not seised of any lands in the parish at his death in 1440.<sup>228</sup> The estate probably merged at a later date with the manor of Stanbridge Earls, which contained two water-mills in 1701.<sup>229</sup>

A fishery in the River Test from 'Le Blakedyche' to 'Le Muxemede' belonged to the manor of Stanbridge Earls. It was held in 1401 by Robert Tawke of the then lord of the manor.<sup>230</sup> In 1579 Thomas Kirkby was said to be seised in right of his manor of Stanbridge Earls of the 'moiety of a certain water of the River Test from a meadow called Baldeham to Westweare.'<sup>231</sup>

Land in Romsey known later as the manor of ROMSEY HORSEYS was held in 1299 by Walter Romsey of the Abbess and convent of Romsey.<sup>232</sup> In 1349 one Maud, widow of Richard Romsey, held for life tenements in Romsey.<sup>233</sup> Sir Walter Romsey died in 1403 seised of tenements in Romsey, which were settled on his widow Alice (Filliol) for her lifetime. His grandson and heir Thomas<sup>234</sup> succeeded to these tenements on the death of his grandmother Alice a year later<sup>235</sup> and died in 1420. His infant daughter and heir Joan<sup>236</sup> succeeded to the estate on her mother's death in 1441 and married Thomas Payne,<sup>237</sup> but died without issue.<sup>238</sup> Her heirs were Joan wife of Roger Wyke, first cousin of her father Thomas Romsey, and William Horsey, who was the son and heir of Eleanor sister of Joan. William Horsey died seised of the property in 1448, and was followed by his son and heir Thomas,<sup>239</sup> who died in 1477, leaving as his heir his brother John.<sup>240</sup> In 1537 William Horsey and his wife Dorothy conveyed the manor of Romsey Horseys to Sir Richard Lyster,<sup>241</sup> from whom it passed to William White, who dealt with it by recovery in 1587.<sup>242</sup> Subsequently it was held by Gilbert Serle,<sup>243</sup> and remained in the Serle family until 1814. After that date its history cannot at present be traced.

The early history of the manor of SOUTH WELLS (Welles, xiv cent.) is obscure, but it is probably represented by the lands and tenements in Wells next Romsey which were held in the reign of Edward I by Nicholas de Barbeflete of Southampton in socage of the Abbess of Romsey for a rent of 57s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., 200 herrings, 300 eels, ploughing of 14 acres of land and mowing of 2 acres of meadow. In 1294 Nicholas de Barbeflete died seised of the estate, which then included a capital messuage, two water-mills, a fishery and perquisites of court.<sup>244</sup> His heir was his son Nicholas, who granted the reversion of a messuage, land and rent in Romsey should he and his wife Parnel die without issue to John son of John de Moundenard in 1309.<sup>245</sup> Richard de Barbeflete, possibly the brother and heir of Nicholas, entered a protest,<sup>246</sup> and in 1311, soon after the death of Nicholas, brought a suit against Parnel,<sup>247</sup> the issue of which is unknown. In 1329 thirty messuages, two mills, lands and rents in Wells and other places were settled upon John Escudemore or Skidmore, in fee-tail, with contingent remainder to Walter Skidmore.<sup>248</sup> This family gave their name to Skidmore Farm, which formed part of the manor of South Wells, and it is probable that this was their place of residence. Walter Skidmore succeeded to the property, and obtained licence from Bishop Edendon (1346-66) to celebrate mass in the oratory of his manor of Wells.<sup>249</sup> Nothing more is known of the history of this estate until 1352, when Peter le Barbour and Isabel his wife quitclaimed the manor of Wells next Romsey, and messuages and £10 rent in Romsey, from themselves and the heirs of Isabel to John son of Thomas de Wells.<sup>250</sup> In 1367 John de Wells and Cecily his wife, who had the same year obtained a quitclaim of the manor from Sir John de Edendon,<sup>251</sup> granted to the Abbess and convent of Romsey eleven messuages, 100 acres of land, 50 acres of meadow, 100 acres of heath, 10 acres of moor and 50s. rent in South Wells and Romsey which they held of them in socage 'in part satisfaction of £20 of land, tenements and rent which the king granted by letters patent to the same abbess and convent.'<sup>252</sup> The manor was apparently sold by the abbess and convent to the Dean and canons of St. George's Chapel, Windsor,<sup>253</sup> who were in possession in 1442.<sup>254</sup> They continued to hold it until 1860, when it was purchased by Henry John third Viscount Palmerston.<sup>255</sup> It is now the property of Mr. Wilfrid William Ashley. In 1860 the manor comprised the farm of Skidmore, the mansion-house of Grove Place situated in Nursling parish (q.v.),<sup>256</sup>

ROKE Manor formed part of the possessions of the Dean and canons of St. George's Chapel, Windsor,<sup>258</sup> but the date at which it came into their possession is unknown. By his will dated 8 June 1448 John Greenfield, who had a lease of South Wells, devised his manor of Roke to John Greenfield, of the Royal Household, and to William Pece, whom he appointed as two of his executors, for fourteen years, to dispose of the rents and issues thereof for the good of his soul and fulfilment of his will.<sup>259</sup> The manor was still in possession of the Greenfield family in 1481, in which year Thomas Greenfield, Agnes wife of John Hammond and Christine wife of Simon Croucheman conveyed it to Sir William Hasting.<sup>260</sup> In the fine there is no mention of the Dean and canons of Windsor, but the presumption is that the Greenfields held the manor on lease from them, and that this was in reality a conveyance of their leasehold estate. The manor was sold in 1650 on the confiscation of lands belonging to deans and chapters to Walter Harward, who was already in possession of a lease and occupied the house,<sup>260a</sup> but on the accession of Charles II was restored to the dean and canons.

The hamlet of LEE formed part of the possessions of Romsey Abbey until the Dissolution.<sup>261</sup> In 1550 Edward VI granted to William Paulet, Lord St. John, Earl of Wiltshire, all the 'messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments now or late in the separate tenures of Thomas Mainsbridge, John Howchyn and others in the tithing of Lee formerly belonging to Romsey Abbey,' and annual rents there amounting to £15 14s. 6d.<sup>262</sup> William Paulet Marquess of Winchester, the grandson of the earl, was apparently still in possession of the tithing in 1584,<sup>263</sup> but its subsequent history is unknown until 1718, when John Nowes, owner of Lee House,<sup>264</sup> devised by will all his property there for the education of the poor of Romsey. In 1862 the trustees of the Nowes charity sold the Lee estate to John Henry third Viscount Palmerston, owner of Broadlands (q.v.).<sup>265</sup>

A hospital for lepers and other paupers called the HOSPITAL OF ST. MARY MAGDALEN AND ST. ANTHONY existed in Romsey, the proctors whereof had licence in 1317 and 1331 to collect alms for the inmates, then in extreme poverty.<sup>266</sup> The site of the hospital is apparently represented by the tenement called 'Le Spyttyl in Spyttylstrete,' which was included in the grant of Romsey Infra to John Foster in 1544.<sup>267</sup>

The first settlement of a monastic body in Romsey dates from 907, when King

EDWARD the Elder founded a house of nuns here, and set his daughter St. Elfleda at their head. This foundation seems to have lapsed; at any rate, a new foundation was made in 967 by King Edgar, with the assistance of Bishop Ethelwold of Winchester. This re-foundation was doubtless due to the revival of monasticism and the strict Benedictine rule was now introduced, the first abbess being St. Merwinna. Materials for a history of the buildings are only scanty, as far as documentary matter is concerned, and the church as it stands to-day, the only relic of the monastic buildings, is its own best historian.

The 10th-century church, whether Edward's or Edgar's, is said to have been burnt during the Danish wars after the massacre of 1002, but this does not necessarily imply a destruction of the buildings. It is quite possible that they stood, repaired and enlarged, till the general rebuilding of the church, begun about 1120, and there is, fortunately, a certain amount of definite evidence about the older church. In 1900, during the laying down of a new floor in the nave and crossing, the remains of an apse were found, proving that the east end of this church stood on the site of the present tower. The apse was slightly stilted, and its walls continued under the western piers of the tower; they were 4 ft. 9 in. thick and had been faced with wrought stone, only one course of which remained, the base of the wall being of plastered flint rubble. The bottom of the footings on the inner face was 4 ft. below the present floor level, but on the outer face the footings were not reached at an equal depth. Under the piers a second course of wrought stone remained, and still shows above the pavement level, the 12th-century masonry being cut to fit over it. There can be little doubt that this apse remained standing till the building of the tower and was then taken down to the floor level. The other piece of evidence about the older church is to be found in the south aisle of the nave. Here the walling of the third and fourth bays of the south wall is clearly older than the work to the east and west of it, and has a distinctly early character. The triple respond at the east of the third bay is not set opposite to the second pier of the main arcade, but well to the east of the direct line, and the south wall of the two east bays of the aisle is differently treated from the rest of the aisle, corresponding in detail rather to the work in the transepts than to that of the nave. There are also signs of a break in building between the west wall of the south transept, in its lower part, and the south walls of the transept and aisle. The inference is that walling older than that remaining in the third and fourth bays of the aisle existed, at the time of the general rebuilding of the church, in the position of the first and second bays, and this, taken in conjunction with the apse, suggests a plan of late 10th or early 11th-century type, resembling that of the church at Deerhurst, in Gloucestershire, with apsidal presbytery, shallow transepts flanking a square central tower, and aisleless nave. This nave received a south aisle, and perhaps a north aisle also, early in the 12th century or late in the 11th, and it is possible that when Christina, the sister of Edgar Atheling, took the veil here in 1086 she brought an accession of wealth to the abbey which enabled the nuns to enlarge their church by adding aisles to the nave. The nave was probably about 60 ft. long, the normal dimension in an 11th-century church of the larger type, and one handed down from early times and often found continued in 12th-century buildings.

The setting out of the eastern parts of the present church, which was probably begun, as already said, about 1120, is very regular, the site having been unencumbered, but that of the nave shows several irregularities which help to throw light on the earlier history. There are three principal periods of work, the extent and progress of which are set forth in the detailed description which follows. The three western bays of the nave date from the early part of the 13th century, and are not only set out on a different axis from the rest but have slightly thicker main walls, which are very skilfully adapted to the earlier arcades. It seems probable that the old nave was taken down piecemeal during the first two periods of rebuilding, but that the third, the 13th-century completion, was begun from the west, outside the line of the early west wall, and carried eastwards. The west wall of the old nave, which would come about the middle of the sixth bay of the present building—in other words, the middle bay of the 13th-century work—was probably standing when the new west end was set out, and the alteration of axis would easily occur in the process.

The church must have been finished about 1230, but no record of a consecration about that time has survived. It had a vaulted porch on the north side of the nave, evidently not on so great a scale as that at Christchurch, but said to have been as much as 40 ft. long, part of the early 13th-century work. In the third quarter of the 13th century the east end of the church was altered by the rebuilding of the two chapels opening eastward from the ambulatory, and the remodelling of the east wall of the presbytery by the destruction of the triforium and clearstory, and the insertion of two very beautiful three-light windows. The only other important structural alteration took place early in the 15th century, c. 1403, when by the advice of Bishop William of Wykeham the accommodation for the parishioners of Romsey, hitherto limited to the north aisle of the nave, was increased by the grant to them of the north transept as the chancel of their church, and the building of a parish nave to the west of the transept, opening to the north aisle by four wide arches. At the Suppression the parish obtained possession of the whole church and the added building on the north became superfluous and was pulled down, its window tracery being used to block the arches opening from the north aisle and transept. In this condition the aisle remained till modern times, when the 12th-century windows and walling in its two eastern bays were 'restored.' The north porch was probably altered when the parish nave was added, and pulled down with it after the Suppression; a new porch has now been built on its site.

The church as it stands to-day is a fine and dignified building, but from the lack of an adequate finish to its tower and the very commonplace nature of its site is far less picturesque externally than many churches of less interest. The interior, on the other hand, is one of the most attractive pieces of 12th-century work to be found in the country, full of interesting details and singularly unspoiled by later alteration. The original effect, indeed, has been greatly altered by the destruction of the triforium and clearstory galleries in the east wall of the presbytery, but the two large windows which replace them, though somewhat out of scale with the rest of the building, are of such singular grace and beauty as to atone completely for the loss of unity in the design. The 12th-century work is faced throughout with Binstead stone of excellent quality, and as durable as it is pleasant in colour. The plan is cruciform, with aisles to the presbytery and nave, and single eastern apses to the transepts, the presbytery aisles being continued across its square east end, and having opened originally to a pair of eastern chapels of the same elevation as the aisles. The plan of these chapels is uncertain and from excavations made in 1909 on their site it seems that their foundations are entirely destroyed by later work. The tower over the crossing rises but little above the roof, being only 92 ft. high to the parapet, and it is not likely that its walls were ever much higher, but it was doubtless capped with a pyramidal roof which must have given a far more satisfactory finish to the church than the present low octagonal wooden turret, which has been not unjustly likened to a hen-coop.

The external elevations are plain, the original windows of the eastern parts of the church having arches with a moulded outer order, and a label with billet or small zigzag ornament. The outer order has jamb-shafts in the capitals, which in most cases are simply scalloped, and a chamfered abacus at the springing is continued as a string along the wall, but stopping against the buttresses.

At the sill level runs a string of more elaborate section, which breaks round the buttresses, and at the base of the walls is a plain chamfered plinth. The buttresses are broad and shallow with recessed angles, the smaller pilasters thus formed stopping in rather aimless fashion at different heights. In the transept apses and western bays of the presbytery aisles they stop under the string at the level of the springing of the window arches, but in the eastern bays they are carried up higher, as if some different finish were originally intended. The main buttresses end flush with the corbel course, which on the north side of the church has been nearly entirely renewed, with a modern ashlar parapet over it. In the original arrangement the eaves came down over the cornice, which has pairs of round-headed arches resting on grotesque heads. The clearstory has simple arcading, each bay having a blank stilted round-headed arch on either side of the wider arch of the window. This has jamb-shafts with scalloped capitals and a roll moulding on the outer order but no labels. Between the bays are plain pilaster buttresses, and the corbel table, which is nearly all modern and of the plainest character, carries an embattled parapet.

The transepts have clasping buttresses at the angles, the western angles containing the stairs, which end in turrets rising above the parapets, and there are similar flat buttresses set in the middle of the end walls stopping at the base of the gables, with plain round-headed arches springing from them to the angle buttresses and framing the clearstory windows. The gables have been flattened, but preserve an ornamental arcade of semicircular arches across the lower part. In the nave, where the later 12th-century clearstory begins, the treatment is richer, with pairs of tall banded shafts and foliate capitals, the arrangement of blank arcades on either side of the window being preserved on the north side, which is the main approach to the church, but on the south side, which could only be seen from the cloister, the arcades are left out.

The 13th-century work in the nave harmonizes with that of the 12th century, though the detail is naturally different, the cornice having trefoiled arches and the windows being pointed. The earliest form of cornice seems to be that on the earliest part of the building now standing, namely, the third bay of the south aisle of the nave, and is carried on round arches alternating with straight-sided ones. That of the fourth bay has an alternation of pointed and round-headed arches, and those to the west are of the 13th-century type with trefoiled arches. Probably none of the parapets which stand on the cornices were originally intended, the church having had plain eaves throughout.

The eastern arm of the church is of three bays, with north and south aisles joined at the east by an ambulatory, from which two chapels formerly opened eastward. The eastern limit of the original quire was probably under the east arch of the crossing, the presbytery taking up the whole of the eastern arm, with the upper entrances to the quire (ostia presbyterii) in the western bay.

The bays are separated by half-round shafts on shallow rectangular pilasters, which run up to the tops of the walls, the string at the base of the triforium, and another some feet above the springing of the triforium arches, and being the continuation of their labels, breaking round them. Above the second string the shafts are slighter.

The piers are compound, with engaged half-round shafts flanked by smaller three-quarter shafts, and towards the aisles single half-round shafts. The capitals are scalloped with two, three or four divisions, and the arches are round-headed, and in the north and south arcades considerably stilted, of three orders, the inner with a heavy soffit torus, the second with a three-quarter roll, and the outer with a band of vertical zigzag ornament and a label carved in a sunk lozenge pattern. The triforium stage is about equal in height to the arcade below, and has tall semicircular arches of two orders, with heavy rolls and an enriched label and engaged shafts to each order, with scalloped capitals. The openings are subdivided, inclosing pairs of semicircular arches of a single order with zigzag or similar ornament, but showing an unusual treatment, the tympanum between them and the main arch not being filled with masonry but left open, with a small shaft inserted between the crown of the main arch and the springing of the sub-arches.

At the base of the triforium is a string with billet ornament, and another of simple detail at the clear-story level.

The clearstory has three openings to each bay, with circular shafts, half-round responds and scalloped capitals, the middle opening being wider than the others, and carried up with a plain semicircular head and small jamb-shafts standing on the capitals of the main shafts, inclosing a wide round-headed window. The side openings are arched over from the main capitals, but above them are blank arcades carrying on the design of the middle opening.

The internal width of the main span of the presbytery is practically that of the nave of the older church, and was probably regulated by it. The two bays of the main arcade in the east wall have semicircular arches, and their proportions are very well suited to the space they occupy, but the arches of the north and south arcades are too narrowly spaced for their height, and are in consequence considerably stilted, as already noted. This looks as though the site had been confined eastwards and the setting out of the new work cramped.

In spite of the shafts dividing each bay of the general elevation, it is clear that a high vault was never contemplated, and from the line of the ashlar facing above the east arch of the crossing it appears that a flat ceiling was the original finish.

With the aisles and ambulatory the case is different. All are covered with quadripartite ribbed stone vaults, the ribs having no special member in the jambs, but being sprung from corbels set across the angles of the bays, as if unribbed vaults had been originally intended. The rib section is a roll flanked by small hollow-chamfered angles, and the vault cells are plastered, all the plastering being modern. The curve of the diagonal ribs is approximately semicircular, and the transverse arches are very stilted.

The east wall of the presbytery, though never rebuilt, is entirely altered by the insertion over the main arcade of two large three-light windows in the latter part of the 13th century, perhaps as beautiful specimens of their kind as any in the country. They are of three trefoiled lights with three cusped circles over, the upper one quatrefoiled and the two lower cinquefoiled. The heads of the main lights and the rear arches are ornamented with knots of foliage, and mullions and rear arches have slender banded Purbeck marble shafts with moulded capitals and bases. On the pier between the windows is another like shaft, which seems to suggest that a scheme of vaulting the presbytery in stone was at this time proposed. It ends below on a foliate corbel, its base being at a higher level than the others, and from the condition of the wall below, in the spandrel between the two east arches of the main arcade, it is probable that a canopy for an image was fixed here.

The windows now set in the blocked east arches of the ambulatory are of the same character, though less elaborate and beautiful, being of three lights, the middle cinquefoiled and the others trefoiled, with two quatrefoiled and one sexfoiled circle over. The tracery and mullions are moulded with a filleted roll between two hollows and secondary rolls, but the effect is spoilt by clumsy moulded bands inserted at the springing line, replacing original capitals.

On the south jamb of the north arch to the destroyed eastern chapels are some very valuable remains of late 12th or early 13th-century painting, a set of four roundels on a background of foliage with a dado of hanging drapery below. Each roundel contains a scene, now unfortunately much defaced, said to be taken from the story of St. Elfleda.

The 13th-century eastern chapels were of two vaulted bays, with a central pier; the foundations of their east walls are said to have been found in the gardens east of the churchyard. Part of their tiled floor with a low stone bench is still in existence at their north-west angle.

The eastern bays of the aisles are square externally but apsidal within, and have a wide central window flanked by wall arcades of two bays with a sunk-star diaper on the arches. The opening of the apse is spanned by a square-edged semicircular arch with an outer roll, the vaulted ceiling to the east of it being carried by two short square-edged ribs springing from corbels on either side of the east window.

The transverse arches in the aisles are of a single square order, springing from half-round shafts with large scalloped capitals of a rather earlier look than the rest. There are certain exceptions to be noticed later. The bays are lighted by single round-headed lights, those in the south aisle being original, while in the north aisle only the western of the three is old. The middle window is a modern restoration, and the eastern a mid-14th-century insertion, now without tracery.

The capitals of the north aisle are with one exception, and in the western arch, scalloped, but there is much more variety in the ambulatory and south aisle. The wall arcades in the south apse have volute capitals, and those of the transverse arches are in some cases richly carved with acanthus foliage and interlacing scrolls. An early-looking type of capital has plain angular flutes, in two cases combined with a wavy ornament, and several have figures of men or beasts. The most interesting of these are those in the responds of the transverse arches on the east side of the second bay of the vault in each aisle. The north capital in the south aisle has two groups of figures. The first shows an angel between two crowned men, one seated and holding a V-shaped scroll, of which the angel holds the end, and the other standing and holding what looks like a knife. On the scroll is an inscription, 'ROBERT ME FECIT.' The second group is of two seated men with a grotesque head between them; they also hold a scroll on which is 'ROBERT RUTE CONSULE QS.' The south capital in the north aisle is a battle scene. In the middle a king is fighting with a bearded man, whose wrist he holds; behind the man is an angel, and all round are scattered dead bodies, heads and swords. Behind the king a horse is running away, and above it is a large bird carrying off two heads.

The western bay of each aisle opens to the apsidal chapel of the adjoining transept by a modern round-headed doorway, over which is a tall opening ranging with the aisle windows and similarly treated, but cut straight through the wall; this is part of the original design. The opening is in each case set in the western half of the bay, to make it fit into the scheme of the arcading round the apse, and the blank space thus left to the east of it towards the aisle is filled, in the south aisle, by two bays of wall arcades like those in the east chapels of the aisles, and in the north aisle by a single plain pointed arch, clearly original work.

The arches opening from the west ends of the aisles to the transepts are of the same design and ornament as those of the presbytery, but the capitals of their responds—the north respond in the north aisle, and the south in the south—are richly carved, while the others are scalloped. Evidence of the progress of the work is here to be seen in the fact that the ribs of the west bay of the aisles spring at the west from separate architectural members—engaged shafts with capitals, instead of small corbels set across the angles.

The apses of the transepts show the same feature, having quadripartite ribbed vaults, with ribs of the same section as the aisles, but springing from four shafts at the level of the capitals of the arch opening to the transept.

The apses have windows on the east, and on the north and south respectively, the wall surfaces between being treated with simple arcading, the shafts ranging with those in the jambs of the windows and having plain scalloped capitals. In the north transept apse are remains of two piscinae to the south of the site of the altar, and a shallow square recess above. The position of the altar is taken by the canopied tomb of Robert Brackley, 1628, a very good specimen of its kind, but out of place. It has a panelled round arch under a broken pediment, carried by Corinthian columns, and a sarcophagus below; it is of stone, painted in imitation of different marbles. In 1851 it was described as being in the 'south ambulatory.'

The internal elevations of the transepts follow the general lines of the presbytery, but there are slight differences of detail. In the north transept the labels of the eastern triforium arches have a small zigzag ornament in two lines, and a single line of it is repeated on the labels in this stage in the north and west walls. On the east wall, as in the presbytery, the label continues as a string across the pilaster between the bays, but this does not occur again in this transept, nor at all in the south transept.

The transepts are two bays deep, the bay in which the apses are set being considerably wider than the other, and in consequence the clearstories of these bays have an extra opening on either side. The clearstory shafts of this bay in the north transept are alternately round and octagonal, but this is not the case in the south transept. The triforium stage below is subdivided in the north transept by three pointed arches formed by the intersection of two semicircular arches, but in the south there are three semicircular arches. They are entirely in modern stonework.

It is notable that the tympanum of the triforium bay next to the crossing in the south transept is solid, and this has been followed in the new work. That in the corresponding bay on the west of the transept also has a solid tympanum.

The south transept is a little more ornamental in its details than the north, having a line of large zigzag ornament in the outer order of all arches on the triforium stage, the labels having either a double row of zigzag or a peculiar ornament like a row of pointed leaves. This occurs in the two eastern and the north-western bays.

Both transepts were designed for flat ceilings; in their outer western angles are stairs running up the full height, and other stairs start from the triforium level in the outer eastern angles.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The north transept shows a good many traces of its use from the end of the 14th century as the chancel of the parish church of Romsey.

The west window in its north wall has been mutilated and fitted with tracery, and a 16th-century door is cut through beneath it, with a holy water recess to the east, and a second recess now fitted up as a place for a hydrant. Under the east window in this wall a small four-centred opening with a marked eastward splay has been cut; it is now blocked externally, but would have commanded a view of the parish altar. To the south of the arch opening to the eastern apse is a small 15th-century stone bracket for an image, and in the west wall an original window with a blank arcade on each side has been mutilated by the cutting through the wall of a segmental pointed arch, opening to the parish nave, built against the north aisle of the monastic nave. The arch is now blocked and in it is set a square-headed three-light window with cinquefoiled lights. The two lower stages of the west wall of the south transept do not range with the rest, because the setting of the cloister against this wall made a different scheme of lighting necessary. An interlacing wall arcade of seven bays is set below a group of three round-headed lights, the middle of which is taller than the others. That this is not the original arrangement may be seen from outside; the splays have been altered, and at first there were three windows of equal height in the wall, and the springing of the middle window, now heightened, may be seen cut into the form of engaged shafts in a very curious manner.

The crossing arches are of three plain square orders without labels, those opening to the transepts being semicircular, with three engaged shafts in each respond, while in the east and west arches, which are of a wider span, the two outer orders are awkwardly stilted, only the inner being semicircular. The object of the widening is to do away with the responds as much as possible, for when the monastic quire occupied the space beneath the tower the responds would have narrowed the available space if carried down to the ground. Their slight projection in the east arch made it easy to stop them on ornamental corbels just below the level of the triforium floor, the billeted string of the presbytery being returned round them. In the western arch the treatment is more effective and simpler, the arch having no capital at the springing, but a corbel carved with a scale pattern, which dies into the wall at once.

Above the arches runs a gallery of three double bays on each side, with projecting half-round shafts between the bays, standing on corbels, and ending in scalloped capitals under the beams of the flat ceiling, which is likewise modern.

The stage above, now hidden, has plain windows on each side, and was originally open to the church, forming the lantern over the crossing. The effect must have been very satisfactory, and it is a pity that no other place for the bells than the upper story of this lantern is now available.

The nave shows in a very interesting way the gradual progress of the work. It is of seven bays, and leaving out for the moment the evidences of early work in the aisles, which belong to the story of the former church, seems to have been set up as follows:—

First work, c. 1150–70.—Three bays and the east respond of the fourth bay of the main arcade on the north, with two bays and the east respond of the third bay of the triforium over; four bays of the main arcade on the south, and two bays and the east respond of the third bay of the triforium over. In the clear-story only the east respond and one pillar in the east bay on each side.

Second work, c. 1180.—Completion of the fourth bay of the main arcade on the north and building of the east respond of the fifth. Triforium and clear-story finished to the end of the fourth bay. On the south the triforium and clear-story carried to the same point.

Third work, c. 1210–30.—The three west bays of the nave in all stages.

There are certain minor changes in the course of the work which show a further subdivision, but they are not of sufficient importance to be taken separately.

The arches of the main arcade in the first work have scalloped capitals, and arches of two orders, the outer square and the inner with a wide torus on the soffit, and there is a plain chamfered label.

The two eastern bays of the nave show that a scheme of double bays was at first intended, with circular piers alternating with clustered ones, but this was abandoned before the third bay was built, and the details do not suggest any particular break in the work.

The middle pier of the first two bays runs up into the triforium, where it is finished with a large scalloped capital, while at the springing of the main arcade there is no capital towards the nave, but a scalloped capital like that above is carried round about two-thirds of the circumference, to provide springing for the nave arches and aisle vault.

At the base of the triforium a billeted string like that in the presbytery is continued westward, but without breaking round the shafts dividing the bays, up to the west of the fourth bay on either side of the nave.

The dividing shafts appear of greater projection than those in the presbytery, having in addition to the pilaster and half-round shaft a pair of flanking shafts, which run up without a break to the springing of the triforium arches, but the extra projection is only obtained by thinning the walls in the main arcades, the normal thickness being regained in the triforium. This arrangement, which is part of the two-bay scheme of the eastern bays, is continued in the third and fourth bays, and in a modified form in the later work. There are many traces of damage by fire in the eastern bays of the nave, the main arches of the two east bays on the north being now faced with cement, and the second and third on the south have been similarly treated. The sub-arches and central pillars of the triforium are entirely modern on both sides for four bays, but the clear-story has escaped damage, as far as can be seen. The east bays on each side are markedly narrower than the rest, and the eastern arch of the south main arcade is more elaborate, having an outer order of zigzag and a richly worked label, belonging rather to the work of the south transept than to that of the nave; it fits very awkwardly to the circular pier on the west.

The two eastern bays of the triforium correspond on both sides of the nave, having semicircular main arches with a heavy roll between two square orders; on the south this arch is cement faced in the east bay, and the modern subdividing arches also correspond, having a line of zigzag in the east bays and a plain square order in the second bay.

The third and fourth bays of the triforium on both sides belong to the second work, and have semi-circular main arches, moulded in two orders with rolls and hollows, and their capitals are of a late fluted scallop type; the third bay has moulded sub-arches, open above, with the usual little shaft, but in the fourth bay, where the moulded arches are of a later type, the tympanum is solid.

The four east bays of the clearstory, with the exception of a small part of the eastern bay, belong entirely to the second work, and have three moulded and pointed arches of equal height, the middle one being wider than the others, and inclosing a wide pointed window. The shafts are square with small engaged shafts at the angles, keeled in the side openings and rounded in the middle ones, having plain leaf capitals. In the side bays are rounded sub-arches at a lower level, springing from half-capitals at the backs of the shafts; on the north these are scalloped in all four bays, but only in the two east bays on the south, the other two having awkward chamfered capitals. A survival of older work is seen in the middle opening of the east bay on the south, which has zigzag ornament on its pointed arch instead of the later mouldings.

The fourth bay of the main arcade on the north, which is the only one belonging to the second work, has a semicircular arch of two orders, the inner plain, and the outer with a line of horizontal zigzag and a dogtooth label. Its eastern capital, belonging to the first work, takes both orders of the arch, but the western is subdivided, having twin shafts to the inner order and foliate capitals with a common abacus, and there are flanking shafts with similar capitals to the outer order on both sides. Towards the nave a pair of half-round shafts run up to the springing of the triforium arches, flanked by smaller shafts, the billet string at the sill of the triforium being carried round them. The shafts are of less projection than those in the first work, and stop at the triforium level with fluted capitals, but above them a single half-round shaft matching those in the earlier work is corbelled out and carried up to the roof as before.

The three western bays, belonging to the third work, have in the main arcades pointed arches with a chamfered inner and moulded outer order, and a moulded label; the bases have foliate spurs, and the capitals are all moulded in the south arcade, and for the most part foliate in the north, with a few moulded. They are comparatively shallow, but the foliage is of the earlier type, with tight bunches of leaves on the upper parts. In the triforium fluted capitals predominate, though both moulded and foliate also occur, and in the clearstory nearly all are fluted.

The shafts towards the nave between the bays are triple, and of greater projection than those in the older work; they are crossed by a moulded string at the base of the triforium, and by a simple roll at the base of the clearstory, the latter being of the same section as that further to the east. Above this they set back, with a moulded base, and are finished at the roof with moulded capitals. In the ground stage they are set on a rectangular pilaster flanked by small shafts, the pilaster merging into the wall face at the triforium level, and the shafts taking the outer order of the triforium arcades. These arcades are of two orders with deeply moulded pointed arches of rather ungraceful shape, being struck from a point well below their capitals, and the wide openings are divided by two moulded trefoiled sub-arches springing from a central column of four engaged circular shafts, and carrying a masonry spandrel pierced in the middle by a moulded quatrefoil, the inner order of which originally had roll cusps. In the eastern bay of this work on the south side there are three trefoiled sub-arches instead of two.

The clearstory carries on the design of the earlier bays with little variation, except that the lower range of arches is pointed and not semicircular.

The west wall is occupied by three tall lancets, their sills ending with a moulded string at the level of the springing of the main arcades, and their arched heads being at the same level as those of the clearstory. Groups of three engaged shafts between the lights carry the moulded arches, and above them the wall is thinned, a passage being carried across at this level. In the gable above is a large circular window inclosing a quatrefoil, intended to light the roof-space, as the whole design is arranged for a flat wooden ceiling, instead of the ribbed wagon-headed ceiling now in existence.

The first three bays of the north aisle belong to the first work of the nave and have original vaults with ribs whose section is a roll between two fillets, while the transverse arches are of a single square order, considerably stilted. They spring from half-round pilasters on both sides of the aisles, but the ribs, while springing from small flanking shafts on the north wall, have no special member provided to take them in the main arcade. In each bay of the north wall, as first built, was a wide round-headed window with jamb-shafts, with a chamfered string at the sill, but these were cut through and nearly destroyed when the arches opening to the parish nave outside the north wall were inserted. The original arrangement has been restored in the two eastern bays, but in the third bay the 15th-century arch remains, only the head of the original window showing on the outer face of the wall. When the parish nave was pulled down after the monastic church became the property of the parish its north windows were inserted in the 15th-century arches, and in the third bay the lower part of the inserted window, with four cinquefoiled lights, is still in position.

The fourth bay of the aisle belongs to the second work, and has a ribbed vault with a late form of zigzag ornament on the ribs and a carved boss at the crown. The transverse arch has a square section as in the earlier work, but springs from pairs of half-round shafts with foliate capitals, and the ribs of the vault are provided with special members on both sides of the aisles, those in the north wall continuing to the ground like those of the main arcade, instead of being stopped on a string at the level of the window sills. The inserted 15th-century arch remains in the north wall of this bay, and in it are set the traceried head and upper parts of the cinquefoiled lights of one of the four-light north windows of the destroyed parish nave. In this bay stands the modern font of 13th-century design, and here and in the next bay eastward are kept a number of masonry fragments and details from different parts of the building.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The three west bays of this aisle are covered with quadripartite vaults with moulded ribs springing from triple shafts with foliate capitals. The capitals, springers and wall ribs are original, but the rest of the vaults is of lath and plaster and of 19th-century date. In the west wall and on the north side of the two west bays are wide single lancets with moulded rear arches and jamb-shafts with foliate capitals like those of the main arcades, while in the east bay, against which a contemporary vaulted porch formerly stood, is the principal doorway of the church, which has a fine segmental rear arch with dogtooth ornament in arch and label and Purbeck marble shafts in the jambs. On the outer face it has a two-centred arch with a chamfered inner order and a moulded outer one with dogtooth in the labels and jamb-shafts with foliate capitals, the shafts being modern.

In the south aisle of the nave the two eastern bays are irregularly spaced, on account of the existence of older walling to the west of them in the south wall, and have also certain affinities in detail with the south transept, like the east bay of the main arcade on this side. The vault in the east bay is different from any others in the church, the section of the ribs being three rolls separated by small fillets and flanked by hollows. The transverse arch at the west of the bay has a torus like that on the nave arches, but set between two chamfers, and is less stilted than the rest, being of wider span. It springs on the north from a half-round shaft set against the large circular pier of the arcade, this shaft and the corresponding one on the south wall being flanked by smaller shafts set anglewise in the direction of the lines of the diagonal ribs. The bases on the south side have claw spurs, but not those on the north. The three shafts on the large circular nave pier are perhaps added to it, as there is no evidence of bonding in the masonry, though the joints appear to range in nearly every case.

In the south wall of the east bay is a small round-headed window with jamb-shafts and early-looking capitals and a roll on its inner arch, set very high to allow for the eastern cloister door immediately below it. At its sill level is a string with the peculiar leaf ornament which occurs in the south transept, and the door below has a label, continued as a string, with a lozenge diaper somewhat like that in the presbytery. Below this string to the west of the door is one bay of a plain wall arcade of interlacing round-headed arches, springing from square pilasters with chamfered angles. The south side of the doorway towards the cloister is a very pretty piece of work, though mutilated by the line of a later roof. It is set in a projection equal in depth to the buttresses on the outer face of the south wall, and has a semicircular arch of three orders, the outer of which has had large carved pateræ on alternate voussoirs, now mostly cut away, and a label with palmette foliage. The second order has a cable moulded edge roll flanked by a hollow set with 'rosettes,' and has a diaper pattern on its soffit, while the inner order has a line of zigzag with flowers in the soffit set on quatrefoils of leaves. There are twisted jamb-shafts to both inner orders, and the capitals have simple foliage and interlacing scrolls, in one case with a curious resemblance to work of a much earlier date. The window above has a label with the 'leaf' ornament already noted in the transepts, and a line of zigzag on the arch. The second bay of the aisle has the same arrangement of triple shafts in the south wall, but the transverse arch is of a single square order, and the diagonal ribs are like those of the north aisle, with a torus between two fillets. The wall arcade continues on the south wall, with the ornamented string over it, but at a slightly lower level than in the east bay, and over it is an entirely modern window of 12th-century style.

The third and fourth bays bear evidence of several alterations. The south wall in each bay is of smaller and rougher ashlar work both inside and out, and probably belongs, as already noticed, to the oldest work now above ground. The half-round respond between the bays appears to be an insertion, and with the vault of the third bay belongs to the first work of the nave arcades. That it is not the first vault here is shown by the line on the south wall of the wall cell of another vault to which the ashlar facing is fitted. The wall sets back at a chamfered string, at a higher level than in the north wall, because of the cloister roof outside, and the window above has a round arched head cut straight through the wall, but with splayed jambs, and jamb-shafts in its rear arch with one scalloped and one cushion capital. The vault ribs spring from small shafts on the south wall, but have no special member on the nave side. In the fourth bay the south-west respond, with the vault, belongs to the second work of the nave, and the vault-ribs have a section more like those of the presbytery aisles, with a roll between two hollows, and the window, which follows the design of that in the third bay, is also of the second date.

The three remaining bays are, generally speaking, like those opposite to them in the north aisle, but the windows are shorter and set higher in the wall to clear the cloister roof, and have segmental rear arches. In the west bay the south window is of plainer detail and blank, the western range of claustral buildings having abutted here. The western cloister door is set in the west half of the middle bay of the three, and is of plainer character than that in the north wall, with a moulded segmental arch, engaged jamb-shafts, and a line of dogtooth in the head.

The fittings of the church are with one exception entirely modern, but some evidence of former arrangements is obtainable. In 1900, during the process of reflooring the nave, the retaining walls and pits of stalls were partly uncovered, and showed masonry of two dates, the older of which contained some re-used 12th-century stones, and was set against the bases of the south arcade in a way which showed that it was of later date than the arcade.

The present quire fittings are entirely modern, except that the screen set in the east arch of the crossing contains in its upper part some 14th-century detail, consisting of a row of open trefoils inclosing small heads, with cresting above. It seems to have stood in the north transept, separating the parish chancel from the monastic church, but was moved thence to the west end of the nave, where early in the last century an organ gallery stood. After this it was taken down and stowed away in the nave triforium, but finally unearthed by Mr. Berthon, the late vicar, and set up about 1880 in its present position, a new lower part being made to match the old work.

In the north aisle of the presbytery is a large wooden frame filled with upright boarding, and having a ledge at the foot, which seems to have been the reredos of an altar. It is painted in two tiers, the upper having a row of nine saints, St. Jerome, St. Francis and St. Sebastian on the right, St. Rock, and two saints of doubtful identity on the left, and in the middle a Benedictine abbess, perhaps St. Merwinna, between a bishop and a Benedictine abbot. The lower tier shows the Resurrection of our Lord. He stands between two pairs of soldiers, beyond whom are two angels censuring, and in the right hand corner the kneeling figure of a Benedictine abbess, holding a scroll with 'surrexit dominus de sepulcro.' Behind the figures is painted drapery in alternate stripes of red and green, and the background of the upper tier is red, with pilasters in gold between the figures of marked Renaissance design, showing that the whole can be little, if at all, earlier than 1530. A small figure of a woman in secular dress, with a 'kennel' head-dress, kneels at the feet of St. Francis, who is the only saint to be thus distinguished.

On another wooden panel near by is the kneeling figure of a man, of much better style, against a red background powdered with flowers and wolves' or goats' heads razed in gold, and gilt stars of gesso. He wears a grey amess, and above him are the arms of Wykeham.

A 15th-century cope of green figured velvet embroidered with stars, and having red velvet orphreys embroidered with flowers, palmettes and pineapples, is here preserved, having been cut up at one time to serve as an altar cloth.

In the east ambulatory are preserved several good marble coffin slabs, one with a hand holding an early-looking crozier, and another with a floreate cross and foliage along the hollow edges, and on one side a crozier held by a woman's hand coming out of the side of the slab.

Another has in 14th-century lettering 'Johanna hic jacet humata cuius anime Cristus det pacem.' This must refer to Joan Icthe, ob. 1349, or Joan Gervase, 1352.

A fine French chest with traceried front and sides, c. 1500, stands here; it has a very fine tinned iron lock plate and a crowned shield cheveronny. On a table near by are parts of two stone cressets, which had three and four holes originally.

But the most interesting relic in this part of the church is the stone slab set into the reredos of the altar in the south-east chapel, carved with a crucifixion. It is perhaps 10th-century work, and shows our Lady and St. John, and below them two soldiers, one with the sponge and reed, and the other piercing our Lord's side with a spear. Leafy branches spring from the stem of the cross, and on its arms are seated two angels. The reredos in which it is set is good 15th-century screenwork with traceried heads brought from elsewhere.

In the south transept is a very fine canopied tomb, c. 1330, under the south-east window. It contains a late 13th-century Purbeck marble effigy of a lady in a loose gown with tight sleeves, and a mantle fastened as usual across the breast. Her right hand holds a fold of the gown and her left is raised to touch the cord fastening the mantle. She wears a falling head-dress and a wimple, and her feet rest on a dog. No name can be given to the person represented, who is certainly not an abbess, but the work is extremely good, and she was no doubt someone of importance. The tomb and effigy have no connexion with each other, the latter having been dug up near the west end of the nave and placed in the tomb because it happened to fit it. In the north aisle of the presbytery is an early 16th-century marble altar tomb of the common type, which has lost its brasses and shields, and, like the other tomb, is of unknown attribution.

The modern monuments in the church are of no great importance, the most interesting being a raised tomb with an effigy by Westmacott, intended to represent Sir William Petty, who was buried here in 1623.

The monastic buildings other than the church have left but little trace. The cloister was on the south side of the nave, and two rows of corbels in the south wall and several lines of weatherings and grooves for roofs witness to alterations in its levels, and doubtless rebuildings, at various dates. The abutment of the western range of claustral buildings shows clearly at the west end of the south aisle of the nave, but the eastern range did not abut against the south transept, as in normal cases, except at the south-west angle, where the lines of a very small gabled roof and a 13th-century foliate corbel are to be seen.

It is possible that here, as at Peterborough, the line of the eastern range was affected by the position of a Saxon eastern range, which abutted against the south transept of the former church, to the west of the 12th-century transept. Nothing but excavation can clear up the question, and the chances of this are very remote, as the site of the greater part of the cloister is now covered by gardens. Parts of the frater walls may, however, be still standing in a house to the south of the church. In the angle east of the eastern procession door of the cloister, sometimes called the Abbess's door, is a corbel, perhaps for a lamp or cresset, and in the west wall of the transept near by is the well-known rood, a fine and dignified figure of Christ, shown as living, with head erect and open eyes, arms outstretched and horizontal, not drooping, and feet planted side by side on a sloping block resting on a corbel. Round the loins is a short tunic, and above the head is the hand of God among clouds. The work is in high relief and the modelling somewhat spare but full of feeling, and showing considerable mastery of the human form. The date of this fine work has been much disputed, but the first half of the 11th century is perhaps the most likely period. Another uncertain date is that of its setting up in its present position, carefully inserted in the 12th-century wall. Close to it on the south is a recess for a lamp, once covered with a grate, with three holes in the stonework above it for the escape of smoke, but whether this has any particular connexion with the rood may be doubted.

The lantern contains eight bells, which were recast in 1791.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1568, another of 1637; a silver paten of 1659 and another of 1741; a silver flagon of 1727 and an almsdish of 1732; also a silver-gilt chalice and paten of 1892.

There are six books of registers, the first a paper book, apparently a transcript made about 1626, containing mixed entries from 1569 to 1629; the second mixed entries from 1629 to 1727, with gaps in the burials and marriages between 1689 and 1700; the third baptisms and burials from 1727 to 1756 and marriages from 1727 to 1754; the fourth marriages from 1754 to 1802; the fifth baptisms and burials from 1756 to 1812; the sixth marriages from 1802 to 1812.

The conventual church of Romsey ADVOWSON was prebendal, having two canons and prebendaries who were presented by the abess and convent.<sup>268</sup> The tithes were divided into three portions; one called the portion of Walter de Parham taxed at 44 marks; a second called the portion of Robert Maidstone valued at 30 marks, held respectively by the canons; and the portion of the abess taxed at 16 marks.<sup>269</sup> In the ordination in 1321 of a perpetual vicarage, in the gift of the canons of Romsey,<sup>270</sup> the vicar was endowed with two corrodies from the abess, formerly taken by the canons, all small tithes, and all legacies and obventions at the altar of St. Laurence and elsewhere in the church.<sup>271</sup> He seems to have subsequently commuted this for a fixed sum of 18 marks.<sup>272</sup> The rectory was appropriated to the abess and convent,<sup>273</sup> and, with the advowson of the vicarage, was granted by Henry VIII in 1541 to the Dean and Chapter of Winchester.<sup>274</sup> The vicarage, which is of the net yearly value of £230 with glebe worth £30, is now in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester.

In 1331 Nicholas Braishfield and Emma his wife had licence from the abess to found a chantry of one chaplain to celebrate divine service daily in the chapel of St. Nicholas in Romsey Church for the souls of Nicholas and Emma after death, and of all faithful dead.<sup>275</sup> As an endowment they granted the abess and convent a messuage and 25 acres of land in Romsey and released all their right to the custody of the gate of the abbey with a rent of 365 loaves, 365 gallons of convent ale, 365 loaves for servants, 15s. 2d. for food from the kitchen, 5s. for a robe and 19 quarters of bran, payable by the convent.<sup>276</sup> The following year Nicholas and Emma granted an additional 3½ acres of land and 2½ acres of meadow to the chaplain,<sup>277</sup> and in 1335 Emma, then a widow, granted the reversion of 6 messuages, 60 acres of land, 13½ acres of meadow and a rent of 34s. 11d. to the abess and convent.<sup>278</sup>

In 1476 a chantry, called the Chantry or Fraternity of St. George, was founded by the king's kinsman, William Earl of Arundel, and others, wardens of the church of St. Laurence, Romsey.<sup>279</sup> At the Dissolution the chantry was worth £8 9s. 4d., with plate, ornaments, &c., to the value of £1 8s. 10d.<sup>280</sup>

At Woodley, 1¼ miles east, is a school chapel, erected in 1859 and serving as a chapel of ease to Romsey parish church. On weekdays it is used as a school. At Lee, 2 miles south, is another chapel of ease, erected in 1862 by the third Lord Palmerston.

At Ridge, 2 miles south-west, is a school chapel, erected in 1875 by the late Lord Mount-Temple.

The Abbey Congregational Church was originally founded in 1662 by Thomas Warren, the ejected rector of Houghton, near Romsey. The present building was erected in 1887-8. The Wesleyan chapel in The Hundred was erected in 1881.

The Baptist chapel was originally founded in 1750, but the present building in Bell Street was erected in 1811.

The Primitive Methodist chapel in Middle Bridge Street was erected in 1895.

The Municipal Charities are administered and managed by a body of trustees constituted under the provisions of a scheme of the Charity Commissioners, dated 24 February 1899, and consist of the following:—

Charity of John Kent, founded by will, 1688, endowed with 52a. 2r. in Eling let at £80 a year; Charity of John Kent, founded by codicil to said will, endowed with land at Priestlands in Romsey Infra let at £76 a year, and with £134 15s. 5d. consols, with the official trustees.

Thomas Burbank's Charity, will, 1707, moiety of Street Mead, containing 1a. 1r. 25p. of the annual value of £2 15s.; Thomas Coleman's Charity, founded by will, 1838, consisting of 5 shares of £10 each and 8 shares of £5 each in the Romsey Gas and Coke Company, Limited, held by the official trustees, producing £9 a year; Samuel Dunch's Charity, will, 1649, being meadow land known as Dunch's head, containing 2a. 2r. 25p. let at £13 19s.

Charity of Standley Holmes, deed, 1654, endowed with 2a. known as Cock Close, let at £12 6s. 8d., and £154 7s. 11d. consols, with the official trustees (½th part of the income of the property specified under the heading of the Charity of John Kent founded by codicil).

Thomas Shory's Charity, will, 1702, 4a. 1r. 21p. at Abbotswood, let at £9 a year, which is distributed among the poor by the mayor and vicar; Charity of Richard Venables, will, 1598, being a rent-charge of £5 4s. issuing out of a house in Laurence Pountney Lane, London; and Charity of the Hon. Andrews Windsor (see under Southampton), being a contingent interest in a sum of £100 consols, held by the official trustees, on default by the minister of St. Laurence, Southampton, to administer the Sacrament on the days directed by the founder.

The scheme provides for the appointment by the town council of three representative trustees and of five co-optative trustees, and directs (inter alia) payment to the vicar of the yearly sum of £1 out of the income of the charity of John Kent, founded by will, and of the residue of the yearly income of the charity of John Kent, founded by codicil, after deducting £8, and of the yearly sum of £10 to the mayor out of the income of the charity of John Kent, founded by will—subject to the payments aforesaid, the yearly income of the charities to be applied primarily for the benefit of four almspeople. The trustees are also thereby authorized to apply the residue of the income in the formation of a fund for the erection of additional almshouses, or in payment of pensions, donations in aid of the funds of any dispensary, hospital or convalescent home, or any institution in which children suffering from any bodily infirmity are taught a trade. The almspeople and pensioners to be poor women of good character and to receive not less than 5s. a week, with a preference for those who are resident in the area which constituted the borough of Romsey previous to its enlargement in 1876. In December 1906 a sum of £240 was in hand towards providing additional almshouses.

Bartlett's Almshouses.—In 1809 John Bartlett, by deed (enrolled) 11 September 1809, conveyed to trustees six messuages and gardens in Middle Bridge Street upon trust to permit six single women to live therein.

The same donor by his will, proved in the P.C.C., 1817, endowed the same with £6,700 consols, now £6,890 Leeds Corporation 3 Per Cent. Stock, with the official trustees. In 1906 the six inmates received £29 5s. each.

The Abbey Congregational Chapel and trust property consists of the meeting-house, erected in 1887 on land comprised in a deed of 8 February 1830, at a cost of £10,000; also of the manse and Abbey Hall adjoining, comprised in a deed of 1 July 1859, and in 1873 class-rooms and chapel keeper's house were acquired. The official trustees also hold a sum of £193 18s. 5d. consols, the income of which is applicable for the benefit of the minister, under the trusts declared by a deed, dated 20 January 1864.

By an order of the Charity Commissioners of 2 April 1897 trustees were appointed, and authority given to raise a sum not exceeding £1,600 towards payment off of the balance of the cost of erection of chapel.

Educational Charities.—The endowment of John Nowes' Charity, founded by will, 1718, now consists of the Dibden Manor Estate, purchased in 1862 for £25,000, with the proceeds of the sale to Lord Palmerston of the original charity estate, amounting to £13,000, the balance being raised by mortgages. The extent of the trust estate is about 1,200 acres, including 700 acres of mudlands, forming the foreshore, and producing an income of £540 a year. The expenses of management and interest on the mortgages exceed £500 a year. A scheme was established in 1879 under the Endowed Schools Acts, but its provisions have been in abeyance owing to financial stress.

The original trusts were for clothing and apprenticing scholars of this parish and other places in Hampshire, Yeovil and other places in Somerset, Salisbury and Fisherton Anger in Wiltshire.

In 1723 Sir John St. Barbe by will, 1723, charged his farm at Broadlands with an annuity of £25, for the instruction and clothing of ten poor boys and for placing them out in some trade.

KING'S SOMBORNE

Sumburne (xi cent.); Sombourne (xii cent.); Sumburn Album (xiii cent.); Kingsomborne, Sumbourne Regis (xiv cent.).

King's Somborne is a large parish covering an area of 6,813 acres, of which 47 acres are land covered by water. It lies on the main road from Stockbridge to Romsey, and is served by Horsebridge Station on the Andover and Redbridge branch of the London and South Western Railway. The ground is on the whole low-lying, the highest point being 351 ft. above the ordnance datum near the eastern boundary. Park Stream, a branch of the Test, flows through John of Gaunt's Deer Park<sup>1</sup> which is west of the village and contains the site of a long disused fish-pond (see infra). It was formerly known as How Park, possibly through the early connexion of William de Ow with the parish,<sup>2</sup> and had its origin in the charter of 1200 granting William Briwere the elder chase of hare, fox, cat and wolf through all the king's land (per totam terram nostram) and warren of hares, pheasants and partridges throughout all his own lands, as also licence to inclose two coppices, one of which was situated between King's Somborne and Stockbridge and the other was called How Wood.<sup>3</sup> William seems soon to have availed himself of the permission and to have obtained licence from the Prior and convent of St. Swithun, Winchester, to inclose a part of their march of Houghton so as to extend his park of How Wood.<sup>4</sup> His descendant Patrick de Chaworth obtained from Henry III an additional charter in 1252 giving him licence to inclose How Wood, which was within the bounds of the forest of Bere, and to convert it into a park<sup>5</sup> (see infra).

Throughout the 13th and 14th centuries the lords of the manor of King's Somborne carefully maintained their right to free warren and free chase in the park,<sup>6</sup> but in the middle of the 16th century there were no deer in the park, as the following description (1552) shows:—'There is a river through the park—the north side is a weare builded, the fyshing whereof is worth yerely 15s.<sup>7</sup> There be 100 couples of conyes. There be no dere in the park, for as much as it was destroyed and the pale broken at the time of the rebellion.<sup>8</sup> The Park is well sett with Oake of two hundred yeres growth and worthy to be letten if it were desparked.'<sup>9</sup> By 1591, however, the park was 'furnyshed with 215 dere . . . the pale being well repayed.'<sup>10</sup> The Commonwealth Commissioners made the following report in 1651<sup>11</sup>:—

'Somborne Parke, now disparked, abutted on east by Somborne Town Fields, on north by part of said fields and certain meadows and marshes, on west by Houghton River and a marsh

Cowleas and Marshes. Parcel of meadow or marshlands, lying within park, abutted on east by the warren or hill and on the west by Houghton River, 150 acres 1 rood 14 perches. £150.

The survey further refers to a 'game of conies,' and a lodge and coney warren, in the tenure of Richard Hopgood by lease from Richard Gifford.<sup>12</sup>

South of the church is the site of the manor-house, to which local tradition or pride assigns the name of John of Gaunt's Palace. It was thus described in 1591:—'The Seytuacon of the sayed Mansion and Mannor Place, beinge in a very wholesome and healthye ayre, a verey fayer and Annncyent House, with all necessarie and convenyent houses of offyces and mylls to the same in anne degree apperteyninge haveinge within the same suffycient wood fewell and alsoe tymber, with goode and sweete water fayer orchardes gardynes and Walles both fyt and convenyint, a Parke well furnyshed with deere and Connyes, and the Fyshinge of the Ryver there which yeldeth boeth Troote, Eles and other fyshe.'<sup>13</sup>

A mound in the churchyard has given rise to speculation as to its origin, but the suggestion is that it is an ancient archery butt. Near the church are the large well-organized schools, founded in 1842 by the Rev. Richard Dawes, D.D., vicar of King's Somborne.<sup>14</sup> In the south-east corner of the parish lies Painholt Wood, doubtless at one time part of the forest of West Bere. It was included in the manor of King's Somborne in 1258 and was in the possession of Patrick Chaworth,<sup>15</sup> whose descendant Henry Duke of Lancaster had free chase in Painholt in 1353.<sup>16</sup> However, when King's Somborne was granted in 1628 to Edward Ditchfield and others, Painholt Chase was expressly excepted.<sup>17</sup> It was granted in 1638 to Sir William Waller and his heirs in fee on surrender of a former grant of it made to Jerome Weston Earl of Portland and Lady Frances his wife.<sup>18</sup>

At the yearly hewing of timber in Painholt coppices, the time for which was announced in a general summons given 'on the Sabbath day' in King's Somborne Church, each copyholder and customary tenant of King's Somborne Manor had right to a portion of wood, in return for certain customary services and a nominal fee.<sup>19</sup> In 1619 when the site of the manor was leased out separately from Painholt strife arose between the tenants and Edward Skilling and Edmund Cooke, the farmers of Painholt, 'who soalde that unto strangers which did ought to belong unto the customary tenants.' The latter had been interrupted by the servants of Edward Skilling while taking their accustomed portions of wood in the felled coppice, and in a suit brought against them by Skilling they defended their rights and denied that they had taken any wood that did not belong to them by ancient custom, and that touching the lease which Skilling declared had been made to him of all the coppice wood they doubted if there was any such lease. The result of the suit does not appear, but it seems that the tenants were in the right, as they had performed the customary services to Skilling as farmer of Painholt. In Elizabeth's reign the woodwardship was claimed by Tristram Baker (Pistor), lord of Upper Eldon, 'who pretendeth tittle of inheritaunce thereunto, but shewith nothing to maintain his said clame other than the Execucon thereof.'<sup>20</sup>

The Roman road from Winchester to Old Sarum can still be traced in its course through the parish. Brook and Compton are respectively situated 2 miles and 1½ miles south-west of King's Somborne. Up Somborne is a hamlet lying 3 miles north-east.

South of King's Somborne is the ancient decayed parish of Upper Eldon,<sup>21</sup> which covers an area of only 295 acres. The old church of St. John the Baptist stands in the farmyard of the manor farm, which displays traces of 17th-century work.

The soil is clay, chalk and gravel with a subsoil of chalk, and the chief crops are wheat, barley and oats. There are approximately 4,100 acres of arable land in King's Somborne, 1,600 acres of permanent grass and 900 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>22</sup> The common fields were inclosed in accordance with an award of 1784.<sup>23</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey MANORS the manor of KING'S SOMBORNE was part of the ancient demesne of the Crown, and was, therefore, not assessed.<sup>28</sup> For some time it formed part of the revenues of the Crown, contributing yearly £36 6s. to the Royal Exchequer,<sup>29</sup> but was finally granted in 1190 to the well-known <sup>21</sup> Upper Eldon, originally a parish with a church dating from the 13th century, was by the beginning of the 19th century no longer counted as a parish, and does not appear in the return of 1831. In 1841, however, it appears as extra-parochial with three inhabited houses, in 1851 and 1861 as a parish with one (the manor) house (Pop. Ret.). It is now counted as a parish, but only contains this one inhabited house.

William Briwere the elder.<sup>30</sup> King John in 1200 confirmed the manor to him as 'Somborne Album' held for two knights' fees.<sup>31</sup> William Briwere died in 1226, leaving a son and heir William,<sup>32</sup> on whose death without issue in 1232 his estates were divided among his five sisters and co-heirs or their representatives.<sup>33</sup> In 1233 King's Somborne, which had been held by Joan widow of William since her husband's death,<sup>34</sup> was assigned to Margery de la Ferté sister of William and wife of William de la Ferté as part of her share of the inheritance.<sup>35</sup> Margery was succeeded in its possession by her only daughter and heir Gundred, apparently sometimes also called Agnes,<sup>36</sup> who married Pain de Chaworth and left a son and heir Patrick.<sup>37</sup> Patrick was returned by the Testa de Nevill as holding two knights' fees in King's Somborne of the old enfeoffment of the king in chief,<sup>38</sup> and died in 1257, leaving a son and heir Pain.<sup>39</sup> At his death in 1279 Pain was succeeded by his brother Patrick,<sup>40</sup> who died four years later, leaving as his heir his infant daughter Maud.<sup>41</sup> His estates passed to the Crown during the minority of Maud, and in August 1283 Edward I granted the manor to Queen Eleanor,<sup>42</sup> but a month later assigned it in dower to Isabel widow of Patrick.<sup>43</sup> Henry of Lancaster acquired the manor by marriage with Maud de Chaworth,<sup>44</sup> and in 1316 obtained a confirmation of the charter granting free warren in King's Somborne to William Briwere.<sup>45</sup> On his death in 1345 he was succeeded by his son and heir, Henry Earl of Lancaster,<sup>46</sup> who died in 1361, leaving two daughters and co-heirs: Maud wife of William Duke of Zealand, and Blanche wife of John of Gaunt Earl of Richmond.<sup>47</sup> King's Somborne was assigned to Maud,<sup>48</sup> but on her death without issue in 1362

On his death in 1398–9<sup>50</sup> King's Somborne, which had been settled upon him and his wife Blanche in fee-tail in 1366–7,<sup>51</sup> passed to his son Henry of Bolingbroke Duke of Hereford, who became Henry IV of England in 1399, and whose possessions merged in the Crown.<sup>52</sup> In 1628 Charles I granted King's Somborne to Edward Ditchfield, John Heighlord, Humphrey Clarke and Francis Mosse as trustees for the Corporation of London.<sup>52a</sup> The grantees sold the manor in 1634 to Richard Gifford,<sup>53</sup> from whom it passed, probably by sale, to Francis Rivett of King's Somborne.<sup>54</sup> His daughter and co-heir Margery brought the manor in marriage to Oliver St. John of Farley Chamberlayne.<sup>55</sup> Oliver died in 1665, leaving a son and heir Oliver, who was followed on his death in 1689 by his son Oliver, who, dying childless, left his sister Frances sole heir.<sup>56</sup> On 6 December 1699 she married her first cousin Ellis Mews, who took the surname of St. John by Act of Parliament. Frances died without children in 1700, and Ellis St. John married again, and was followed on his death in 1728–9 by Sir Paulet St. John, first baronet, his eldest son by his second marriage.<sup>57</sup> He died in 1780, and King's Somborne successively passed to his son Sir Henry Paulet St. John and his grandson of the same name, who, however, took the additional surname of Mildmay on his marriage with Jane Mildmay,<sup>58</sup> eldest daughter and co-heir of Carew Mildmay of Shawford House, in Twyford parish (q.v.).<sup>59</sup> King's Somborne passed to their third son Paulet St. John-Mildmay,<sup>60</sup> and continued in the

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

St. John-Mildmay family until the middle of the 19th century, when the manor with lands in King's Somborne was purchased by the Rev. Thomas Fielder Woodham partly in 1846 and partly in 1860, and the manor was held by him until his death in 1907.<sup>61</sup> The Rev. William Woodham, B.A., rector of Farley Chamberlayne, is the present lord of the manor.

The site of the manor was leased to Robert Roo in 1485<sup>62</sup> and to John Dawtre in 1498.<sup>63</sup> It was granted in 1537 for a term of years to Richard Gifford.<sup>64</sup> He by will left the remainder of the term to his son Henry,<sup>65</sup> who obtained a further seventy years' lease from Queen Elizabeth in 1588.<sup>66</sup> William son of Henry Gifford<sup>67</sup> was farmer of the manor in 1592-3.<sup>68</sup> He died in 1597 and was succeeded by his brother Richard.<sup>69</sup> In 1649 Robert Wallop, who had acquired the remainder of the lease,<sup>70</sup> and who must have obtained a grant of the reversion remaining in the Crown, sold the site of the manor and the capital messuage and the demesne lands to Francis Rivett.<sup>71</sup> The property passed by marriage with his daughter and co-heir to William Strode of Street<sup>72</sup> (co. Somers.), who left as his heir his daughter Elizabeth the wife of John Osborn, afterwards Sir John Osborn, bart., of Chicksands<sup>73</sup> (co. Beds.). Sir John Osborn dealt with the site of the manor by recovery in 1704,<sup>74</sup> and on his death in 1720 was succeeded by his grandson, Sir Danvers Osborn, bart.,<sup>75</sup> who sold the mansion house to Francis Wells in 1737.<sup>76</sup> It passed subsequently to the St. John-Mildmay family, then lords of the manor of King's Somborne. Sir Henry Bouverie Paulet St. John-Mildmay, fifth bart., sold it in 1860 to the Rev. Thomas Fielder Woodham. From him it has descended to the present owner, Mr. Edmund Woodham, son of Mr. Thomas Burnett Woodham, of Furze Down.<sup>77</sup>

In 1537 the park, which, together with the manor, had become a Crown possession in 1399, was granted to Richard Gifford for a term of years,<sup>78</sup> and his son Henry obtained a further lease of seventy years in 1588.<sup>79</sup> In 1639 Charles I granted a thirty-one years' lease beginning from 1658 with licence to dispark to John Howston, who transferred his interest to Richard Gifford in 1642.<sup>80</sup> In 1651 Robert Wallop, to whom 'the interest of the said Henry Gifford and the interest of John Howston' was stated 'to have come by mean conveyance,' petitioned the Parliamentary Committee to allow him an interest in the premises, asserting that he 'only failed to produce his evidences because he had been plundered.' A thirty-one years' lease in reversion was granted by Charles II in 1663 to Mary widow of Thomas Blagge, groom of the bed-chamber,<sup>81</sup> and short leases were granted successively in 1708, 1730, 1738 to Thomas Ellis, Thomas Bennett and John Gatehouse.<sup>82</sup> The park is at the present day in the possession of Mr. E. Woodham, son of Mr. Thomas Burnett Woodham, being part of the property purchased in 1860 by the Rev. Thomas Fielder Woodham from the St. John-Mildmay family.<sup>83</sup>

There were three mills in the manor of King's Somborne at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>84</sup> but only one water-mill is included in an extent of the manor taken in 1361.<sup>85</sup> In 1412 the king, then lord of the manor, leased How Mill or Horsebridge Mill as it was called, to John Dawtre for thirty-one years.<sup>86</sup> In 1530-1 the king's mill had fallen into a state of decay and very little corn was ground there. Thus orders were given that it should be repaired.<sup>87</sup> It was leased to Richard Gifford in 1537,<sup>88</sup> and passed with the site of the manor to Robert Wallop,<sup>89</sup> who sold it with the adjoining meadows to Francis Rivett, of King's Somborne, in 1652.<sup>90</sup> In 1812 the lord of the manor, Paulet St. John-Mildmay, owned a water-mill in King's Somborne.<sup>91</sup> The mill still exists as Horsebridge Mill.

The soc of two hundreds belonged to the royal manor in 1086,<sup>92</sup> together with sac, soc, toll, theam and infangenthef.<sup>93</sup>

In 1200, when John confirmed the manor of King's Somborne to William Briwere, one of the appurtenances thereof was a fish-pond,<sup>94</sup> the site of which is still to be seen within the boundary of the park. In 1257-8 a fishery called the Park Fishery was included in the extent of the manor.<sup>95</sup> In 1652 Robert Wallop sold the fishery of waters from Horsebridge eastward to Francis Rivett, who at the same time purchased Horsebridge Mill.<sup>96</sup> The right of fishing in the waters of Park Stream above Horsebridge Mill is at present exercised by the owner of the mill.<sup>97</sup>

Among the other appurtenances of the manor were two osier beds which William Briwere obtained permission from Richard I to assart and cultivate in 1199.<sup>98</sup> King John in 1204 and again in 1214 confirmed William Briwere in possession of 60 acres of assart in King's Somborne which had formerly been an osier bed.<sup>99</sup>

The Prior and convent of Mottisfont also had a small manor in KING'S SOMBORNE, which owed its origin to a charter of William Briwere the elder in the reign of King John granting them the tenth part of all his assarts in King's Somborne, the tithes from his assarts in King's Somborne and assize of bread and ale in the parish.<sup>100</sup> In 1291 the property of the prior and convent in the parish was assessed at £2 10s.,<sup>101</sup> while in 1344, at the request of Henry of Lancaster, lord of the chief manor, they obtained licence to acquire additional lands and tenements in King's Somborne to the annual value of £10.<sup>102</sup> At the dissolution of the priory, in 1536, the manor of King's Somborne was granted to William Lord Sandys,<sup>103</sup> and followed henceforward the descent of Longstock Harrington (q.v.),<sup>104</sup> the present owner being Mrs. Vaudrey Barker-Mill.

Dependent upon the manor of King's Somborne was the manor of MARSH COURT (Mershcourt, xiv cent.; Merscourt, xv cent.), which was held by Edmund Marsh (de Marisco) of William Briwere the elder in the reign of Richard I.<sup>105</sup> It was sold by his descendant Nicholas Marsh to John de Weston and Margaret his wife in 1311,<sup>106</sup> and from the latter descended to Thomas de Weston, upon whom it was settled in 1325.<sup>107</sup> Sir Thomas de Weston died seised of the manor in 1354, leaving as his heirs his daughters Eleanor and Isabel and his granddaughters Eleanor and Isabel, daughters of his deceased daughter Margaret wife of John Louvaine.<sup>108</sup> One moiety was assigned to the elder daughter Eleanor, who married Sir William Bouchier and died in 1397, leaving a son and heir William.<sup>109</sup> What became of the other moiety at this date is uncertain, but it eventually passed to Thomas Bruyn, who in 1394 granted the reversion of it after the death of Robert Cholmele, who was holding for life, to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont.<sup>110</sup> The whole manor described as the 'manor of Marsh Court with appurtenances in King's Somborne and the Street next Stockbridge which Sir William Bouchier and the Prior of Mottisfont lately held there separately' was conveyed by John Hall and other trustees to John Roger of Bryanston (co. Dors.) and John Roger his son in 1422.<sup>111</sup> From this date Marsh Court continued in the Roger family<sup>112</sup> until 1544, in which year Sir John Roger sold it to William

Hants),<sup>119</sup> who with his wife Hester dealt with it by recovery in 1763.<sup>120</sup> Their son and heir John was created a baronet in 1795 and died in 1814. His son and heir Sir John Walter Pollen, bart.,<sup>121</sup> sold Marsh Court in 1815 to James Edwards of Compton Monceux and Appleshaw (co. Hants), who left it by will to Henry Edwards of Winchester, whose trustees sold it about 1882 to Dr. Wickham of Winchester.<sup>122</sup> The present owner of Marsh Court, Mr. Herbert Johnson, purchased it in 1892 from Dr. Wickham. The house, built of chalk, was finished in 1905.<sup>123</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

William Briwere the elder in the reign of Richard I granted to the Prior and convent of St. Denis, Southampton, a rent of 20s. paid to him by Edmund Marsh for a mill and a meadow called Brodesmede at Marsh. The prior and convent apparently had some difficulty in maintaining their right to this rent, for they are found suing for payment from Nicholas Marsh in 1301 and from Thomas de Weston in 1333.<sup>125</sup>

The manor of UPPER SOMBORNE (Opsumburna, Ossumburna, xii cent.; Hupsumburne, xiii cent.; Upsombourne, xiv cent.) is possibly represented by the estate of 7½ hides in Somborne which William de Ow was holding of the king in 1086. It was assessed at 14 hides in the Confessor's reign and was then held by Tol the Dane.<sup>126</sup> By the beginning of the 13th century the overlordship both of this estate and of Silchester, which had likewise belonged to William de Ow,<sup>127</sup> had passed to William Marshal Earl of Pembroke, Marshal of England.<sup>128</sup> The earl died in 1219,<sup>129</sup> and twenty-six years later, after the death without issue of his youngest son Anselm, the manor of Hampstead Marshall (co. Berks.), of which Upper Somborne was afterwards held,<sup>130</sup> was assigned to his eldest daughter Maud widow of Hugh le Bigod Earl of Norfolk.<sup>131</sup> Roger son and heir of Hugh died without issue, and his estates fell to his nephew Roger,<sup>132</sup> who died seised of the third part of a knight's fee in Upper Somborne in 1306, leaving his brother John his heir.<sup>133</sup> All his possessions, however, passed to Edward I in accordance with a settlement of 1302, and thus the manor of Upper Somborne came to be held directly of the Crown.<sup>134</sup>

In 1167 the manor itself was held by Robert (Talemache) and the Bishop of Winchester,<sup>135</sup> and at the beginning of the 13th century by William Talemache for half a knight's fee.<sup>136</sup> From this date it continued in the Talemache family for nearly two centuries. Robert Talemache was the lord of the manor in 1316,<sup>137</sup> and in accordance with a settlement it passed on his death to his widow Juliane, who was still holding in 1346.<sup>138</sup> Juliane was succeeded by her son and heir John Talemache,<sup>139</sup> who vested the manor of Upper Somborne in trustees in 1364,<sup>140</sup> and died in 1376, leaving as his heir his niece Christine wife of Robert Beches-fonte.<sup>141</sup> Nine years later Christine and Robert sold the manor to the Prior and convent of St. Swithun, Winchester,<sup>142</sup> with whom it remained until the Dissolution.<sup>143</sup> In 1541 it was granted to the Dean and Chapter of Winchester,<sup>144</sup> who held it until 1650, when in accordance with the Act of Parliament for the sale of the dean and chapter lands it was sold to William Harward.<sup>145</sup> It was restored, however, to the Cathedral Church at the Restoration.<sup>146</sup> No manorial courts are now held, but the site of the manor is probably marked by a farm called Manor Farm. This with the greater part of the hamlet belongs to Mrs. Scott of Pitstone, Tring

(co. Herts.), while the other part belongs to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to whom it was transferred in the usual way by the Dean and Chapter of Winchester.<sup>147</sup>

Hugh le Despenser had a rent of £10 13s 4d. from lands in Upper Somborne, which escheated to the Crown on his forfeiture in 1326.<sup>148</sup> Edward I granted it to John de Chalcombe and Cicely his wife for life in 1327,<sup>149</sup> and three years later to John Maltravers, steward of the household.<sup>150</sup> In 1332 it was included in the grant of the manor of Ashley to Hugh le Despenser, grandson of Hugh le Despenser.<sup>151</sup>

At the beginning of the 14th century the land which was burdened by this rent was held by Philip Aubyn and Alice his wife for the life of Alice of the inheritance of Robert Gereberd,<sup>152</sup> who in 1316 granted the reversion to Richard son of Richard de Sutton.<sup>153</sup> In 1389 John son of Alan Sutton grandson of Richard claimed the estate from Henry Yaxley,<sup>154</sup> to whom Elizabeth le Despenser had granted the custody of the manor of Ashley during the minority of Thomas le Despenser in 1377.<sup>155</sup> He made good his claim, and in the following year in return for 100 marks gave up his right to it to Henry Yaxley.<sup>156</sup> From this date this land follows the same descent as the manor of Ashley (q.v.).

UPSOMBORNE KAUMES (Hupsonburn Kaumes, xiii cent.).—In 1216–17 Joan wife of Ingram Brus and niece of Richard Briwere claimed a free tenement in King's Somborne, from which she had been ejected by Alice wife of John Eppelton. Joan had succeeded to the tenement on the death of Galiena wife of Richard Briwere, and she recovered seisin.<sup>157</sup> In 1236 a messuage and land in King's Somborne were released to Robert Brus,<sup>158</sup> who in 1252 obtained a grant of free warren in his demesne lands there,<sup>159</sup> and died in 1276 seised of the manor of Upsomborne Kaumes, leaving a son and heir John.<sup>160</sup> At present the further history of this manor cannot be traced.

The manor of COMPTON MONCEUX (Cumtune, xi cent.; Cump-ton, xii cent.; Compton Monceus, xiv cent.; Compton Broke, xv cent.; Compton Mountseux alias Munday on the Hill, xvi cent.; Compton Moncieux, xvii cent.; Compton Mountreux, xviii cent. alias BROOK) was held in 1086 by William the Archer, and had been held in the time of King Edward the Confessor by five thegns.<sup>161</sup> It was subsequently held of the king in chief by the serjeanty of being the king's marshal.<sup>162</sup> Who the immediate successor of William the Archer was is uncertain, but in 1195 William Fitz Aldelin, the king's marshal, was lord of Compton,<sup>163</sup> and it is probable that this manor was granted to him by Henry II on the occasion of his marriage with Juliane daughter of Robert Dorsnelli.<sup>164</sup> Juliane survived her husband and died seised of the manors of Sherfield upon Loddon and Compton c. 1199, leaving as her heirs William Warblington and Ingram Monceux,<sup>165</sup> possibly her grandsons.<sup>166</sup> In 1199 William and Ingram gave the king 500 marks for licence to succeed to their inheritance,<sup>167</sup> but within the next few years Ingram died, and William taking advantage of this paid a further sum of 400 marks for permission to take possession of all the property of which Juliane had been seised.<sup>168</sup> However, Waleran Monceux, probably brother and heir of Ingram, put forward his claim, and in 1205 paid 100 marks to have his share of the inheritance.<sup>169</sup> A partition of the property was made, Sherfield upon Loddon (q.v.) falling to the share of William and Compton to Waleran,<sup>170</sup> and from later documents it seems clear that Compton was burdened by a rent of £10 to William Warblington and his successors and suit at their manor of Sherfield upon Loddon.<sup>171</sup> Waleran died before 1217, in which year his son and heir William had such seisin of his lands granted to him by the sheriff of Hampshire 'as he had on the day that he receded from the fealty and service of King John.'<sup>172</sup> This William died in 1243 and was followed by his son Waleran,<sup>173</sup> who took part in the barons' war on the side of Simon de Montfort against Henry III.<sup>174</sup> On the death of Waleran the manor passed to his son John,<sup>175</sup> who died in 1301, leaving a son and heir John.<sup>176</sup> This John in 1303 settled the manor in default of his own issue on his brother Waleran in fee-tail, with contingent remainder to his sister Margaret,<sup>177</sup> and died in 1316, when all his possessions passed to his son and namesake.<sup>178</sup> John Monceux died young without issue, and his sister Maud, who inherited his estates, carried them into the family of Fiennes by her marriage with Sir John de Fiennes.<sup>179</sup> In 1331 the manor was granted by Sir John de Fiennes and Maud his wife to Maud Ferrers for life,<sup>180</sup> and was held by her until her death in 1336, when it reverted to Sir John de Fiennes,<sup>181</sup> who died in 1351.<sup>182</sup> William de Fiennes succeeded his father and died seised of the manor eight years later, leaving an infant son and heir John.<sup>183</sup> One-third of the manor was assigned in dower to Joan widow of William in 1360,<sup>184</sup> while the other two-thirds were granted by Edward III in 1370 to Walter Haywode, to hold during the minority of John at a rent of 12 marks.<sup>185</sup> John died, however, in 1375 before he attained his majority, his heir to his estates being his brother William, who came of age in 1378.<sup>186</sup> On the death of Sir William Fiennes in 1405 Compton Monceux passed to his son Sir Roger Fiennes, who died between 1444 and 1455,<sup>187</sup> and was succeeded by his son Sir Richard Fiennes,<sup>188</sup> who married Joan the granddaughter and heir of Thomas Lord Dacre of Gillesland, and was in her right summoned to Parliament and declared Lord Dacre in 1458.<sup>189</sup> The manor remained in the possession of successive Lords Dacre<sup>190</sup> until 1574, when it was sold by Gregory Fiennes Lord Dacre to William Waller.<sup>191</sup> The latter held the manor until his death in 1616, leaving two daughters and heirs, Susan wife of Sir Richard Tichborne, and Charity wife of Thomas Phelipps.<sup>192</sup> In accordance with a settlement dated Easter 1608 Compton Monceux passed to Sir Richard Tichborne and Susan,<sup>193</sup> and from them to their only son Sir Henry Tichborne, bart.<sup>194</sup> The latter died in 1689, leaving a son and heir Sir Henry Joseph Tichborne, bart.<sup>195</sup> who conveyed the manor about 1715 to Sir Thomas Pengelly of Cheshunt (co. Herts.), baron of the Exchequer.<sup>196</sup> By his will dated 1727 Sir Thomas left Compton Monceux to Charles Harold, John Briscoe and John Webb.<sup>197</sup> Charles Harold's third passed under his will to Samuel Reynardson and Sarah his wife,<sup>198</sup> who sold it in 1747 to John Gatehouse.<sup>199</sup> Seven years later John Webb sold his third to John Gatehouse,<sup>200</sup> from whom the two-thirds descended to his son and heir Thomas Gatehouse.<sup>201</sup> John Briscoe, the owner of the remaining third, died in 1766, leaving his estates in Compton to Henry Earl of Sussex and Viscount de Longueville for life, with remainder to Frances Skegnes and Margaret Arnold, the daughters of Grey Longueville of Shillington (co. Beds.).<sup>202</sup> Frances Skegnes had an only daughter Frances, who married James Elliott and died leaving two daughters and co-heirs, Jane afterwards Jane Ogrum and Bridget Frances wife of George Antt.<sup>203</sup> In 1774 George Antt and his wife conveyed their twelfth to Thomas Gatehouse,<sup>204</sup> who thus acquired three-quarters of the original estate and who was occupying Compton House in 1778.<sup>205</sup> He apparently died without issue, leaving two sisters and co-heirs, Ruth wife of John Butcher, and Sarah, who, dying unmarried, left her share in the property to her niece Catherine Butcher.<sup>206</sup> The latter married James Edwards of Horsebridge, to whom Grey Arnold, son of Thomas Arnold, heir at law of Margaret Arnold, conveyed his sixth in 1802.<sup>207</sup> Jane Ogrum's sixth descended at her death to her daughter, Frances Bridget Howson,<sup>208</sup> who conveyed it in 1816 to her aunt, Bridget Frances Antt, for life with reversion to her nieces, Bridget Frances Antt and Jane Longueville Antt.<sup>209</sup> Two years later it passed by purchase to James Edwards,<sup>210</sup> who thus reunited all the Compton Monceux property. At his death in 1841 he left Compton Monceux to Thomas Henry Edwards, who died in 1866, leaving it by will to Montague William Edwards and Reginald Henry Edwards. From them it passed by purchase in 1892 to John Spiller, who sold it in 1898 to Mr. George Whiteley.<sup>211</sup> It was purchased in March 1905 from Mr. Whiteley by the present lord of the manor, Mr. George Hennessy.<sup>212</sup> The house, which stands in well-wooded grounds of about 100 acres, was built by Thomas Henry Edwards in 1855.

A mill worth 20s. belonged to the manor of Compton Monceux in 1086,<sup>213</sup> but apparently soon fell into disuse. A free fishery is mentioned in a fine of 1747.<sup>214</sup>

In 1227 the Prior and convent of Mottisfont acquired a hide of land in COMPTON and Timsbury from Walter de Langford, who had claimed it on the ground that it belonged to his serjeanty of West Tytherley, which he held of the king in chief.<sup>215</sup> Additional lands in Compton were acquired by the canons in 1301.<sup>216</sup> These lands probably became amalgamated with their manor of King's Somborne (q.v.), which Henry VIII granted in 1536 to William Lord Sandys.<sup>217</sup>

In the middle of the 13th century Ralph Payn was holding half a knight's fee in King's Somborne of the old enfeoffment of Lady Joan Briwere, who held of Patrick de Chaworth.<sup>218</sup> This tenement formed the nucleus of the estate afterwards called PAUNCE-FOOT COURT or PAYN'S FARM. In 1313 Nicholas de Braishfield and Emma his wife granted one messuage and 1 carucate of land in King's Somborne to Andrew Payn, a descendant of Ralph,<sup>219</sup> and twenty-two years later Andrew acquired the reversion of another messuage and carucate of land in the parish from Agatha daughter of Ralph Baker (Pistor) of King's Somborne and her son Robert,<sup>220</sup> who had acquired them from John Hubbard of King's Somborne in 1324.<sup>221</sup> Andrew Payn was still alive and in possession of his estate at King's Somborne in 1361, as is shown from the partition of the knights' fees of Henry Duke of Lancaster in that year.<sup>222</sup> He was succeeded by Thomas Pauncefoot, who acquired additional lands in the parish from Richard Quintin and gave the name of Pauncefoot Court to his estate.<sup>223</sup> The property was subsequently purchased by William Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester, and by him granted to Magdalen College, Oxford.<sup>224</sup> The President and fellows of the college remained in possession until 1905,<sup>225</sup> when they sold all their property in the parish to the present owner, Mr. Herbert Johnson of Marsh Court.<sup>226</sup>

holt, King's Somborne and Stockbridge.<sup>227</sup> Their holding in King's Somborne apparently followed the same descent as their estates in Sparsholt and Stockbridge which were called Fromond's Court and Marsh Court respectively. In 1509 John Skilling was holding a messuage and carucate of land in King's Somborne formerly belonging to John Fromond,<sup>228</sup> and in Elizabeth's reign William Skilling was returned as the owner of a messuage and land in King's Somborne called 'Fromonds.'<sup>229</sup> The site is marked by the present Froman's Farm.

Land in Somborne worth £3 was granted with the land in Barton Stacey worth £47 to Rogo de Sacy by King John in 1199.<sup>230</sup> This land followed the same descent as the manor of Barton Stacey (q.v.).<sup>231</sup>

The manor of UPPER ELDON (Elledena, xii cent.; Elleden, Ellesden, xiii cent.; Overelden, Upulden, xv cent.; Upp Eldon, xvi cent.) is not mentioned in the Domesday Survey by name. It was at that date probably included in the manor of King's Somborne, since it is found among the knights' fees of which William Briwere the younger died seised in 1226. On the partition of his knights' fees it was assigned with the manor of Ashley (q.v.) to William Percy,<sup>232</sup> and it continued to be held of that manor till as late at least as 1486.<sup>233</sup>

Nothing more is known of the William who was holding the manor in fee in 1167.<sup>234</sup> Alice Musard, who in 1226 was holding the fourth part of a knight's fee in Eldon of the heirs of William Briwere,<sup>235</sup> was succeeded in its possession by William Musard, who about 1290 gave 3s. rent in Eldon to the canons of St. Denis, Southampton, on condition that they kept a wax taper burning before the Lady altar of their conventual church, where his wife Isabel was buried.<sup>236</sup> He was still holding the manor in 1291, in which year Edward I gave orders that his wood of Eldon, which was within the bounds of the forest of West Bere and which had been taken into the king's hands for waste, should be replevied to him until the coming of the justices for pleas of the forest.<sup>237</sup> However, he was soon succeeded by John Chippe, who as lord of the manor presented to the church before 1304.<sup>238</sup> Roger Woodlock was the lord of the manor in 1316,<sup>239</sup> when he settled it on himself and his wife Joan.<sup>240</sup> In 1346 Laurence de Bramshott was holding the fourth part of a knight's fee in Eldon, which had belonged to John Chippe.<sup>241</sup> From Laurence it passed to William Croude, citizen and clothier of London, who dealt with it by fine in 1351,<sup>242</sup> but conveyed it seven years later to John the manor passed to his son and heir Robert,<sup>251</sup> who dealt with it by fine in 1569,<sup>252</sup> and was followed by his son and heir Tristram.<sup>253</sup> Tristram was impleaded in 1576-7 by Henry Gifford, farmer, of King's Somborne, for inclosing a pond on the boundary of Upper Eldon,<sup>254</sup> and for surcharging the common fields of King's Somborne and impounding his sheep.<sup>255</sup> His son and heir Tristram<sup>256</sup> died in 1602, leaving a son and heir William, aged twenty-two, and a daughter Joan, who had married Roger Hyde of Romsey.<sup>257</sup> William had apparently died without issue before 1641, in which year Roger Hyde, with his son Pistor (Baker) Hyde and his wife Katherine, dealt with the manor of Upper Eldon by fine.<sup>258</sup> The manor passed soon afterwards to Sir John Cloberry of Winchester and Bradstone (co. Devon), who presented to the church in 1679<sup>259</sup> and died in 1687, leaving four daughters and co-heirs: Anne wife of Sir Charles Holte, bart., Catherine wife of William Bromley, Susanna wife of Sir Thomas Trollope, bart., and Mary wife of Sir John Noel, bart.<sup>260</sup> In 1700 Sir Thomas Trollope, bart., and Susanna leased their share of the manor to Anthony Collins and John Trollope for a term of years, to commence after the death of Lady Cloberry, widow of Sir John,<sup>261</sup> and twelve years later the manor was conveyed by William Bromley, Sir Charles Holte, bart., and his wife, Sir Thomas Trollope, bart., and his wife, and Mary Noel, widow, to Joseph Hill.<sup>262</sup> The manor next passed to James Hussey, who presented to the church in 1740,<sup>263</sup> and from this date the manor and advowson remained in the possession of the Hussey family<sup>264</sup> until 1907, when Mr. A. ## A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Baker (Pistor) of Horsebridge and Margery his wife.<sup>243</sup> From John the manor descended to Robert Baker, who presented to the church in 1371,<sup>244</sup> and from him passed to William Baker, the patron of the living in 1397-8.<sup>245</sup> Walter Baker, who as lord of the manor presented to the church in 1403-4,<sup>246</sup> was succeeded by Robert Baker, the owner, in 1428.<sup>247</sup> The latter granted a thirteen years' lease of the site of the manor to William Mody in 1462,<sup>248</sup> and was followed by Edmund Baker, son of Nicholas, who died seised of the manor of Upper Eldon in 1485, leaving a son and heir William.<sup>249</sup> From William, who died in 1527,<sup>250</sup>

The manor of LOWER or NETHER ELDON was the property of the Prior and convent of Mottisfont and was assessed at £2 in 1291.<sup>266</sup> The prior and convent had further grants of land there in 1301,<sup>267</sup> 1310<sup>268</sup> and 1392,<sup>269</sup> and held the manor until the Dissolution, when it was granted with the manor of Somborne to William Lord Sandys.<sup>270</sup> From that date it followed for a time the same descent as that manor.<sup>271</sup> It was owned by the Husseys of Upper Eldon in the 18th century,<sup>272</sup> and is now the property of Mr. George Hennessy.

The church of ST. PETER and CHURCHES ST. PAUL, KING'S SOMBORNE, consists of a chancel 35 ft. 6 in. by 16 ft. 8 in., nave 54 ft. 6 in. by 16 ft., north and its south wall, and slightly widened northwards, becoming out of centre with the nave, while the 13th-century chancel arch remained central as before. The date of the addition of the north aisle is uncertain, for the arcade is now all modern, and the illustrations of the interior previous to its restoration show an arcade of two irregular bays and of uncertain date.

Such old work as remains in it points to the 14th century, and it seems that at this time both aisles were extended eastwards to form chapels flanking the chancel, the arches to the chancel being pierced at the same time.

The building was extensively restored in 1886, the chancel arch, north arcade, part of the south arcade and nearly all the west end of the nave belonging to this date. The east window of the south aisles 9 ft. 6 in. and 7 ft. 10 in. wide respectively, continued eastwards to form chapels, large western bell turret and north porch. The present nave appears to represent the nave of a 12th-century church, which at that date had a small chancel. In the 13th century a south aisle was added, and the chancel may then have been rebuilt outside the lines of the older chancel. In the second quarter of the 14th century it seems to have been again rebuilt with the exception of the west part of chancel dates from c. 1330 and consists of three trefoiled lights with net tracery; the jambs and mullions have sunk chamfers. Below the window is a square-headed recess formerly fitted with a shelf and a door, and on either side are plain corbels for images.

In the north wall is a restored trefoiled light and a square-headed window with two trefoiled lights, both of 14th-century date, and at the west is a depressed arch of two chamfered orders dying into the jamb, opening to the north chapel. The south wall of the chancel has an identical arrangement of windows and arch, and between the windows a pointed doorway, with continuous chamfers. Above, a small corbel head has been inserted. The west end of the south wall is not quite in line with the rest, and contains two stones which seem to be those of the west jamb of a window destroyed by the insertion of the two-light 14th-century window. The exterior of the chancel has been much repaired, pieces of ashlar inserted and some courses of brick added to the top, but the diagonal buttresses at the east end are old.

The arch and north capital of the chancel arch date from 1886, and before that date only its responds and capitals were in existence, the arch having been destroyed. The old work is of the 13th century, with rounded responds less than a semicircle in plan, and simply moulded capital. The north arcade consists of three bays in 13th-century style, with round piers and capitals; west of this is a section of walling with responds and a fourth arch carrying the north wall of the tower. The work is entirely modern. The south arcade has similar bays and spacing, but the first complete bay and the arch of the second are old, dating from c. 1240. The bell turret has masonry walls only on the north and south rising from above the last bay of the arcades on each side. The west window is similar to the east window but modern; the chamfered rear arch is old and is carried on corbels, the southern one being apparently original. There is a modern west door. The east end of the north aisle forms a chapel, and has a three-light square-headed window of that date with two fragments of old glass. In the north-east corner are the remains of a projecting image niche with embattled top. The north wall has four small square-headed windows of two trefoiled lights. These seem first to have been built of clunch, probably late in the 15th century, and afterwards repaired or rebuilt in other stone. The north door is rebuilt with old materials, and on two of its stones are incised ornamental crosses and the inscriptions IHS XPS in sunk lettering, perhaps meant to be inlaid in colour. The stones have unfortunately been reset upside down. The porch with the external doorway is modern and has two single lights.

West of this in a screened vestry is a modern two-light window, and on the west wall of the aisle one of three lights. The south aisle has a three-light 14th-century east window like that on the north; in the south wall are six small windows, three being modern, while one seems to be inserted in the blocking of an old doorway. The bonding stones of destroyed buttresses show in the wall. All the windows are of two trefoiled lights. The west window is a modern one of three lights, and opens to a vestry at the west end of the aisle, the east partition of which is 17th-century woodwork. On one of the south windows are two incised sundials. The chancel roof is modern, but the nave has three moulded tie-beams of Jacobean date, with dentil ornament and pendants.

The roof of the north aisle has old struts and wind braces, but that at the south aisle is modern. Externally the roofs are tiled in one span over nave and aisles, and the turret has a pyramidal wood spire. Altar rails of late 17th-century date, with balusters alternately spiral and fluted, are now set at the west end of the chancel, and their proper place taken by wretched cast-iron standards with a brass rail. The font at the west end of the nave is of Purbeck marble, octagonal with pairs of shallow pointed arches on each face, and stands on a circular stem and eight smaller shafts. These latter are modern, but the rest, with the plain round base stone, is of late 12th-century date.

In the north wall of the chancel is a 14th-century tomb recess with an ogee moulded and septfoiled head. The tomb slab bears in low relief the headless figure of a priest in mass vestments under a cinquefoiled canopy flanked by two figures of censing angels. Round the edge of the slab, in Gothic capitals, runs an inscription: 'Willam de Brestowe gist ici dev de sa alme eyt merci.'

On the chancel floor is a slab with two small brasses of civilians of early 15th-century date. Both wear long gowns, and cloaks fastened by a buckle on the right shoulder and draped across the body. Each carries a dagger on a narrow waistbelt, and the faces seem meant for portraits. One wears a beard, and is clearly younger than his clean-shaved companion. The drawing of the drapery is exceedingly good.

In the vestry are preserved several photographs of the church previous to its restoration in 1886.

The bell turret contains five bells. The treble is dated 1686, bears the churchwardens' and vicar's names, the inscription 'Give eade unto the Lord,' and was cast by William Knight. The second is inscribed, in Lombardic capitals, 'Ac campana sanctificata in honore Marie.' The third is blank, but probably of 18th-century date, and the fourth and fifth are modern.

The plate consists of a pair of silver chalices of 1801, a paten ewer of 1624, a paten of 1700 and a plated flagon.

The first book of the registers contains all entries from 1672 to 1796 except marriages, which cease in 1754 and are continued in three printed books from 1754 to 1766, from 1767 to 1797 and from 1797 to 1812. Baptisms and burials are continued in two separate books, both from 1797 to 1812, and printed on parchment in forms having reference to the threepenny stamp duty of 1783 but without the stamps themselves.

The church of ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, UPPER ELDON,<sup>273</sup> is a small rectangular structure 32 ft. by 16 ft. 8 in., forming a nave and chancel in one range. The whole building dates from the beginning of the 13th century or the end of the 12th. The east wall has been rebuilt in brick, probably at the beginning of the 19th century, and the roof is not the original one, though, since it is quite plain, it is impossible to say when the reroofing occurred. Some of the windows have been blocked up and the only door has been almost completely defaced, otherwise the structure remains much as it must have been when first built.

The east window is a pointed one of brick, and is set in the brick east wall. The rear arch is clumsily worked with a roll in cement in imitation of the earlier windows. The latter are all of the same detail and appear to have been six in number, three on either side. The pair to the east are a trifle higher than the others, but only one of these, on the north, remains complete, the easternmost on that side being blocked up and only traces remaining of the two easternmost on the other side. The heads are not quite true semicircles, while the rear arches have distinct points. The splays are wide, and, with the rear arches, have continuous roll moulds. Externally the windows are rebated for glazing frames, chamfered and roll moulded. In the west wall is a window identical with these. The door on the south has a wooden lintel, and the jambs are patched with brick, and what stone remains is devoid of detail. At the level of the sills externally is a slightly undercut roll moulding which runs round three sides of the building. At the north and south-west there remain two of the original buttresses which are offset and finished under the string course. The other buttresses have been replaced in brick. In the east wall is a stone in which is cut a small sunk circle, with a roll moulded rim, about  $7\frac{3}{4}$  in. in diameter. Small holes in the centre and each arm and traces of colour show this to have inclosed a metal consecration cross on a coloured background. Outside the circle, and a couple of inches to one side of it, is a circular hole half an inch in diameter. On the north wall are two similar stones, and there is a fourth on the external south-west angle. The roof is of steep pitch and carried on primitive queen-post trusses. The timbers are plain and squared.

There were two churches in ADVOWSONS King's Somborne Manor in 1086.<sup>274</sup>

One was King's Somborne Church, the other was perhaps the church at Upper Eldon. The advowson of the church of King's Somborne was included in the grant of the manor to William Briwere the elder,<sup>275</sup> and was by him granted to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont.<sup>276</sup> Some time before 1240 the church was appropriated to the canons,<sup>277</sup> who presented the vicars until the Dissolution.<sup>278</sup> The rectory and advowson of the vicarage were granted in 1536 to William Lord Sandys,<sup>279</sup> and have since followed the descent of the manor of Longstock Harrington (q.v.),<sup>280</sup> the patron at the present day being Mrs. Vaudrey Barker-Mill.

The living of Upper Eldon is a sinecure rectory of the yearly value of £37. The advowson has belonged from time immemorial to the lords of the manor.<sup>281</sup>

There is mention of a chapel at Upper Somborne, apparently a manorial chapel, in the register of Adam Orlton, Bishop of Winchester, 1333-45.<sup>282</sup>

There are Wesleyan, Congregational and Primitive Methodist chapels at King's Somborne and a small iron church erected in 1898, also a Wesleyan chapel at Upper Somborne.

The Church Estate.—There are no CHARITIES documents extant showing the origin of this trust. The property consists of 6 a. 2 r. let at £7 a year, 3 r. known as the peat holes covered with water let to the Fishing Club for £1, two cottages, each let at £5 a year, and a quit-rent of 3s. payable out of Marsh Court Farm, and a sum of £150 consols, held by the official trustees. The net income is applied towards the church expenses.

In 1835 Mrs. Catherine Edwards, by will, proved at Winchester 30 June, bequeathed £200, the income to be applied in the encouragement of proficiency in reading, knitting and working of children attending a public elementary school. The legacy is represented by £202 5s. 6d. consols with the official trustees, and the dividends amount to £5 1s. a year, the application of which is regulated by Scheme of Charity Commissioners, 1881.

LITTLE SOMBORNE

Sumburne (xi cent.); Parva Sumburn (xiii cent.); Parva Sombourne (xiv cent.); Lytell Sumbourne (xvi cent.).

The parish of Little Somborne, covering an area of 1,933 acres, lies on the main roads to Stockbridge from Basingstoke and Winchester. The land slopes downwards from west to east and north to south. Woolbury Ring in the north-west reaches a height of 500 ft. above the ordnance datum. Little Somborne House, occupied by Chevalier Guglielmo Marconi, is a modern structure surrounded by a park, south of which is the church of All Saints. The parish contains 1,004 acres of arable land and 266½ acres of permanent grass, while the woods and plantations cover 533 acres.<sup>1</sup> The soil is loam with a subsoil of chalk, and the chief crops are wheat, barley and oats.

At the time of the Domesday Survey MANORS there were two estates in LITTLE SOMBORNE, one formerly held by Godwin and then in the possession of Bernard Pauncefoot,<sup>2</sup> and another, which Ednod had held, then belonged to Waleran the Huntsman.<sup>3</sup> In 1166 Humphrey Pauncefoot held a fee and a half of the old feoffment of Humphrey de Bohun<sup>4a</sup> and this included the estate in Little Somborne which had belonged to Bernard Pauncefoot in 1086. In the 13th century this estate was held for half a knight's fee by Arnulf de Mandeville of Lemuel Pauncefoot, who held of the Earl of Hereford (Bohun).<sup>4</sup> In 1361 it was said to be held of the Earl of Hereford for the annual service of one red rose,<sup>5</sup> but in 1396, the last year in which the overlordship is mentioned, Thomas Pauncefoot is given as the overlord.<sup>6</sup> This is explained by the fact that the honour of the Bohuns Earls of Hereford merged in the Crown in 1372-3.

By 1331 Arnulf de Mandeville had been succeeded by John Devenish of Winchester, of whom the manor was held at a fee-farm rent of £3 10s.<sup>7</sup> Who was the immediate tenant is uncertain, but he may possibly have been Robert Burbache, the predecessor of Henry Bradwey, who in 1346 was holding half a knight's fee in Somborne.<sup>8</sup> In 1361 Henry died seised of a messuage, a carucate of land, 16 acres of meadow and 6s. 8d. rent in Little Somborne. His son and heir John<sup>9</sup> died thirty-five years later seised of the premises described as a messuage, a carucate of land, 16½ acres of meadow and pasture for 700 sheep in Little Somborne. His only daughter and heir Katherine<sup>10</sup> possibly married the John Philip who in 1428 was holding half a knight's fee in Little Somborne which had belonged to Robert Burbache.<sup>11</sup> By the end of the 16th century the manor was in the possession of the family of Welles of Brambridge House, being held by Gilbert Welles in 1552-3.<sup>12</sup> This Thomas, son and heir of Gilbert, was in 1590-1 holding lands in Little Somborne which had belonged to John Philip, and before that to Robert Burbache.<sup>13</sup> From 1590 onwards the Welles family held Little Somborne<sup>14</sup> until by the will of Henry Welles dated 2 August 1762<sup>15</sup> it passed to his cousin Walter Smythe.<sup>16</sup> The latter died Little Somborne and Wallop to Robert son of John Waleran, to hold of John and his heirs for a rent of a pair of white (?silver) spurs or threepence at the Feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist.<sup>19</sup> Robert afterwards granted the premises to Oliver de Ingham, who in 1282 died seised of the same, held of Robert Waleran.<sup>20</sup> Oliver's son and heir John<sup>21</sup> was seised of the manor in 1294,<sup>22</sup> but he subsequently granted it to Robert Burbache for life.<sup>23</sup> He died c. 1308-9, leaving a son and heir Oliver.<sup>24</sup> who in 1318 granted the reversion of the manor after the death of Robert Burbache to Thomas de Byvedon and Joan his wife and the heirs of Thomas.<sup>25</sup> From this time the history of the manor is at present indefinite until 1533, when it belonged to Robert Gilbert,<sup>26</sup> whose son George died seised of the same in 1541, leaving a son and heir John.<sup>27</sup> From the latter it passed, probably by purchase, to William Waller, who died in 1616, leaving two daughters and heirs: Charity wife of Sir Thomas Phelipps, and Susan wife of Sir Richard Tichborne.<sup>28</sup> The manor for a time followed the same descent as Leckford Abbess and Abbots<sup>29</sup> (q.v.), but its subsequent history is obscure. It is now probably merged in the manor of Little Somborne as owned by Sir Frederick Edward William Hervey-Bathurst, bart.

There was a mill appurtenant to the manor in 1318.<sup>30</sup>

Other lands in LITTLE SOMBORNE were held by Arnulf de Mandeville for half a knight's fee of William Briwere as of his manor of Ashley<sup>31</sup> (q.v.). They were assigned at William Briwere's death in 1233 to William Percy, who had married Joan, one of the sisters and co-heirs of William Briwere.<sup>32</sup> From him they passed to his daughter Joan wife of John Farlington,<sup>33</sup> who granted them to Mary de Hoyville for life.<sup>34</sup> Mary continued to hold them until 1326,<sup>35</sup> when they escheated to the Crown as parcel of the manor of Ashley<sup>36</sup> (q.v.). Edward III granted them with the manor of Ashley to Hugh le Despenser, the elder son of Hugh le Despenser the younger, in 1334.<sup>37</sup> From this date they descended with the manor of Ashley until 1571,<sup>38</sup> when they were alienated by Edward Bellingham, lord of Ashley, to William Waller,<sup>39</sup> and were probably merged in the manor of Little Somborne.

The church of ALL SAINTS consists CHURCH of a chancel and nave in one range 44 ft. 8 in. long and 14 ft. wide with a wooden bell-cot over the west end. The west end and part at least of the side walls are of pre-Conquest date, with long and short quoins at the western angles and a pilaster strip on the north wall. The other architectural features point to a late 12th-century date, and the blocked arch at the east of the the chancel arch is a small round-headed image niche probably of the same date as the arch. In the north wall is a single light of 12th-century date. The splay is fairly wide, and has a round head, while the outer opening is square-headed and has a well-cut external rebate; it seems to be of late 12th-century date. West of this is the north door, now blocked, with a square head and chamfered jambs; the door is of the same date as the window, but the chamfer may have been cut later. About 11½ ft. from the north-west angle of the church, on the outside of the north wall, is the pre-Conquest pilaster strip already referred to.

The projecting portion is 6¾ in. wide and projects about 2½ in. from the face of the plaster of the wall. The joints are rather close and the alternate stones are bonded to the wall. The material is Binstead stone from the Isle of Wight, as usual in early work in the county, and the western angles are in the same stone, as is most of the 12th-century work.

At the south-east of the church is a 13th-century lancet of some size and with a wide splay; externally it is chamfered and rebated for a wooden frame. West of this is a 12th-century window nearly opposite, and exactly similar to that in the north wall. The south door is placed about 3 ft. west of the centre of the wall. It is of late 12th-century date with a round head of one slightly chamfered order with a chamfered label and abaci. In the western half of the south wall is a modern square-headed single light.

The west window is of two trefoiled lights with a quatrefoil over and is a late 14th-century insertion.

The bell-cot is a small weather-boarded and tiled structure partly supported by a roof principal and partly by modern posts. It is quite plain and devoid of detail from which its date might be deduced. The same may be said of the roof, of which the bell-cot really forms a part, and which, though a good deal restored, has old tie-beams and strutted purlins with wind braces. It is ceiled with modern match-boarding.

The fittings are all modern, including the font, which is circular and quite plain, and there are no monuments of any interest.

The bell-cot contains one bell dated 1604.

The plate and registers are included with those of King's Somborne.

The advowson of the church of ADVOWSON LITTLE SOMBORNE was granted by John Briwere brother of William Briwere the elder to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont, and the grant was confirmed by King John in 1204.<sup>40</sup> Little Somborne at the present day is a chapelry annexed to the church of King's Somborne.

building, formerly opening to a chancel which is now destroyed, suggests that the chancel was of that date.

The east window, set in the blocking of the chancel arch, is of three square-headed lights with hollow-chamfered jambs, mullions and head, and is of late date. The old chancel arch is pointed and was probably of two square orders; the outer has circular jamb-shafts with slender scalloped capitals of a late type. Above are two lancets very much restored, the head of one being modern; they were doubtless originally in the chancel. A little to the south of

STOCKBRIDGE

Le Street (xii cent.); Stocbrug (xiii cent.); Stocbrigg (xiv cent.); Stokbrigge (xv cent.).

The parish of Stockbridge is north-east of King's Somborne on the main road from Winchester to Salisbury. It covers an area of 1,323 acres<sup>1</sup> of low-lying country which rises to a height of 500 ft. above the sea-level on Stockbridge Down in the east of the parish. As in the 12th century, the town consists of one long wide street, and it is to this characteristic that it owed its early name of The Street. This street crosses the River Test at the junction of the parishes of Stockbridge and Longstock by a bridge of three arches rebuilt and widened in 1799, concerning which a wit remarked that it is built so low that the ducks have to bend their heads in passing under it. Sir Thomas Gatehouse in his Survey of Hampshire (1778)<sup>2</sup> quotes the following inscription which was then on the bridge, but was probably removed in the in November 1688.<sup>5</sup> Warner in 1795 describes Stockbridge as a 'noted thoroughfare with some good inns . . . but a declining place.'<sup>6</sup> It is now noted only for the excellence of the fishing in the Test. There is a local fishing club known as the Houghton Fishing Club, the meetings of which are held at the Grosvenor Hotel. The Stockbridge Races, discontinued since 1898, were held every June on Danebury Hill, about three miles north-west of the town.

South of the town between the railway and the Marshcourt River, a tributary of the Test, is Common Marsh, probably marking the site of the manor or farm of Marsh Court in Stockbridge which in the reign of Elizabeth was in the possession of the Skilling family.<sup>7</sup>

Stockbridge has a station on the Andover and Redbridge branch of the London and South Western Railway. There are 662 acres of arable land, 441½

The town is of little architectural interest, but one house on the south side of the main street is noteworthy for its door of six panels of linen pattern, nine folds to each panel. Being in the main road to the south-west Stockbridge has come into prominence on more than one occasion. It was the scene of the capture of Robert of Gloucester by William of Ypres in 1141.<sup>3</sup> Edward I stayed here in August 1294,<sup>4</sup> and James II on his way to Salisbury to meet the forces of the Prince of Orange dined at the Swan Inn acres of permanent grass and 5½ acres of woods and plantations in the parish.<sup>5</sup>

Stockbridge is a mesne borough, its BOROUGH descent being identical with that of the manor of Stockbridge (q.v. infra). It owed its early importance to a grant by Richard I to William Briwere of a weekly market in 'The Street' parcel of King's Somborne Manor.<sup>13</sup> King John confirmed this grant in 1200,<sup>14</sup> and twenty-one years later King Henry III granted William Briwere the younger the privilege of holding a fair on the feast of the apostles Peter and Paul and the days before and after in his manor of Stockbridge.<sup>15</sup> The inhabitants apparently never obtained a charter of incorporation. They elected the bailiff and other municipal officers at the court leet of the manor<sup>16</sup> and by prescriptive right received the profits of courts, tolls, &c., accounting only for the rents of assize to the lord of the manor.<sup>17</sup> The town seems to have increased in importance until the middle of the 15th century, but suddenly, for some unknown reason—probably from visitations of the plague—the place became almost deserted and the poverty of the remaining inhabitants was so great that the market which had been confirmed to the town by Henry V and Henry VI was discontinued.<sup>18</sup> However, in the reign of Henry VII the bailiff, tenants and inhabitants of Stockbridge complained that a certain William Middleton, probably as lessee of the borough under the Crown, had several times vexed them by taking by force goods to the value of 10 marks from one Henry Glover, a felon, also ‘2 hoole brode clothes’ which were stolen and brought to Stockbridge, also a horse and two oxen in the same way, and the goods of John Nupert, clerk, curate of Stockbridge and a felon.<sup>19</sup> The result of the suit is not given, but it is probable that the inhabitants were successful and that the condition of the borough was improving, since the inhabitants were strong enough to make so decided a stand for their rights. In the reign of Edward VI there were fifty-eight burgages in Stockbridge,<sup>20</sup> and the later prosperity of the town can be judged from the fact that Queen Elizabeth granted the burgesses the right of sending two members to Parliament in 1562–3,<sup>21</sup> while thirty years later she regranted to them their weekly market.<sup>22</sup> Elections at Stockbridge were notoriously corrupt, and a private Bill for the disfranchisement of the borough was introduced in 1693, but was negatived at the third reading.<sup>23</sup> In 1713 a certain Richard Steele was elected one of the representatives, but a year later, being charged with bribery and the writing of seditious pamphlets, he was expelled from the House.<sup>24</sup> Finally the borough was disfranchised by the Reform Act of 1832,<sup>25</sup> and the court leet, which existed solely for the purpose of electing a bailiff to act as returning officer of the parliamentary borough, was discontinued.<sup>26</sup>

in 1641, fell into disuse during the latter half of the 19th century.<sup>27</sup> Three fairs existed into the middle of the 19th century—on 10 July, Holy Thursday and the last Thursday in October. Only one survives, that for sheep and lambs held on 10 July.

STOCKBRIDGE was probably in MANOR cluded in the royal manor of King’s Somborne at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>28</sup> for it was afterwards called a member of the same.<sup>29</sup> Thus it was included in the grant of King’s Somborne to William Briwere in the reign of Richard I,<sup>30</sup> and followed the descent of that manor (q.v.)<sup>31</sup> until 1399, when Henry of Lancaster became King of England, and the two manors merged in the Crown possessions.

In 1402 the king granted Stockbridge to John Perient for life.<sup>32</sup> The rents of assize were leased in 1689, 1705 and 1735 successively to Thomas Neale, Robert Price and Uvedale Price.<sup>33</sup> The king was still lord of the manor in 1778, when the rents of assize, amounting to £5 10s. 11d., were payable to the lessee of the manor.<sup>34</sup> It passed subsequently to Joseph Foster Barham, for many years member for Stockbridge,<sup>35</sup> who held it in 1830<sup>36</sup> and died in 1832.<sup>37</sup> He was followed by his son John Foster Barham,<sup>38</sup> whose widow was holding the manor in conjunction with her second husband, George Earl of Clarendon,<sup>39</sup> in 1839.<sup>40</sup> Before 1867 the manor had passed by purchase to George Gammie Maitland,<sup>41</sup> who soon afterwards sold it to Charles Warner of Northlands, Winchester.<sup>42</sup> From the latter it was purchased by Francis Hardinge, the owner in 1880.<sup>43</sup> The present lord of the manor is Mr. R. P. Attenborough, who bought the estate in 1902 from Mr. Hicks Withers Lancashire.<sup>44</sup>

William Briwere the younger granted the mill of Stockbridge with its appurtenances and 40 acres of land in the same vill to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont,<sup>45</sup> who about the same time acquired a messuage in Stockbridge and 11 acres of meadow in the marsh of Stockbridge which Ralph de Bray had of the gift of William, and a burgage in Stockbridge formerly belonging to Adam le Taillur.<sup>46</sup> They obtained other small grants of land there at various times,<sup>47</sup> and in 1291 their property in Stockbridge and Longstock was assessed at £5 6s. 8d.<sup>48</sup> This land was at the Dissolution granted in 1536 under the name of Stockbridge Manor to William Lord Sandys,<sup>49</sup> and from this date followed the descent of Longstock Harrington (q.v.),<sup>50</sup> until as late at least as 1786. The further descent of this estate is unknown, but the land represented by it is probably in the possession of the Attwood family, who own a considerable area in the parish.

Briwere's descendant, Patrick de Chaworth, erected another mill at Stockbridge to the damage of one William Fowell, a burgess of Stockbridge, who, however, in 1259 released his claim for damage to the heirs of Patrick.<sup>51</sup> In 1548 William Thorpe, lord of Leckford Abbots, died seised of a water-mill in Stockbridge.<sup>52</sup>

The church of ST. PETER consists of a chancel with north vestry and organ chamber formed by a prolongation of the north aisle, a nave of three bays with north and south aisles and north and south transepts, and a south-west tower, surmounted by a shingled spire, the lower part of which forms an entrance porch. The church is entirely modern, but a number of windows from the old church have been restored and incorporated in the new structure.

These include two of late 12th-century date. One of these, serving as the west window of the north aisle, is of two lancet lights with a circular light over and an external label with grotesque animal drips. The second, the east window of the south transept, is somewhat similar but of more advanced design. In the splay, on either side, are two trefoiled image niches. The east window of the vestry is also an old one, and is of three trefoiled lights with net tracery of mid-14th-century date. In the north aisle are also three late 14th-century windows, one of three, the others of two trefoiled lights, with cusped spandrel lights and square heads, and there is one similar window in the south aisle.

The roofs, seating and fittings are all modern except the font, which is of Purbeck marble and a good deal defaced. It has a square bowl with remains of an arcade, in low relief, of round arches. The stem is round and rather short and the base square, both being quite plain.

Preserved in the church is a small stone gable cross on which is carved a rood of 15th-century date, the figure being rather crudely worked in low relief. Inserted in the vestry walls are also a number of small corbel heads of 15th-century date.

The tower contains six bells. The treble, second and fourth are modern or recast. The third, fifth and sixth were cast by Samuel Knight of Reading in 1691.

The plate consists of a silver-gilt chalice and two patens of 1697, given by George Pitt of Stratfieldsaye and Thomas Jervoise of Herriard, a pair of silver chalices of 1805 and 1813 and a silver flagon of 1879.

The registers are in four books, the first containing baptisms and burials from 1663 to 1768 and marriages from 1663 to 1754; the second, a transcript of the first, containing baptisms and burials from 1698 to 1812 and marriages from 1698 to 1754; the third containing marriages from 1754 to 1794, and the fourth those from 1794 to 1811.

Only the chancel of the old church remains, now occasionally used as a mortuary chapel. It is 24 ft. 8 in. long and 15 ft. 6 in. wide, and is of early 13th or possibly late 12th-century date. A south chapel appears to have been added early in the 13th century, and a new chancel arch inserted in the latter part of the same century. The only window remaining is to the east, a late one of two trefoiled lights under a square head set in the blocking of an earlier pointed one. In the north wall are two blocked pointed windows possibly of 14th-century date. On the north is a small pointed niche, and just below it a very small piscina with a broken basin. West of this is a blocked-up opening of uncertain date with a rounded head on one side and a wooden lintel externally; it is rather low, does not reach to the ground, and was apparently a squint from the south chapel. In the western half of the south wall is a blocked arch of early 13th-century date of two-centred form and two chamfered orders with plain hollow-chamfered abaci finished with a bead. The chancel arch is also two-centred and of two chamfered orders. The capitals are simply moulded and undercut, the returns being stopped by a beautifully carved grotesque beast which holds in its mouth the end of the astragal. A portion of a moulded base also remains. Inserted in the blocking of the arch is an early 15th-century door moulded with two double ogees separated by a hollow.

The roof is ceiled to the collars in plaster and is of late date, and no seating remains. The old communion rails are in position. They are of 17th-century date and of flat baluster form and are returned to form a square inclosure. A 17th-century table also remains. On the front and back is inscribed, 'John Hammen 1696' and on the ends 'R. R. 1696.'

A painted achievement of the royal arms also remains bearing the initials G. R., and the date, 1726.

In the churchyard is a tombstone to a local worthy, John Bucket, sometime landlord of the King's Head Tavern, who died in 1804, with the following ingenious verse:—

And is alas poor Bucket gone?
Farewell, convivial honest John.
Oft at the well by fatal stroke
Buckets, like pitchers, must be broke.
In this same motley shifting scene
How various have thy fortunes been,
Now lifted high, now sinking low,
To-day thy brim would overflow;
Thy bounty then would all supply,
To fill & drink & leave the dry;
To-morrow fank, as in a well,
Content, unseen with truth to dwell;
But high or low or wet or dry
No rotten stave could malice spy,
Then rise, immortal Bucket, rise
And claim thy station in the skies.
Twixt Amphora and Pices shine
Still guarding Stockbridge with thy sign.

Stockbridge was a chapelry dependent on the parish church of King's Somborne until about 1848, when it was constituted a separate benefice as a perpetual curacy.<sup>53</sup> The living is now a rectory in the gift of Mrs. Vaudrey Barker-Mill.

Timbreberie (xi cent.); Tymberbury (xiii and xiv cent.); Tymmysbury (xvi cent.).

The small parish of Timsbury covers an area of 1,434 acres, of which 18 acres are land covered by water. The ground slopes gradually from the north-east down to the River Test, which forms the western boundary of the parish. Near the river is Timsbury Manor House, the property of Colonel T. E. Vickers, C.B., V.D., a modern building with a red brick gabled front.

North-west of the manor-house is the village with the parish church of St. Andrew. The soil is loam and clay with a subsoil of gravel, and the chief crops are wheat, barley and oats. There are 685¾ acres of arable land, 475¼ acres of permanent grass and 64 acres of woods and plantations in the parish.<sup>1</sup> The common fields of Timsbury were inclosed by authority of a Private Act of 1796.<sup>2</sup>

In 1086 the manor of TIMSBURY MANORS was held of the king in chief by the nunnery of St. Mary of Winchester, to whom it had belonged 'from time immemorial.'<sup>5</sup> It continued to form part of the possessions of the nunnery until its dissolution in 1539,<sup>6</sup> when it fell into the hands of the king, who in 1543 granted it to Thomas Knight.<sup>7</sup> Thomas by will dated 1 January 1547 left the manor for the upbringing of his son and heir John and died seised a year later.<sup>8</sup> Thomas Earl of Southampton, the maternal uncle of John Knight,<sup>9</sup> seems to have acted as his guardian, for he is spoken of as 'lord of the manor of Timsbury' in an undated Chancery proceeding of the reign of Elizabeth.<sup>10</sup> John, however, died, while still under age, in 1560 and was succeeded by his paternal uncle, William Knight,<sup>11</sup> who at his death in 1573 was followed by his son and heir Richard.<sup>12</sup> Ursula, the widow of Richard,<sup>13</sup> married as her second husband John Southwell, and held courts at Timsbury in conjunction with John, Matthew and Andrew Knight,<sup>14</sup> probably her sons by her first husband. On her death Timsbury passed to John Knight,<sup>15</sup> who sold it in 1608 to William Waller of Stoke Charity (q.v.).<sup>16</sup> Timsbury, which was settled the same year on Susan daughter of William Waller and her husband, Sir Richard Tichborne,<sup>17</sup> in fee-tail, passed to them on his death in 1616. The manor remained in the Tichborne family until it was apparently sold before his death in 1743 by Sir Henry Joseph Tichborne, bart.<sup>18</sup> It came subsequently into the possession of John Dutton Lord Sherborne,<sup>19</sup> from whom it passed to his third son, Ralph Heneage Dutton.<sup>20</sup> At the death of the latter without male issue in 1892 Timsbury passed to his nephew, Mr. Henry John Dutton, son of his elder brother, John Thomas Dutton, the present lord of the manor.<sup>21</sup>

The nunnery of St. Mary, Winchester, held a mill worth 12s. 6d. in their manor of Timsbury in 1086.<sup>22</sup> In 1540 a water-mill, weir and fishery were among the appurtenances of the manor, and they subsequently followed its descent.<sup>23</sup> A mill exists in Timsbury at the present day.

the elder granted all the land he held in Timsbury and Compton, with the exception of the large fish-pond and the meadow of Fisflete, to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont.<sup>24</sup> Their men were to be quit of forest pleas, hambling of dogs and suit at the hundred court of King's Somborne.<sup>25</sup> In the reign of Henry III Walter de Langford claimed from the prior and convent 1 hide of their land in Timsbury and Compton on the ground that it belonged by right to the serjeanty of West Tytherley which he held of the king in chief, but in 1227 he was induced to surrender all claim to it in return for a payment of 10 marks of silver.<sup>26</sup> The manor was valued in 1291 at £5 13s. 4d.<sup>27</sup> The prior and convent subsequently acquired additional property in the parish,<sup>28</sup> and in 1345, at the request of Henry of Lancaster, they were confirmed in their right to the assize of bread and ale in Timsbury which they had of the gift of William Briwere the elder.<sup>29</sup> At the dissolution of the priory in 1536 Henry VIII granted the manor to William Lord Sandys,<sup>30</sup> who died in 1542, leaving a son and heir Thomas.<sup>31</sup> Thomas held the manor until his death in 1560,<sup>32</sup> when he was followed by his grandson, William Lord Sandys.<sup>33</sup> William apparently conveyed Timsbury to his uncle, Sir Walter Sandys,<sup>34</sup> who died seised in 1610, leaving a son and heir Sir William.<sup>35</sup> Sir William died without issue in 1628, when the manor reverted to the elder branch of the family,<sup>36</sup> passing to William Lord Sandys, son of the last mentioned William Lord Sandys. Thence the manor followed the descent of Longstock Harrington (q.v.)<sup>37</sup> until the close of the 17th century, when it was in the possession of Henry Lord Sandys.<sup>38</sup> It passed soon after to the family of Godfrey of Romsey. Thus Walter Godfrey senior and Walter Godfrey junior were in possession of a fishery in Timsbury in 1695,<sup>39</sup> and forty years later Charles Godfrey dealt with the manor and fishery of Timsbury by recovery.<sup>40</sup> John Godfrey was the owner in 1742,<sup>41</sup> while Charles Godfrey was in possession in 1758.<sup>42</sup> The manor passed subsequently to Mathew Bowen,<sup>43</sup> whose daughters and co-heirs, Louisa wife of Thomas Threlkeld and Anne, conveyed it to John Buller in 1771.<sup>44</sup> In 1781 the manor came into possession of William Chamberlayne, from whom it has descended by inheritance to the present owner, Mr. Tankerville Chamberlayne, of Cranbury Park, Winchester.<sup>45</sup>

A free fishery in the River Test was among the appurtenances of the manor belonging to the priory of Mottisfont.<sup>46</sup>

The church of ST. ANDREW consists of a chancel 15 ft. 11 in. by 12 ft., a nave 43 ft. 9 in. by 17 ft. 6 in., and a south porch, the western bay of the nave being boarded off to form a store room and a vestry. There is nothing in the church of an earlier date than the 13th century, and it is probable that the nave belongs to that time, while the chancel seems to have been rebuilt in the 15th century. Considerable repairs, apparently of early 18th-century date, leave the earlier history of the nave somewhat doubtful, all the windows having been altered.

The east window of the chancel is of three cinquefoiled lights with a pair of wide cinquefoiled lights over, in a two-centred head. The splay is widely hollowed, and jambs and rear arch are continuously moulded. Externally the window is of two chamfered orders with a label. To the west of the chancel, on either side, are two single cinquefoiled lights with four-centred rear arches and splays moulded in the same way as the east window. Externally the labels are square-headed, and all three windows belong to the first half of the 15th century. They contain a few fragments of white and gold 15th-century glass. At the south-east of the chancel, and contemporary with the windows, is a piscina with a moulded head of two orders, the outer square and the inner two-centred and cinquefoiled. It has a stone shelf and a half-octagonal projecting basin on a half-octagonal pillar with a moulded base. The chancel arch is a modern insertion and is of two moulded orders with corbels as yet uncarved at the springing line.

On the north of the nave are two single lights; the eastern has a segmental head and an uneven splay, designed to light the pulpit, while the second has a pointed two-centred head. The stonework of the outer jambs looks like re-used 13th-century work, and has external rebates for frames. The heads are doubtless of late date, perhaps 18th century. On the south-east is a window like that opposite to it, but below it is a part of the splay and the sill of a narrower light, plastered over, but perhaps of 13th-century date. The south door is chamfered, with a three-centred arch, and is probably a part of the 18th-century repairs, made up of old material; the same may be said of the small west door.

The porch is an open timber one and incorporates a good deal of 15th or 16th-century material, all of which is plain except the barge-boards, which are cusped.

Over the west end of the nave is a small bell-cot of weather-boarded timber with a tiled roof.

The font is of 15th or 16th-century date, and is quite plain with an octagonal bowl and stem. It stands near the south door and is covered with scratchings of initials and 17th and 18th-century dates.

Across the opening of the chancel arch is an early 16th-century screen with solid lower panels and open upper ones with trefoiled heads, three on each side of a segmental-headed doorway with traceried spandrels. There is also a 17th-century pulpit and clerk's desk with arched and carved panels, and the inscription, WO IS UNTO ME IF I PREACH NOT x<sup>e</sup> GOSPEL, i Cor ix 16, and in the vestry is a small cupboard inscribed, 'Books given by || M Timo || thy good || acker minister || of this P || 1713.' The seating includes a number of old and very plain benches, only one bench end remaining perfect, with two circular finials. The type is an early one, but the work is so plain that any conjecture as to their date is of little value. The roof of the chancel is modern and of the open timber type, but that of the nave is plain and old and is coved with a plaster ceiling and rough tie-beams with strutted king-posts.

The bell-cot contains two bells by T. Mears of Whitechapel, 1823.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, unmarked, and two silver patens, one unmarked but of early 18th century, the other of 1718.

There are three books of registers, the first containing mixed entries from 1564 to 1746, with a gap between 1664 and 1670, the second mixed entries from 1750 to 1790, the third marriages from 1760 to 1825.

The church of Timsbury was a ADVOWSON prebend of the conventual church of Romsey,<sup>47</sup> and with the tithes from Imber (co. Wilts.) and one-third of the tithes from Romsey was known as the portion of St. Laurence of Timsbury.<sup>48</sup> The prebendary, who resided at Romsey, usually appointed a vicar to serve Timsbury. The advowson of the prebend belonged to the Abbess and convent of Romsey, who presented until the Dissolution.<sup>49</sup> In 1546 Henry VIII granted the prebend and advowson to John Mason,<sup>50</sup> who soon afterwards leased the tithes to Sir Richard Lyster.<sup>51</sup>

In 1595 Queen Elizabeth granted the prebend of Timsbury, parcel of the lands of John Mason, to George Dowse and his sons Paulet and John for their lives at a rent of £19 6s. 8d.<sup>52</sup> Richard Cowdall and Henry Skynner obtained a grant of the prebend from James I in 1607-8,<sup>53</sup> and John More died seised of it in 1620.<sup>54</sup> Henry Beck was in possession of the rectory and tithes of Timsbury in 1686,<sup>55</sup> and Thomas Dummer in 1766.<sup>56</sup> From the latter they descended with North Baddesley to Mr. Tankerville Chamberlayne,<sup>57</sup> who is at the present day lay rector and owner of the tithes in Timsbury. John Fleming, lord of North Stoneham, dealt with the advowson of the vicarage by recovery in 1770.<sup>58</sup> The living is at the present day in the gift of his descendant Mr. John Edward Arthur Willis-Fleming<sup>59</sup> and Mr. Tankerville Chamberlayne alternately.

There is a Wesleyan chapel at Timsbury.

This parish was formerly in possession of £7 10s. arising from the gifts of CHARITIES Gregory and Alice Foster, 1635-6, and others. The principal sum has been lost. The school founded by deed, 1847, has no endowment.

The above list, with the addition of Wigley in Copythorne parish and Cadnam partly in Netley Marsh and partly in Minstead, and part of West Dean (co. Between 1831 and 1841 Shipton Bellinger was removed to the upper half of Andover Hundred. At the same time Michelmersh, Leckford, Longstock and Stockbridge were transferred to this hundred, the first-named from Buddlegate Hundred and the other three from King's Somborne Hundred.<sup>3</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey the hundred was known as the hundred of Broughton ('Brocton') and comprised the modern parishes of Bossington, Broughton, East Dean, Lockerley, Mottisfont, Sherfield English, Shipton Bellinger, East and West Tytherley, Nether and Over Wallop, and East Wellow, and part of South Tidworth now in Andover Hundred.<sup>4</sup> 'Hotlop' and perhaps 'Chingescamp' were also in this hundred.<sup>5</sup> 'Hotlop' perhaps represents Oakley in the parish of

Mottisfont. 'Chingescamp' has not been identified at present, but it is possible that this estate was in Barton Stacey Hundred.<sup>6</sup>

The hundred was assessed at about 105 hides at the time of Edward the Confessor, and at less than half that amount at the time of the Domesday Survey, the large difference in the assessment being mainly due to the fact that two large estates in Wallop assessed at 22 hides and 17 hides respectively at the time of King Edward were Crown property in 1086.<sup>7</sup> The hundred, which had taken its present name by the beginning of the 13th century,<sup>8</sup> continued to include a portion of South Tidworth as late at least as the 15th century.<sup>9</sup>

In 1651 the courts leet and law-day of the hundred were held, one about Hocktide, and the other in October about St. Martin's Day at Buckholt Hill, but the sheriff's tourn had been discontinued for some years.<sup>10</sup> The hundred has always belonged to the Crown.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>6</sup> It is entered under 'Broton' Hundred, which may possibly be a mistake for Bertun or Bertune, i.e. Barton Stacey Hundred. The estate paid geld for half a hide and was held by Richer of the Bishop of Winchester. In 1167 William de 'Kingscamp' paid half a mark into the Treasury (Pipe R. 13 Hen. II [Pipe R. Soc.], 178). Sixty years later Cecily de Depeden quitclaimed half a hide of land in 'Kingscham' to Robert de Schorwell (Feet of F. Hants, East. 12 Hen. III), brother and heir of William de Schorwell (Excerpta e Rot. Fin. i, 175). The name apparently has now been lost.

BOSSINGTON

Bosintone (xi cent.); Bosuton (xiii cent.); Bosyn-ton and Bosyngton (xiv cent.); Bossington (xvi cent.).

The parish of Bossington, covering an area of 1,592 acres, of which 45 acres are land covered by water, is traversed by the Roman road from Winchester to Old Sarum, near which was discovered in 1783 a pig of lead nearly 156 lb. in weight, now in the British Museum.<sup>1</sup>

Bossington House, the seat of Mr. William Henry Deverell, D.L., J.P., is in the north-east corner of the parish and to the south-west is Pittleworth Farm and on the extreme west Crown Farm, both the property of Mr. George Briscoe, of Hildon House, East Tytherley. Crown Farm, formerly extra-parochial and afterwards a separate parish, was included in Bossington by Local Government Board Order dated 25 March 1883<sup>2</sup>; and at the same date a detached portion of Broughton was transferred to Bossington.<sup>3</sup>

There are 616½ acres of arable land, 315½ acres of permanent grass and 50 acres of woods and plantations in the parish.<sup>4</sup> The soil is peat, gravel, loam, chalk and clay, with a subsoil of clay and chalk.

The manor of BOSSINGTON was MANORS held at the time of the Domesday Survey by Robert son of Gerold, and had been held before the Conquest by Tovi of King Edward.<sup>5</sup> It was held in 1167 by Gerold and William.<sup>6</sup> In 1243 Mabel widow of Peter Scotney died seised of half a carucate of land in Bossington, which she had bought in her widowhood.<sup>7</sup> Her son and heir Walter settled land worth £8 in Bossington on himself and his wife Aubrey in 1255,<sup>8</sup> and was hanged at Winchester in 1259 for the murder of William de Clare, brother of Gilbert de Clare Earl of Gloucester.<sup>9</sup> His lands in Bossington were evidently regranted to his heirs, since in 1281 one messuage, 1 carucate of land, 12 acres of meadow, 40 acres of wood and 20s. rent in Bossington were held by John Scotney.<sup>10</sup> From him the estate passed to Imbert Scotney,<sup>11</sup> whose widow Sarah was holding the eighth part of a fee in Bossington in 1346.<sup>12</sup> Bossington remained with the Scotney family until the close of the 14th century, when Joan only daughter and heir of John Scotney brought the manor in marriage to William Baker (Pistor) of Upper Eldon,<sup>13</sup> who was living in 1397.<sup>14</sup> His descendant, Nicholas Baker,<sup>15</sup> died seised of the manor of Bossington in 1504, leaving as in 1584, leaving an only daughter and heir Elizabeth, aged twelve,<sup>19</sup> who married Thomas Edmonds, second son of John Edmonds of Baylie's Court (co. Suss.).<sup>20</sup> Elizabeth survived her husband and died in 1640, leaving a son and heir Thomas,<sup>21</sup> who had married Barbara daughter of Richard Venables of Andover in 1616.<sup>22</sup> Thomas was followed by his son and heir Thomas,<sup>23</sup> whose descendants held the manor until the middle of the 18th century.<sup>24</sup> It next passed to Thomas South, whose family held it<sup>25</sup> until c. 1823, when it was purchased by Mr. Pealeaze.<sup>26</sup> The latter sold it c. 1835 to John Meggott Elwes, on whose death in 1855 it was sold to Tyrwhitt Walker.<sup>27</sup> Mr. Walker sold the manor in 1876 to Mr. William Henry Deverell, D.L., J.P., the present owner.<sup>28</sup>

A mill in Bossington was acquired by Imbert de Scotney, the lord of Bossington, in 1309,<sup>29</sup> and became an appurtenance of the manor. Nicholas Baker settled a water-mill in Bossington worth 20s. on his son Edmund, on whose death in 1485 it was said to be held of the Prior of St. Swithun's, Winchester.<sup>30</sup> Two water-mills belonged to the manor in 1813.<sup>31</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The Prior and convent of Mottisfont acquired land in Bossington in 1305 and 1309,<sup>32</sup> and in the 14th century Nicholas Pershute held a messuage and 100 acres there of the prior and convent.<sup>33</sup> His descendant John Pershute disposed of it to William Baker, then lord of Bossington, in 1398.<sup>34</sup>

'Pryors lands' in Broughton and Bossington, parcel of the possessions of the priory of Mottisfont, were acquired about the middle of the 16th century by Baldwin Wigmore, lord of Bossington Manor.<sup>35</sup>

The manor of PITTLEWORTH (Puteleorde, xi cent.; Putlesworth and Putlesworde, xiii cent.; Peterworth, xv cent.), which Ulnod had held of Edward the Confessor, belonged to Humfrey the Chamberlain in 1086.<sup>36</sup> Before the middle of the 13th century the manor, held in chief for a pair of gilt spurs,<sup>37</sup> passed to Roger Viliers,<sup>38</sup> who also held the sixth part of a fee there of the old enfeoffment of Robert de Gurnay.<sup>39</sup> In 1316 Pittleworth was held by Roger Stotescumbe, grandson and co-heir of William Aguillon, and by Thomas Danvers, husband of Agnes Danvers, granddaughter and co-heir of William.<sup>40</sup> In 1329 Agnes, then a widow, granted the reversion of her share to John Kenne and Margaret his wife,<sup>41</sup> who held it in 1346.<sup>42</sup> At the latter date the share of Roger Stotescumbe and Joan his wife, which had been settled on them in fee-tail in 1326 with contingent remainder to Thomas de Bulesdon and his heirs,<sup>43</sup> was in the possession of Nicholas Wyard.<sup>44</sup> From John Kenne and Margaret his wife and Nicholas Wyard the moieties passed to John Shipton and Joan his wife.<sup>45</sup> The whole manor and advowson were purchased from them in 1412 by John Uvedale,<sup>46</sup> whose son and heir John<sup>47</sup> in 1428 was stated to be holding half a knight's fee in Pittleworth and Dunbridge formerly belonging to John Kenne and his parcenaries.<sup>48</sup> Sir Thomas Uvedale, son and heir of John,<sup>49</sup> died in 1474,<sup>50</sup> and the manor passed for life to his fourth and surviving wife Elizabeth with remainder to her son Robert Uvedale.<sup>51</sup> Robert Uvedale, who succeeded to the manor on the death of his mother in 1488,<sup>52</sup> died without issue in 1501-2, leaving as his heir his step-brother Sir William Uvedale,<sup>53</sup> son and heir of Sir Thomas by his second wife Elizabeth.<sup>54</sup> On the death of Sir William in 1524<sup>55</sup> the manor passed to his second son Thomas Uvedale of Hambleton (co. Hants), who died in 1558-9, leaving a son and heir Anthony,<sup>56</sup> a recusant.<sup>57</sup> He conveyed the manor in 1588 to his kinsman William Uvedale, probably in trust.<sup>58</sup> Six years later William and Anthony sold it to Edward Kelsey,<sup>59</sup> who died seised in 1596, leaving a son and heir Edward.<sup>60</sup> The latter was holding the manor in 1612,<sup>61</sup> and his descendant Henry Kelsey, of 'Scots Yard, London,' son and heir of Henry Kelsey, fishmonger, sold it to Sir William Heathcote, bart., of Hursley, in 1734.<sup>62</sup> From this date it followed the same descent as the manor of Hursley in Buddlesgate Hundred (q.v.)<sup>63</sup> until the death of the fifth baronet, Sir William Heathcote, in 1881.<sup>64</sup> It was sold soon afterwards to Mr. Wood, from whom it was purchased c. 1893 by Sir Augustus Webster.<sup>65</sup> The latter sold it in 1902 to the present owner, Mr. George Briscoe, of Hildon House,<sup>66</sup> East Tytherley.

The church of ST. JAMES stands CHURCH on flat ground 200 yds. east of the main road and close to Bossington House. The building is small and entirely modern, having been built by the late John Meggott Elwes in 1839 in place of an earlier church. It consists of chancel, north transept, nave and south porch, with central bell-cot containing one bell. The details are in 13th-century style. There is a modern font of 15th-century style.

The plate and registers are given under St. Mary Broughton-cum-Bossington.

Bossington was formerly a ADVOUSONS chapelry dependent on the parish church of Broughton (q.v.), but in the early part of the 19th century was formed into a rectory held with Broughton by the rector of Broughton.<sup>67</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey the Archbishop of York held a chapel at Pittleworth in connexion with his church of Mottisfont,<sup>68</sup> but soon after this date the chapel probably fell into disuse.

This parish is entitled to benefit CHARITIES from the school in the parish of Broughton (q.v.) founded by Thomas Dowse in 1601.

BROUGHTON

Brestone (xi cent.); Bereweton, Berghon, Bereuton (xiii cent.); Burghon (xv cent.).

The parish of Broughton contains 3,458 acres of land, of which about 6 acres are land covered by water, 2,370 acres arable land, 1,050 acres permanent grass and 16 acres woodland.<sup>1</sup>

The village is in the south of the parish near Wallop Brook and the supposed site of the Roman station of Brigae. The church of St. Mary is in the south of the village near one of the numerous fords by which Wallop Brook may be crossed. Michael Reneger, the celebrated Elizabethan divine, was presented to this church by his kinsman Robert Reneger in 1552, but resigned the benefice during the reign of Mary. Matthew Nicholas, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, held the living in 1629. About a mile west of the church a Roman villa is said to have been found.<sup>2</sup> Manor Farm and Roake Farm are respectively north and south of the village. Hyde Farm, south of which is Broughton Mill, is near Wallop Brook and the millpond. Broughton House, separated from the village by Wallop Brook, is the residence of Mr. William Steele Tomkins, great-great-nephew of Anne Steele, the author of many familiar hymns, who was born at Broughton in 1717 and died in 1778.<sup>3</sup> Her birthplace was afterwards the property of another great-great-nephew, the late Mr. Henry Mason Bompas, K.C.<sup>4</sup> (see infra).

The soil and subsoil are chalk, and the chief crops are wheat, barley and oats.

The common lands were inclosed under a Private Act of 1789.<sup>5</sup> A part of the parish, with a population of 45, was transferred to Bossington by Local Government Board Order dated 25 March 1883,<sup>6</sup> and under the provisions of the Divided Parishes Act a detached part has been added to Mottisfont.

Frenchmoor, extra-parochial, lies 4 miles south-west.

The manor of BROUGHTON belonged to the Crown at the time of the Domesday Survey, and had been held by Edward the Confessor in demesne.<sup>10</sup> It was given by King John to Payn de Maure,<sup>11</sup> and afterwards as an escheat of the Normans was granted first to William Percy,<sup>12</sup> and then to Fulk de Montgomery,<sup>13</sup> who gave it to John Maunsel, Treasurer of York and Keeper of the Seal.<sup>14</sup> In February 1246 John Maunsel obtained a grant of a weekly market on Monday at his manor of Broughton and of a yearly fair there on the eve and day of St. Mary Magdalene and the two days following.<sup>15</sup> A year later he received a grant of free warren.<sup>16</sup> He died in exile in 1265, and his lands were granted first to the Montforts and afterwards to the Percies.<sup>17</sup> In November 1267 Geoffrey Percy surrendered the manor to the king 'for the behoof of Robert Waleran.'<sup>18</sup> Robert died in 1272,<sup>19</sup> leaving as his heir his nephew Robert, who died c. 1292 and was succeeded by his brother John, on account of whose idiocy the king granted the custody of the manor to Ralph de Bokeland in 1293.<sup>20</sup> John Waleran died in 1309, when the estate passed to his kinsman, Alan Plukenet, who was seised of it in 1316.<sup>21</sup> Joan the sister and heir of Alan Plukenet and widow of Henry de Bohun in 1325 granted to the master and convent of God's House in Portsmouth the manor of Broughton,<sup>22</sup> in consideration whereof they agreed to admit a chaplain at the presentation of Joan and her heirs to say daily mass for her soul and for the souls of Robert de Harewedon, the late master, and William, the present one, and their parents and friends.<sup>23</sup> The foundation of this chantry was confirmed by John Stratford, Bishop of Winchester, in 1325,<sup>24</sup> and from that date until the Dissolution the manor of Broughton belonged to God's House in Portsmouth.<sup>25</sup>

In 1546 Henry VIII granted the manor to Lord Chancellor Wriothlesley<sup>26</sup> (cr. Earl of Southampton on 16 February 1546–7), who probably either leased or mortgaged it to Thomas Knight and Anne his wife. Thus in a conveyance of the manor in 1547 by Thomas Knight to William Garrard, citizen and alderman of London, it was expressly warranted against him and his heirs.<sup>27</sup> However, Robert Reneger definitely purchased Broughton Manor from the Earl of Southampton in 1548,<sup>28</sup> and ten years later settled it upon his son, John Reneger.<sup>29</sup> From the latter it passed to James Jefferies, who sold it in 1590 to Thomas Dowse.<sup>30</sup> Thomas Dowse died in 1602, leaving a son and heir Francis, upon whom he had already settled the greater part of the estate on his marriage with Elizabeth daughter and heir of Sir Hampden Paulet.<sup>31</sup> Francis Dowse was afterwards knighted and was still living in 1624,<sup>32</sup> when he and his elder son Hampden dealt with the manor by fine: they both died before 1651, in which year Thomas the younger son of Sir Francis was owner of the estate.<sup>33</sup>

Some time after this the manor passed to Sir John Evelyn of West Dean (co. Wilts.), who dying in 1685 left a legacy to the poor of Broughton,<sup>34</sup> while his estates<sup>35</sup> passed to his daughter Elizabeth widow of Robert eldest son of the Hon. William Pierrepont second son of Robert the first Earl of Kingston-upon-Hull.<sup>36</sup> Her sons Robert, William and Evelyn succeeded in turn to the earldom of Kingston-upon-Hull,<sup>37</sup> and the last-named was created Marquess of Dorchester on 23 December 1706 and Duke of Kingston-upon-Hull on 10 August 1715.<sup>38</sup> His grandson Evelyn, the second Duke of Kingston-upon-Hull, was in possession of Broughton Manor in 1733.<sup>39</sup> However, by 1749 the property had passed, like Norman Court (q.v.), with which it seems to have been connected, to Francis Whitehead, from whom it passed before 1767 to Robert Thistlethwayte.<sup>40</sup> In 1804 Thomas the son and heir of Robert Thistlethwayte was lord of the manor,<sup>41</sup> which subsequently followed the descent of West Tytherley (q.v.) and is now the property of Mr. Washington Singer.

There were three mills appurtenant to the manor of Broughton in 1086,<sup>42</sup> but the two existing in the 17th century were attached to the Oake estate (q.v. infra). In the 13th century there were a weekly market on Monday and a four days' fair yearly in July. Sir Thomas Gatehouse in his Survey of 1778 mentions a fair held on the first Monday in July,<sup>43</sup> and markets were among the appurtenances of the manor in 1733.<sup>44</sup>

more, xiv cent.) was the wood mentioned in Domesday Book as belonging to the manor of Broughton: in 1086 this wood was in the hands of Bishop Walchelin, but his right to it had not been proved.<sup>45</sup>

In 1246 John Maunsel received licence 'to till the piece of land called Freschemore which is of the demesne of the manor of Broughton . . . and the said John may inclose the land with a dike and low hedge, and dispose thereof at his will, and no justice minister or bailiff of the forest shall interfere therein.'<sup>46</sup>

William de Cardeville, lord of West Tytherley, and Matthew de Columbars, lord of East Tytherley, had rights of common of pasture over the land, which they quitclaimed in 1249 to John Maunsel in exchange for land in Broughton.<sup>47</sup> The Frenchmoor estate afterwards followed the same descent as the manor proper of Broughton (q.v.), and was usually regarded as an appurtenance to Broughton, though sometimes as a separate manor.<sup>48</sup>

At the beginning of the 13th century James de Broughton and Henry de Mar (sic) held half a knight's fee in Broughton of the old enfeoffment of Fulk de Montgomery.<sup>49</sup> Richard son of Simon de Broughton held land there in 1319, in which year he was engaged in the king's service, so that he could not appear in the suit brought against him by John son of Ralph de Bokeland concerning a messuage, two mills and 3 acres of meadow in Broughton.<sup>50</sup> Possibly this was the estate in Broughton of which Sir Thomas de Bokeland died seised in 1378-9.<sup>51</sup> It subsequently followed the descent of Nether Wallop Buckland (q.v.),<sup>52</sup> and after the marriage of Elizabeth ham (Feet of F. Hants, East. 34 Hen. VIII), but this is probably an error.

Strangely, however, there is no mention of Broughton in the fine of the same date, whereby the earl conveyed Nether Wallop Buckland to Sir George Paulet, father of Sir Hampden. In all probability, however, daughter and heir of Sir Hampden Paulet probably became merged in the chief manor of Broughton.

Broughton passed with Nether Wallop Buckland to Sir Hampden Paulet, and from him to his daughter Elizabeth.

A small estate in Broughton was held of the master of God's House in the 15th century by Walter Pauncefoot, who died seised of it in 1486<sup>53</sup>; it subsequently followed the descent of the manor of Pauncefoot Hill in Romsey (q.v.) until the end of the 16th century.<sup>54</sup> It was settled by Richard Brent in 1564 on his only child Anne and her husband, Lord Thomas Paulet, grandson of the Marquess of Winchester,<sup>55</sup> whose daughter and heir Elizabeth married Richard Dowse, the brother of Thomas Dowse, lord of the manor of Broughton.<sup>56</sup>

In the early part of the 13th century half a virgate of land and rent in Broughton were given by Adam Cotele and Constance Cotele to Julian Hatel,<sup>57</sup> who granted them in 1227 to the priory of Mottisfont.<sup>58</sup> This estate was enlarged in 1301<sup>59</sup> and 1302<sup>60</sup> by further grants of land from John Filliol, John de Farlington and Robert Whytun<sup>61</sup>: it belonged to the priory until the Dissolution. In 1536 it was granted by Henry VIII with other priory lands 'in exchange for the manor of Chelsea' to William Lord Sandys,<sup>62</sup> and subsequently followed the descent of the manor of Mottisfont (q.v.).<sup>63</sup>

There was a small estate in Broughton which was held of the king in chief by the service of keeping the east bailey of Buckholt Forest,<sup>64</sup> and followed the same descent as that bailiwick (q.v.).

In 1325 Richard atte Oake died seised of 'three messuages, 2 carucates of arable land, 10 acres of meadow and 16s. rent in Broughton, of which one messuage and 2 carucates of land were held of the heirs of Adam de Greville and the remainder of William de Harewedon, lord of Broughton.'<sup>65</sup> It is possible that this first estate was the later manor of ROAKE or MICHELTON, and the second the later manor of OAKE or HOKE. The early history of these holdings is not known with certainty, but the fact that Roake was sometimes called Michelton seems to point to its identification with the estate in Michelton which Edmund was holding at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>66</sup> The second estate which Richard atte Oake was holding at the time of his death was burdened by a rent of 1d. to the heirs of Eleanor Cotele,<sup>67</sup> and it is, therefore, probable that it is identical with the half knight's fee which William de Lucy, Eleanor Cotele and Ascelina Cotele were holding of Fulk de Montgomery in the 13th century.<sup>68</sup> William de Lucy had married Maud Cotele, the third sister and co-heir of John Cotele,<sup>69</sup> who had held half a hide of land in Broughton which he quitclaimed to Nicholas the son of Richard in 1227.<sup>70</sup>

Richard atte Oake was perhaps the son of that Adam 'de Quercu' who had held lands in Broughton in 1298<sup>71</sup>: he was in possession of his estate by 1316, for in the autumn of that year he granted a messuage, 1½ carucates of land and 4 marks rent in Broughton and Michelton to Adam de Greville for life for the rent of a rose, with reversion to himself and his heirs.<sup>72</sup> Richard's heir was his son John, who was four years old at the time of his father's death.<sup>73</sup>

The owner of the estate in 1356 was John Ingpen, who in that year granted a carucate and a half of land in Broughton to John Southover and Diamanda his wife and the heirs of their bodies, with reversion in case of the failure of such heirs to John Ingpen and his heirs.<sup>74</sup> Apparently Diamanda died childless, for in 1362 John Southover was holding the estate only 'until the heir of John Ingpen shall come of age.'<sup>75</sup> The heir of John Ingpen was his son of the same name who died in 1375, leaving his son Robert as his heir.<sup>76</sup> Robert Ingpen was succeeded before 1390 by Henry, who sold the property in that year to John Harryes of Whitchurch,<sup>77</sup> a member of the family which was still in possession in 1498, when another John Harryes and Isabel his wife dealt with the manors of Oake and Hoke.<sup>78</sup>

Edward the heir and apparently the son of this John Harryes dealt with the manor of Roake in 1572,<sup>79</sup> and again in 1575,<sup>80</sup> and died seised of both manors in 1585, leaving as his heir his son George, aged forty.<sup>81</sup> George Harryes settled the manor of Oake on his son Francis and Anne Reyve, subsequently wife of Francis, and their heirs in tail male, and the manor of Roake on himself and his wife Ursula for life with remainder to Francis and his heirs in tail male.<sup>82</sup> Francis was afterwards knighted by James I and died in 1615, leaving Francis his son and heir,<sup>83</sup> who sold the site of the manor in 1628 to Simon Clifford.<sup>84</sup>

This property belonged to Richard Godfrey in 1675.<sup>85</sup> His eldest daughter and co-heir Elizabeth married William Steele, Chancellor of Ireland, and brought her portion of the estate to that family.<sup>86</sup> In 1758 an arrangement was made by which the other descendants of Richard Godfrey, namely, John, George and Walter Godfrey, Edward Hayles and Susanna Clerke, quitclaimed their respective shares in the property to William Steele, grandson of the Chancellor.<sup>87</sup> After this date the manor of Oake became merged in the estate of Roake. The 'house and manor place of Oake with Godfrey's Farm' are now the property of Mr. William Steele Tomkins, the owner of Roake (see below), who, however, pulled down the house some years ago.

Roake had remained with the Harryes family until the middle of the 17th century, when it was sold to John Webbe by Francis Harryes.<sup>88</sup> John Webbe was a recusant, and probably on this account his estate was forfeited and was then bought by John Sevier of Winchester.<sup>89</sup> In 1653 it was stated that John Webbe had been out of possession for recusancy for ten years.<sup>90</sup> He, however, recovered the estate after the Restoration,<sup>91</sup> and his descendants continued to be the owners at least as late as 1767,<sup>92</sup> in which year Thomas Webbe and Arthur Benjamin Lane dealt with the property,<sup>93</sup> which had been mortgaged to the latter in 1753.<sup>94</sup> The estate came into the possession of the Steeles in 1758, and in 1791 Anne Steele, daughter of William Steele, was the lady of the manor.<sup>95</sup> Anne Steele married Joseph Tomkins, and the property was divided between her children, William Steele Tomkins and his sisters. The eldest sister married Serjeant Charles Carpenter Bompas,<sup>96</sup> and their son, the late Mr. Henry Mason Bompas, K.C., succeeded to a part of the estate in Broughton, including Anne Steele's birth-place,<sup>97</sup> a house commonly called 'Grandfathers.' Mr. William Steele Tomkins, his first cousin, is the owner of Broughton House at the present day, but the manorial rights are no longer exercised.<sup>98</sup>

One of the mills in the parish of Broughton at the time of the Domesday Survey had been given in exchange for some land in the time of Edward the Confessor, but the reeve had received the land and retained both it and the mill in 1086.<sup>99</sup> This mill and the land belonging to it, now represented by Hyde Farm, were granted in 1336 by John de Romsey and Maud his wife to John de Winterbourne and his wife Alice,<sup>100</sup> who sold them in 1345 to John de Whitchurch.<sup>101</sup> This John de Whitchurch was perhaps the ancestor of John Harryes of Whitchurch who bought the manor of Oake in 1390, for after this date the mill became an appurtenance of that manor.<sup>102</sup> In 1606 a water-mill and land in Hyde and a fishery were held by George Harryes,<sup>103</sup> and the site of this mill is probably marked at the present day by Broughton Mill. In 1637 Francis Harryes was the owner of two water-mills in Hyde and Broughton,<sup>104</sup> which subsequently followed the same descent as the manor of Oake.<sup>105</sup>

The church of ST. MARY THE CHURCH VIRGIN consists of chancel, nave, north and south aisles, west tower, north vestry and north and south porches. The earliest building for which evidence exists was an aisleless 12th-century church, with a nave of the same width as at present, but only extending as far west as the existing aisles, and probably without a west tower. Some of the quoins of its south-east angle are yet to be seen. Towards the end of the 12th century the north wall was pierced by the present arcade and the aisle added, and soon afterwards the south arcade and aisle were built. About 1220 the nave was lengthened westwards and the present west door built. In the 15th century a west tower was built, the 13th-century west door being re-used in it, and a clearstory was added to the nave.

Early in the 17th century the nave and north aisle were much damaged by a fire, of which traces are still visible in the north arcade and tower. The chancel, which runs slightly northwards, seems to have been practically rebuilt in the 17th century, and again partially in 1886: the western pair of clearstory windows are of the former date.

The chancel has been improved by the insertion of new east and north windows, while the two south windows, each of two wide square-headed lights, are for the most part of 17th-century date. On the north a door leads to the modern vestry, which has an external door and a three-light east window. On the south side is an interesting 15th-century pillar piscina. The bowl is octagonal with roses on the sides, and below are three grotesque figures, one a devil catching a man in a noose. The stem has trefoiled panels and a moulded base and was originally attached to the wall. The chancel arch is modern, in 13th-century style, and replaces a plain timber partition. The north arcade of the nave consists of three bays, with pointed arches of two chamfered orders, round columns and half-round responds. The arches are in chalk, and with the capitals are badly splintered by fire; the latter are of late 12th-century type with small flutes or scallops, except that of the east respond, which is moulded and of later style. The columns are very low and the arches disproportionately high and of considerable span. The south arcade is very like the north, but the arches are in larger stones, and the plain round capitals and piers seem to be late rebuildings of the old work, but the bases look like 12th-century work. The nave extends west beyond the arcades, this part being now filled with an organ and vestries. In the north and south walls are 13th-century lancets with chamfered rear arches. The northern lancet appears to be in position, but the other has been reset. A modern moulded doorway leads to the tower, the blocked eastern arch of which is now buried in the wall. In the nave clearstory only the three east windows on the north side are old, the corresponding windows on the south are modern copies of them, while the west windows on either side are of 18th-century character, with un-cusped round heads. The rear arches of the windows and door in the north aisle are old, but the tracery and outer order of the door are modern, as is the north porch. The corbels of a 15th-century roof, no doubt burnt in the fire, remain in the walls. All the windows of the south aisle are likewise modern, except that in the west wall, of two lights and 15th-century date. There is an image bracket to the south of the east window, and in the south wall a trefoiled chamfered recess with modern sill and no drain. The south door has a plain rounded head of uncertain date and over it is an 18th-century brick porch. In the wall near the western respond is set a 13th-century trefoiled recess with continuous roll moulding; it has a small hole in the head, but it seems doubtful whether this is an ancient arrangement. The tower is of three stages, the lower part flint with diagonal buttresses, the upper of modern brickwork, plastered, replacing a wooden belfry stage. The west door has three moulded orders, the outer having a line of dog-tooth ornament between two beaded rolls, and the two outer orders have shafts with moulded capitals, but without bases. On either side of the door a 15th-century cinquefoiled niche has been inserted, and above the door is a single trefoiled light. There is a south external door in the tower, which has lately been reopened. The tower has been a good deal patched with brickwork within, and its south door shows marks of fire. Behind the present altar is a richly carved early 17th-century altar table with baluster legs, and in the nave are a number of well-preserved panelled pews; one is inscribed W. B. 1638 and another H. B. with the same date. The font is modern, with an elaborate bowl on grey marble shafts.

BROUGHTON CHURCH : PISCINA IN CHANCEL

On the south chancel wall is a mural tablet to Margaret wife of Christopher Hearst of 1647; another on the north wall is to Thomas Dowse and his wife Blanch Covert of 1602, put up by their son, Sir Edmond Dowse, 1625.

The tower contains five bells. The treble was cast by R. Wells of Aldbourne. The second is inscribed, 'PR, IT, CT, cast me in 1618,' with an eagle displayed as a stop. The third, of early 18th-century date, is inscribed: 'William Tozier cast this bell, a third to be know full well.' The fifth was cast by Lester & Pack in 1763.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten of 1731, a fine pewter flagon of c. 1700, a pewter bowl and a pewter almsplate.

The registers are as follows:—(1) all entries 1639 to 1704; (2) 1704 to 1753 for marriages and 1770 for baptisms and burials; (3) 1754 to 1769 marriages only; (4) 1770 to 1812 for baptisms and burials; (5) 1770 to 1812 marriages only.

The living of Broughton at the time of the Domesday Survey was a chapelry annexed to Mottisfont and forming part of the property of Thomas Archbishop of York,<sup>106</sup> but it subsequently became a rectory, the advowson of which was 'parcel of the prebend of Newthorpe and Wilton . . . and attached to the dignity and office of the treasurer of York Cathedral.'<sup>107</sup> On the abolition of the office of treasurer in 1547 it was granted with the advowson of Mottisfont to Edward Duke of Somerset,<sup>108</sup> but it subsequently came into the possession of Robert Reneger, who was seized of it at the time of his death.<sup>109</sup> From his son John it passed to James Jefferies, who sold it in 1576 to Thomas Dowse the younger, son and heir-apparent of Thomas Dowse the elder.<sup>110</sup> He died without issue in his father's lifetime,<sup>111</sup> and after this date the advowson has generally belonged to the lord of the manor.<sup>112</sup> Mr. W. H. Baring was the patron in 1907.

There are Baptist and Wesleyan chapels and a meeting-house for Plymouth Brethren. A licence 'to use the house of Henry Abbott as an Anabaptist meeting-house' was granted in 1672.<sup>113</sup>

The school founded by Thomas CHARITIES Dowse by deed dated 24 April 1601, and further endowed by will of Dr.

Croft, 1747, is endowed with the following sums of stock held by the official trustees, arising mainly from sales of real estate, namely, £114 2s. 2d. consols, £946 19s. 4d. India 3½ per Cents. and £306 18s. 1d. India 3 per Cents., also with land and cottages producing together an annual gross income of about £99.

This parish is entitled, under the gift of Henry Smith, to the portion of the rents of an estate at Longstock in this county, amounting to £20 a year or thereabouts, applicable in the distribution of clothing, &c.

The poor also receive £4 a year out of the manor of West Dean, devised by Sir John Evelyn by a codicil to his will, bearing date 13 May 1676; also the dividends of £200 consols left by Mrs. Cook, and of £105 consols known as the Poor's Money (held by the official trustees). Also an annuity of £2 given by John Mersh, and an annuity of £1 out of Russell's Coppice in the parish of East Tytherley. The income amounting to £14 2s. 4d. was in 1906 distributed among 30 poor persons in sums of 5s. to 14s. each.

The church land consists of 1 acre let at £2 a year, which is carried to the churchwardens' accounts.

The Baptist chapel and trust property for the use of this parish, Nether Wallop and Over Wallop is endowed with £1,046 18s. 6d. consols, arising from the gifts of Mr. Browning and others, £451 2s. 7d. consols, the gifts of Henry and William Steele, £43 6s. 5d. consols, the gifts of Thomas Major King and Elizabeth Russell, and £170 consols bequeathed by will of Miss J. Tomkins, proved 1893.

The sums of stock are held by the official trustees, producing an income of £42 15s. a year.

EAST DEAN

Dene (xi cent.) ; Estdena (xii cent.) ; Estden and Est Deene (xiii cent.) ; Est Deone (xiv cent.).

The parish of East Dean covers an area of 1,073 acres. The general rise of the ground is from north-east to south-west, Dean Hill in the south-west reaching a height of 446 ft. above the ordnance datum. The parish is watered by an old canal flowing from West Grimstead (co. Wilts.) to join the River Test below Dunbridge. In the north of the parish stands East Dean House, a modern building in well-wooded grounds, the residence of the Hon. Henry Dugdale Curzon, M.A., D.L., J.P., and near to it is the parish church. Opposite the church are a couple of half-timber cottages probably of 17th-century date. West of the church and on the north of the road is a fair-sized red brick farm-house of early 18th-century date, in the garden of which are some handsome clipped yews. The parish contains 518½ acres of arable land, 349½ acres of permanent grass and 75 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is loam and clay with a subsoil of chalk and clay.

The manor of EAST DEAN was a MANORS member of the royal manor of Broughton in 1086.<sup>2</sup> Broughton formed at a later date part of the possessions of a Norman and with East Dean had escheated to the Crown by the beginning of the 13th century.<sup>3</sup> East Dean then became separated from Broughton and was granted by King John to Richard de Rivers.<sup>4</sup> The grant was apparently for life, as in 1228 Henry III gave to William de Rivers 1 carucate of land in East Dean which had belonged to his father Richard, to hold during the king's pleasure.<sup>5</sup> William was dealing with half a carucate of land in East Dean<sup>6</sup> in 1236, but on his death this land reverted to the Crown. Edward I granted it for life to John Pickard, and in 1301 gave the reversion after the death of John to John de Vienna and Ellen his wife for the term of their lives,<sup>7</sup> while Edward II confirmed the reversion after the death of Ellen to John son of John de Vienna, the king's clerk.<sup>8</sup> Edward I also granted John and Ellen for life lands in East Dean which had been parcel of the manor of East Tytherley<sup>9</sup> (q.v.), and Edward II confirmed the reversion of this estate also to John son of John de

Vienna. The previous history of the latter estate was as follows. In 1229 Thomas de Columbars, lord of East Tytherley, granted land in East Dean to Aveline de Dean to hold of him and his heirs for a rent of 8s.<sup>10</sup> Again in 1249 Roger le Bedel, perhaps a descendant of Aveline de Dean, agreed to pay a rent of 8s. and suit at Matthew de Columbars' court of East Tytherley for his freehold in East Dean.<sup>11</sup>

After the death of Ellen<sup>12</sup> the reversion of both estates in East Dean was granted in 1331 by John son of John de Vienna to Roger Lysewy of Salisbury and Joan his wife.<sup>13</sup> In 1337 Roger was exempted from payment of the fee-farm rent of £8,<sup>14</sup> and four years later he conveyed the reversion of one messuage, 151 acres of land, 25 acres of meadow, 60 acres of pasture, 18 acres of wood and £5 16s. 6½d. rent in East Dean, Lockerley and Holbury to William son of William de Overton and Isabel his wife.<sup>15</sup> William obtained a grant of free warren in East Dean in 1346,<sup>16</sup> and died seised of the manor of East Dean in 1361.<sup>17</sup> From this date the property followed the same descent as one moiety of the manor of West Tytherley (q.v.) until about 1425,<sup>18</sup> when Robert Tawke son and heir of Thomas Tawke came of age. The manor changed hands soon after, and passed to John Whitehead, who died seised in 1486, leaving as his heir his son Maurice.<sup>19</sup> From this date the manor followed the same descent as the manor of Norman Court in West Tytherley (q.v.),<sup>20</sup> passing from the Whiteheads to the Thistlethwaytes, and from the Thistlethwaytes to Charles Wall at the beginning of the 19th century. Mr. Washington Singer, of Norman Court, is one of the principal landowners in the parish at the present day.

There were two mills worth 20s. in East Dean at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>21</sup>

Besides the entry of Dean under Broughton there are three other references to land in Dean, in Broughton Hundred, in Domesday Book. One estate paid geld for 2 hides and 1 virgate; it had been held by Boda of King Edward as an alod, and in 1086 was in possession of Waleran the Huntsman, lord also of West Dean<sup>22</sup> (co. Wilts.). The second estate was also held by Waleran, who had succeeded

Manno in its possession; it paid geld for 1 virgate, and it is expressly stated that it did not belong to any of Waleran's other manors.<sup>23</sup> The third estate was assessed at half a hide; it had been held by Ulstan of King Edward as an alod, and in 1086 formed part of the possessions of Walter son of Roger 'de Pistes,' being held of him by a certain Herbert.<sup>24</sup>

The first-named property comprised the district which was added to West Tytherley in 1883. It was a separate parish called West Dean All Saints until 1474, in which year it was united for ecclesiastical purposes with West Dean St. Mary (co. Wilts.). Its history has been traced under West Tytherley (q.v.).

The second estate was in East Dean. It continued with Waleran's descendants until the end of the 12th century, when Walter Waleran granted it to the cathedral church of Salisbury.<sup>25</sup> The dean and chapter continued to hold the property until 1650,<sup>26</sup> when, under an Act of Parliament for the abolition of deans and chapters and the sale of their lands, it was sold by the description of the manor of LOCKERLEY and DEAN to John Dove of Salisbury.<sup>27</sup> It was restored to the dean and chapter after the accession of Charles II, but was sold by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1880 to Levi Jerrett, with whose descendants the property now remains.

The history of the estate held by Herbert of Walter son of Roger 'de Pistes' has not been traced.

The so-called manor of EAST DEAN, afterwards in the possession of the priory of Mottisfont, must have formed a part of the fee of William Briwere, for in 1361 the Prior of Mottisfont was stated to be holding half a fee in East Dean of his descendant Henry Duke of Lancaster.<sup>28</sup> In 1268 the prior and convent obtained a grant of 30 acres of land, 30 acres of wood and 20s. rent in East Dean from Peter de Ferryngtes and Thomasine his wife,<sup>29</sup> and in 1291 their property in the parish was worth £2 6s. 8d. a year.<sup>30</sup> They were confirmed in the privilege of holding the assize of bread and ale in Mottisfont, East Dean and Wallop, which they said they had of the gift of William Briwere the elder, at the request of Henry of Lancaster in 1345.<sup>31</sup> Their possessions in East Dean were further increased by a small grant of land in 1368.<sup>32</sup> From this date the property followed the same descent as the manor of Mottisfont<sup>33</sup> (q.v. infra) until shortly after the death of Sir John Barker-Mill, bart., in 1860. The present owner is the Hon. Henry Dugdale Curzon, M.A., J.P., D.L., fourth son of Richard William Penn first Earl Howe, to whom it was given by Lady Barker-Mill, widow of Sir John Barker-Mill.<sup>34</sup>

Land sometimes called the manor of EAST DEAN and LOCKERLEY was held by Sir Walter Romsey in 1316,<sup>35</sup> and from this date it followed the same descent as the manor of Romsey Horseys in the parish of Romsey in the hundred of King's Somborne (q.v.) until 1557.<sup>36</sup> At this date Sir Richard Lister alienated the property in East Dean and Lockerley to Thomas Wheatland,<sup>37</sup> who sold it to Richard Zouche thirty years later for the sum of £150.<sup>38</sup> The following year Richard Zouche bought from George Thorpe, the cousin and heir of Francis Dawtrey, the manor of Lockerley and lands in East Dean which had formerly belonged to the Prior and convent of St. Denis, Southampton.<sup>39</sup> The two estates naturally merged, and their later descent is given under Lockerley (q.v.).

CURZON. Or a fesse sable between three wolves' heads sable cut off at the neck, for HOWE; quartered with Argent a bend sable with three popinjays or thereon having collars gules, for CURZON.

The church, of unknown dedication, CHURCH consists of a chancel 12 ft. by 11 ft. 2 in., a nave 42 ft. 7 in. by 15 ft., and a north porch. The present plan appears to represent a structure perhaps of the 12th century, but no detail earlier than the 13th-century east window of the chancel is to be seen. All the other old windows have been replaced by square-headed wood-framed openings, but the head of a small 12th-century window is preserved in the church.

The east window of the chancel is a short single lancet with a narrow external rebate and a chamfered rear arch. In the north wall is a small blocked opening with a flat wooden lintel of uncertain date, and in the south wall a square-headed window of two lights, one of which is fitted with an iron case-ment. The modern chancel arch is segmental, and of one slightly chamfered order, and supersedes a small flat lintelled opening. To the south of it on the west are traces of a small pointed opening, probably the head of a recess over the south nave altar, as it is unnecessarily high for a squint.

The nave is lit by a three-light window on the north, a three, a two and a single light window on the south and a three-light window on the west. Over the west window is a circular light of 18th-century date set in the gable which has been rebuilt in brick. The north door, in about the centre of the north wall, has a round head much defaced, in which is set a heavy oak door frame with a slightly pointed head and apparently of the 17th century. The door is old and retains its wrought-iron strap hinges and heavy wood-cased lock. The original north doorway was probably one bay further west, and the single-light window in the same position on the south perhaps marks the place of a south doorway. The 18th-century north porch is of brick with a square-headed wood-framed entrance.

The roofs date perhaps from the 18th century. Both are plastered, and that of the chancel has moulded wall plates and cambered tie-beams. At the west end of the nave is an 18th-century gallery, in which is incorporated some late 17th-century panelling. Over the west end of the roof is a small modern bell-cot with cusped light. The seating and fittings are modern, and the font is a small marble basin on a fluted column of the 18th century, set near the north door.

The bell-cot contains one bell.

The church possesses a chalice, paten, flagon and almsplate, all plated.

There are four books of registers; the first contains baptisms and burials between 1682 and 1801 and marriages from 1682 to 1754 and from 1773 to 1776; the second contains marriages from 1754 to 1812; the third contains baptisms from 1800 to 1812; the fourth burials from 1800 to 1812.

East Dean was a chapelry dependent on the rectory of Mottisfont at the time of the Domesday Survey<sup>40</sup> and continued to be annexed to that parish until December 1884, when by an Order in Council the chapelries of Lockerley and East Dean were separated from the parish of Mottisfont and together constituted a separate parish named 'The Perpetual Curacy of Lockerley with East Dean.'<sup>41</sup> The living is now a chapelry annexed to the rectory of Lockerley of the joint net yearly value of £210 with 3½ acres of glebe.

William Newman by will, proved CHARITIES 1863, left for the poor £225 consols, with the official trustees. The annual dividends amounting to £5 12s. 6d. are equally divided among six recipients.

LOCKERLEY

Lockerslei (xi cent.); Lokerle, Lockerleye, Clokerle (xiii cent.); Lokerle Boteler (xv cent.).

The parish of Lockerley, covering an area of 1,647 acres, of which about 6 acres are land covered by water, 880 acres arable land, 650 acres permanent grass and 110 acres woods and plantation,<sup>1</sup> lies in a valley tributary to the Test valley. The village is grouped round Butts Green in the north of the parish. To the east is a brick farm-house of early 18th-century date but no particular interest. North of the village and separated from it by the London and South Western Railway are the church and rectory. West of the church is Lockerley or Ford Mill apparently of late 17th-century date, now much modernized. North-west of Lockerley village is Lockerley Green, the two villages being practically joined by their straggling outskirts. East of Lockerley village between the Manor Farm and Canefield is a large earthwork. Painshill is in the south-west of the parish; Holbury, which lies north, is now partly included in the parish of East Tytherley. Holbury Mill is said to stand on the site of one of the mills mentioned in Domesday Book, and there are many references to it in records.<sup>2</sup> Roman coins and pottery have been found near Holbury Farm, and the remains of two ancient camps and a Roman villa are still to be seen in the neighbourhood.<sup>3</sup>

The subsoil is gravel, the soil chalk and clay; there are many chalk-pits in the district. The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips.

Butler's Wood was inclosed in July 1815, under the Act of 1811.<sup>4</sup>

The manor of LOCKERLEY, afterwards known as LOCKERLEY BOTELER or BUTLER, was held of the king at the time of the Domesday Survey by Ulvic, whose father had held it of King Edward as an alod.<sup>10</sup> Edward I granted it in 1293 to John Butler (le Boteler) at a rent of £6 11s. 9d. in part satisfaction of land to be given in exchange for the manor of Ringwood.<sup>11</sup> John Butler died about 1310,<sup>12</sup> in which year the whole manor of Lockerley was assigned in dower to his widow Joan by John his son and heir.<sup>13</sup> This John in 1348 vainly sought leave to settle the manor on himself and his wife Margery in tail<sup>14</sup>: he died in 1349,<sup>15</sup> and the long-desired licence for settlement was granted to his son and heir in 1375.<sup>16</sup> This son John married 'Katherine the Lady of Wymering,' and died in 1377 on Christmas Eve.<sup>17</sup> His sister Isabel, the wife of Geoffrey Roncle, was returned as his heir,<sup>18</sup> but when she and her husband sought to secure the manor Robert Cantel, John Conke and John Coly, trustees for John Butler, declared that they had been enfeoffed therein.<sup>19</sup> Isabel died in 1388,<sup>20</sup> and Richard Wayte, her son by her first husband, in the following year petitioned for livery of the lands in Lockerley, the profits of which had been taken since his uncle's death by William Upton.<sup>21</sup> Apparently this William Upton was a trustee for Katherine the widow of John Butler, who married secondly Sir John Dallingridge,<sup>22</sup> and survived until 1439.<sup>23</sup> The manor of Lockerley seems, however, to have been settled on her daughter and namesake, the wife of John Stevens, who died seised of it in 1410, leaving as her heir her nephew Richard, the son of her brother, Walter Dallingridge.<sup>24</sup> Richard Dallingridge died in January 1471,<sup>25</sup> and was succeeded by Sir Roger Lewkenor the son of his sister Philippa.<sup>26</sup> Sir Roger left the estate at his death in 1478 to his son Thomas.<sup>27</sup> The manor must, however, have reverted to the Crown shortly afterwards, for it was granted before 1493 to George Bainbridge,<sup>28</sup> who in 1496 received a grant of East Tytherley Manor, the descent of which (q.v.) has been followed from that date by the Butler estate in Lockerley. Captain F. J. Dalgety of Lockerley Hall, East Tytherley, is the owner at the present day.

Certain lands in LOCKERLEY and HOLBURY were included at the time of the Domesday Survey in the manor of East Tytherley<sup>29</sup> (q.v.), which continued to extend into Lockerley parish even after the 'members of Lockerley and Holbury' had been separated from the main manor by royal grant.<sup>30</sup>

In 1346 the part of Holbury comprised in East Tytherley Manor, which was then held by Queen Philippa, was assessed at one-third of a knight's fee,<sup>31</sup> and in 1428 Lewis John, to whom the custody of the manor had been granted during the minority of the heirs of Sir Francis Court,<sup>32</sup> was returned as holding the fourth part of a fee there.<sup>33</sup> In 1433 Joan, 'late Duchess of York,' died seised of a third part of a knight's fee in Holbury of the inheritance of Matthew de Columbars, though she does not seem to have held the manor of East Tytherley.<sup>34</sup> Land in Holbury and Lockerley was, however, certainly included in East Tytherley in 1476,<sup>35</sup> and subsequently followed the descent of that manor.

A small manor of LOCKERLEY was held at the time of the Domesday Survey by Alwi, who had previously held it as an alod of King Edward.<sup>36</sup> It afterwards seems to have come into the hands of Thomas de Columbars, lord of East Tytherley, who claimed the advowson of the chapel in 1196,<sup>37</sup> and is stated to have held 1 hide of land in Lockerley in the reign of Henry III.<sup>38</sup> His descendant, Matthew de Columbars, who succeeded before 1241,<sup>39</sup> enlarged the estate by purchasing other small holdings in the neighbourhood,<sup>40</sup> and about 1271 he received a grant of a weekly market on Wednesday at his manor of Lockerley, and of a yearly fair there on the eve, day and morrow of St. John the Baptist.<sup>41</sup> The manor followed the same descent as East Tytherley (q.v.), of which it was usually regarded as a member, until the beginning of the 14th century, when it was included in the grant to John de Vienna and Ellen his wife.<sup>42</sup> It afterwards followed the descent of East Dean (q.v.).

The manor of HOLBURY may perhaps be identified as the estate in Tytherley which was held of Gislebert de Breteville by Papald in 1086, and had previously been held by Chening as an alod of King Edward.<sup>43</sup> It subsequently belonged to the Columbars<sup>44</sup> and followed the descent of East Tytherley Manor (q.v.) until about the year 1300, when it was granted by Edward I to John de Vienna and Ellen his wife for their lives<sup>45</sup>: the reversion was granted in 1316 to their son John,<sup>46</sup> and the manor of Holbury afterwards followed the descent of East Dean (q.v.).

The Prior and convent of St. Denis, Southampton, in the 13th century acquired an estate in Lockerley which was afterwards called the manor of LOCKERLEY. Robert de Anniler and Hilary his wife granted them the land of Dean and Lockerley which Alured de Monte held of them, and this gift was confirmed by Richard de Rivers, lord of East Dean.<sup>47</sup> Thomas de Columbars, lord of East Tytherley, granted them his half of Basset's Mill<sup>48</sup> and his part of Sygar's Moor and the 'land of Tristre,'<sup>49</sup> and shortly afterwards Walter Basset sold the priory his half of Basset's Mill, his moor by the mill-pond, the island before the mill, and land in Lockerley.<sup>50</sup> Lavinia the widow of Sygar and his daughters Edith and Maud sold to the priory the tenement which they held in Lockerley.<sup>51</sup> The prior and convent also obtained grants of land in Lockerley from Robert Basset, the grandson of Walter Basset,<sup>52</sup> Matthew de Columbars, the son and successor of Gilbert de Columbars,<sup>53</sup> Thomas de Stratfield,<sup>54</sup> William Smark,<sup>55</sup> and Geoffrey de Porton, one of the lords of West Tytherley.<sup>56</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The manor was granted by Henry VIII to Francis Dawtrey in 1538,<sup>57</sup> and fifty years later was sold by George Thorpe, his nephew and heir,<sup>58</sup> to Richard Zouche.<sup>59</sup> In 1626 Thomas Jeay, clerk, died seised of the manor of Lockerley which he bequeathed to his fourth son Stephen.<sup>60</sup> The further history of this estate has not been traced. It is now represented by Lockerley Water Farm and lands in Lockerley and East Dean which Mr. Tankerville Chamberlayne of Cranbury Park exchanged with Mr. Frederick Gonnerman Dalgety of Lockerley Hall for property in Otterbourne<sup>61</sup> (in Buddlesgate Hundred). It has since formed part of the Tytherley estate.

Another small manor in Lockerley was held by Hugh de Port at the time of the Domesday Survey, and had previously been held of King Edward as an alod by Sterre.<sup>62</sup> The St. Johns, the descendants of Hugh de Port, subsequently enfeoffed the Engleys family of the estate, which probably merged in the manor of Sherfield English.<sup>63</sup> It is, however, possible that this holding may be identified with the farm and lands now known as GAMBLEDOWN, on the borders of Lockerley and Sherfield English, which were sold as a separate estate by Edward Sheldon at the end of the 18th century to the Hintons.<sup>64</sup> The property belonged to this family for about a century, but was then sold by Mr. William Hinton Harvey to Mr. Frederick Gonnerman Dalgety, and thus became united to the Tytherley estate.<sup>65</sup>

PAINSHILL (Paynshill, xv cent.; Paynes Hill, xvi cent.) was probably held between 1333 and 1345 by John Payne, who obtained from Bishop Orlton licence to hear divine service in the oratory of his house in Lockerley on account of his ill-health.<sup>66</sup> Robert Payne was apparently the tenant of the estate before 1493<sup>67</sup>; he was succeeded by Roger, probably his son, who, however, only farmed it for the owner, Sir Edward Berkeley.<sup>68</sup> It subsequently came into the possession of the priory of Christchurch Twyneham,<sup>69</sup> and was granted after the Dissolution to Sir Thomas Wriothesley, afterwards Earl of Southampton.<sup>70</sup> Wriothesley seems to have sold it to Sir Richard Lister, who died seised of it in 1558, leaving as his heir his grandson and namesake.<sup>71</sup> After this date the history of the property becomes obscure. It is represented now by Painshill Farm.

The church of ST. JOHN THE CHURCH EVANGELIST consists of a chancel, nave, north and south transepts and south-west tower, the lower stage of which serves as a porch and is surmounted by a stone spire. The church is designed in 15th-century style. The fittings, font, seating, &c., are all modern. In the ground stage of the tower are preserved two old bells, the treble of which is probably of the 17th century. The second is dated 1676. In the same place are fixed a few 18th-century monuments from the old church, amongst others one to Mathew Barlow, 'Doctor of Physick,' 1701, who married Grace (Bust), widow of Nicholas Hobbard. Another is to Walter Thomas, 1719, and Amy his wife, 1716; with the arms: on a cross engrailed, five scallops. There is also a small carved stone achievement: a chevron engrailed between three crosslets fitchy impaling a half-obiterated coat bearing a bend.

In the belfry is a ring of six modern bells.

In the churchyard is preserved the old tub-shaped font without any detail from which a date can be assigned to it, and also one of the old windows, a small round-headed light with an external rebate and wide internal splay of 12th-century date.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1659 given by Anna Bust, widow, in that year, a silver paten of 1694 inscribed 'Sary Barlow, 1702,' and a silver almsdish of 1782 given under the will of Edward Jones, rector, who died 1772.

The first book of the registers contains all entries from 1583 to 1680. The entries of the first years have elaborate initials in black and white. The second book contains all entries from 1681 to 1800, except marriages, which run to 1754, and are continued in a separate book from 1754 to 1812. A fourth book contains baptisms and burials from 1801 to 1812.

In the churchyard is a fine yew north of the present church, near the site of the former building.

At the time of the Domesday ADVOWSON Survey Lockerley was a chapelry annexed to the church of Mottisfont.<sup>72</sup> The advowson was claimed in 1196 by Thomas de Columbars, but the case was decided against him,<sup>73</sup> and Lockerley remained annexed to Mottisfont until December 1884, when it was separated, together with East Dean, by an Order in Council, and constituted a separate parish and benefice named 'the Perpetual Curacy of Lockerley and East Dean.'<sup>74</sup> The living is now a rectory, with the chapelry of East Dean annexed, in the gift of Captain F. J. Dalgety.<sup>75</sup>

There are a Baptist chapel, with a burial-ground attached, founded in 1750, and a branch chapel on the green, built in 1879.

This parish is entitled to benefit CHARITIES from the school at East Tytherley founded by Mrs. Sarah Rolle.

MOTTISFONT

Mortesfunde, Motesfunda, Mortelhunte (xi cent.); Modesfunte (xiii cent.); Motesfonte and Motes Fountton (xiv cent.); Mottesfont (xv cent.); Mottesfont and Mottson (xvi cent.); Motsonne and Motte Fount (xvii cent.).

The parish of Mottisfont, covering an area of 2,790 acres, lies on ground sloping from a height of 231 ft. above the ordnance datum at Spearywell in the west to the low valley of the Test in the east. The London and South Western Railway has two stations here, Mottisfont station on the Andover and Redbridge branch, and Dunbridge station on the Eastleigh and Salisbury branch. The village is in the east of the parish about half a mile from the main Stockbridge road. In a meadow to the east of Oakley farm-house stands the famous 'Oakley Oak,' which, 4½ ft. above the ground, has a girth of 31½ ft.<sup>1</sup>

There are approximately 1,200 acres of arable land, 800 acres of permanent grass and 700 acres of woods and plantations in the parish.

The soil is loam and sand with a subsoil of gravel, and the chief crops are wheat, barley, oats and peas.<sup>2</sup>

Under the provisions of the Divided Parishes Act part of Spearywell in Broughton parish has been added to Mottisfont for civil purposes.

The manor of MOTTISFONT, exclusive of the 5 hides less 1 virgate appurtenant to the church of Mottisfont which belonged to the Archbishop of York (q.v. infra),<sup>5</sup> although not mentioned in Domesday, was apparently held by William I in 1086. Before the end of the 12th century it passed to William Briwere the elder, who founded the priory of Mottisfont about 1200<sup>6</sup> (but see below), endowing it with all the land he had in Mottisfont.<sup>7</sup> This grant was confirmed by King John in 1204.<sup>8</sup> In 1227 the prior and convent were confirmed in their possession of land and rent there granted to them by Michael de Columbars and Thomas de Columbars,<sup>9</sup> while in 1345 they acquired a confirmation of the privilege of holding the assize of bread and ale in Mottisfont which they had of the grant of William Briwere.<sup>10</sup> In 1410 they complained that their lands, 'situate for the most part by the seashore,' were often attacked by Flemings, French and Normans and other enemies of the realm, for the defence of which men-at-arms from time to time lodged at the priory, consumed its animals and grain and plundered and carried away as booty other of its movable goods, wherefore the cultivators of the said fields had left them for the most part uncultivated.<sup>11</sup>

The buildings of the priory were in want of repair, their serfs had died in the pestilence and all their manors, granges and houses were in ruin.<sup>12</sup> However, they continued to hold the manor of Mottisfont<sup>13</sup> until it was surrendered in 1536.<sup>14</sup> It was then as 'the manor of Mottisfont-cum-Ford' granted to William Lord Sandys,<sup>15</sup> and from that date has followed the same descent as the manor of Longstock Harrington<sup>16</sup> (q.v.), the present lady of the manor being Mrs. Vaudrey Barker-Mill, a descendant of Lord Sandys.

Considerable remains of the buildings of the priory of Holy Trinity, Mottisfont, exist owing to the fact that they have been used as a dwelling-house continuously since the suppression in 1536. William Lord Sandys, to whom the site was granted, converted the monastery into a country house, and in 1538 was keeping household in the house of John Atkinson, priest, to oversee his works. We are told that he was then 'making a goodly place of the priory and intends to live there most of his life.'<sup>17</sup> He died at Calais in 1540, and there is nothing to show whether his remodelling of the buildings was finished before his death. Generally speaking, he seems to have treated the priory much as Wriothesley did Titchfield, making the cloister the main court of the house, and reducing the buildings to rectangular blocks round it. The church was cut down to an oblong representing the nave and crossing, and the south transept was retained, while the north transept, presbytery and eastern chapels were destroyed and the upper part of the tower taken down. The treatment of the other buildings can only be conjectured from the analogy of Titchfield, as they are now nearly all destroyed, and their remains contain no work which can be assigned to Sandys. In the 18th century the house was brought to its present condition, the north or main wing of the house—the nave of the monastic church—being enlarged on the south side by a block of buildings covering the site of the north wall of the cloister with wings at either end partly within the area of the cloister and partly on the lines of the eastern and western ranges of the claustral buildings. The sub-vault of the western range was also preserved and still stands, and it is probable that all four ranges of the cloister survived till the date of these alterations. The late uncovering of the chapter-house clearly shows that such was the case with the eastern range, at any rate. The house as it stands to-day is a very picturesque building, the 18th-century additions being of a warm red brick partly covered with climbing plants, contrasting with the stone and plaster work of the main building. The site is low and close to one of the branches of the Test, the ground rising gently westward, very well timbered and with wide lawns covering the site of the monastic buildings, while to the south-west of the house is a strong spring which perhaps gave the name to the place.

The remains of the church consist of the nave, 118 ft. by 26 ft., the lower part of the central tower and the south transept. When complete there was doubtless a square-ended presbytery of the approximate size shown on the accompanying plan, with north and south chapels, the arch into the southern of which yet stands, a north transept, and, from the irregular spacing of the buttresses on the north of the nave, a north-east chapel to the nave. The west wall of the nave is much thinner than the rest and seems to have been rebuilt, and the whole has been cut up into two stories and windows and string-courses inserted by Lord Sandys. These are now much modernized, only those in the ground floor on the

but the recorded date of foundation is given as 1201 in the annals of Osney, and the consecration of the church, according to the Winchester Annals, was in 1224. The latter date need not affect the question, as churches often had to wait a long time after their completion before obtaining consecration, but the foundation date is more difficult to explain. It is possible that William Briwere may not have been the original founder, but may have supplemented the endowment made by him, and have given a new foundation charter in consequence. The arrangements of the church are with one exception obliterated, but that exception is an important one, being the stone pulpitum which marks the west end of the canons' quire. It has a central four-centred arch with a panelled and traceried soffit, in which are set eight shields, the four on the south bearing the arms of Briwere the founder, Gules two bends wavy or; England with a label azure, for the Dukes of north side being of 16th-century design, with two four-centred lights and a transom under a square head, while the upper tier are 18th-century sash windows, and above them is a contemporary parapet, the buttresses ending above it in ball finials. The high-pitched red-tiled roof retains its old timbers, apparently anterior to Sandys' work, and great part of the substance of the walls, especially on the south side, belongs to the original monastic church. The details of the church show that it was carried on slowly from east to west, and are of late Romanesque character, together with the outer parlour, which seems to belong to the same build, but the chapter-house and western range belong to the early years of the 13th century and were evidently undertaken after the church was finished. The earliest work on the site may date from c. 1190, and the work at the south-west of the nave, a wall arcade with pointed arches and simple foliate capitals, can be little later, Lancaster; a cross of St. George; and a plain shield; while those on the north are, Patrick de Chaworth, Burelly argent and gules with an orle of martlets sable; Huttoft, Sable three dragons' heads razed argent; a castle and in base two letters H—; and a blank shield. These shields are a very interesting group and give the history of the priory in a concise form, mentioning the founder, William Briwere, Patrick de Chaworth, patron in the latter part of the 13th century, through the marriage of whose daughter Maud to Henry of Lancaster the patronage passed to the Earls of Lancaster, with whom it remained till the merging of the Duchy of Lancaster in the Crown in the person of Henry IV. The shield with a castle and two letters is that of a sheriff whose Christian name was Henry or the like, and who was probably sheriff of Hampshire or of Southampton; the only person who seems to fulfil the requirements of the case at the date shown by the style of the work is Henry Huttoft, sheriff of Southampton in 1521, and otherwise known to be connected with Mottisfont. This gives a date for the arch between 1521 and 1536. The nave of the church evidently had an internal wall arcade, of which eleven bays remain in part on the south side, with traces of a string-course above, and in several places higher in the wall parts of tall shafted lancets have been uncovered, some showing remains of contemporary colour decoration. It is evident that many more details are buried behind later plaster and panelling, and on the west face of the western tower arch a patch of well-preserved colour decoration has been exposed, suggesting that much more yet remains under the modern paint and limewashing. Both doorways from church to cloister remain, now blocked up, and a third doorway, from the south transept to the cloister, is still open. There is an arched opening in the pulpitum near the south end, which cannot have opened to anything but a wall-recess when the stalls were in position, but seems contemporary with the pulpitum.

In the south wall of the south transept a piscina is yet to be seen, and a doorway has been broken through the wall into the remains of the chapter-house, now used as a dairy. The chapter-house was vaulted in three bays of three spans, the moulded wall ribs springing from Purbeck marble vaulting shafts, two of which remain in the dairy, and the corresponding pair against the south wall of the chapter-house have lately been uncovered. Adjoining it on the south was the inner parlour, which had a barrel vault of rubble, and from its south-east corner a doorway opened to the sub-vault of the dorter. This was covered with a ribbed vault of two spans, with a row of round pillars down the centre and half-round responds at the walls.

Little remains above ground beyond the northern bay, and it has evidently been purposely destroyed, as all the work lately uncovered shows no signs of having been exposed to the weather, the plaster of the walls and even traces of a band of colour being quite fresh when first exposed. The site till lately was occupied by a grass slope leading up to a French window on the first floor of the house, and the monastic buildings were evidently cut down at the time of the formation of this slope, the chapter-house, which is under the higher part of the slope, being left standing to a little above the springing of its vault, while the parlour and dorter are cut down to a lower level. The floor of the chapter-house, and of the whole range, has evidently been raised at some time before this destruction, perhaps because of the dampness of the site, and the bench running round the chapter-house, as well as the greater part of the columns and responds of the sub-vault of the dorter, are still buried. In the north-west angle of the latter are the remains of a small staircase, entered not from the cloister but from the sub-vault, and evidently approached through the doorway at the south-east of the parlour. The way to the staircase was probably divided from the rest of the sub-vault by a wooden partition, as the respond in the middle of the north end of the sub-vault is cut back from a point just below its moulded capital, as if to give more room in a passage running close to the north wall. The stair in question can hardly be other than the day stair to the dorter, which usually opens directly to the cloister, but for some reason was otherwise planned in the present instance.

Nothing of the southern range of buildings now remains above ground; it must have contained the frater, with the kitchen to the west and probably the warming-house to the east. The sub-vault of the western range is fortunately perfect, and is a fine room 57 ft. by 26 ft., covered with a ribbed vault in two spans springing from half-round responds and a central row of round pillars with moulded capitals; the bases here, as in the eastern range, are buried. In the west wall are remains of three original windows, and in the east wall are two plain doorways. The kitchen must have stood to the south of the range, but was probably divided from it by an entry, and at the north end of the range, adjoining the church, is the outer parlour, a barrel-vaulted passage 15 ft. wide, with a round-headed archway at the west, of late 12th-century date: its eastern arch is of much later date and out of centre with the passage. The site of the outlying buildings of the priory, such as the infirmary, is unknown, but the whole plan could doubtless be recovered by excavation.

At the present day the principal entrance to the house is in the south end of the west wing, with a terrace in front of it over the sub-vault of the western range of the monastic buildings, and there are several good rooms in the main block, some of the 16th-century fireplaces set in the south wall of the church being still to be seen. There is some excellent oak panelling, but none of the fittings other than fireplaces belong to Sandys' time, with the possible exception of a very interesting achievement of his arms in needlework.

The manor afterwards known as MOTTISFONT TREASURY was represented in 1086 by 5 hides of land less 1 virgate in the manor of Mottisfont appurtenant to the church of Mottisfont, which were held by Thomas, Archbishop of York, and had been held by Archbishop Aldred of King Edward.<sup>18</sup> In the 13th century this manor formed part of the revenues of the treasurer of York Cathedral,<sup>19</sup> and his successors held it<sup>20</sup> until it fell to the Crown on the suppression of that office in 1547.<sup>21</sup> In the same year Edward VI granted it to Edward Duke of Somerset,<sup>22</sup> on whose execution and attainder in 1551–2 it again passed to the Crown.<sup>23</sup> In 1589 Queen Elizabeth granted it to John Willes and Richard Paice of London,<sup>24</sup> who sold it two years later to Sir Walter Sandys.<sup>25</sup> It passed by inheritance<sup>26</sup> in 1629 to William Lord Sandys, lord of the manor of Mottisfont (q.v.), the descent of which it has since followed.

In 1351 Edward III by charter granted John de Wynwyk, treasurer of York Cathedral, and his successors a market every Wednesday at Mottisfont, and two yearly fairs—one on the eve, day and morrow of the Feast of St. Andrew the Apostle, and the other on the eve, day and morrow of the Feast of St. Philip and St. James.<sup>27</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey William the Archer and Osmund held in chief two estates each gelding at half a hide in BENTLEY<sup>28</sup> (Beneclei, Beneclege, xi cent.; Benetleia, Benetleg, xiii cent.; Benteleg, xiv cent.), a district in the north-west of the parish. Osmund had held his estate before the Conquest; that of William the Archer had been held by Alwi as an alod of Edward the Confessor.

The latter estate, known later as the manor of GREAT BENTLEY, was subsequently annexed to the manor of Sibbertoft<sup>29</sup> (co. Northants) and was held with it by the serjeanty of finding one foot-soldier, with hauberk, bow and arrows, to serve within the realm for forty days.<sup>30</sup> The Archer family held it until early in the 13th century,<sup>31</sup> when William the Archer of Sibbertoft granted it to William de Brikeville, who apparently already had some right in the manor for a yearly rent of half a mark of silver for all service saving the royal service.<sup>32</sup>

William was followed by Richard de Brikeville,<sup>33</sup> and a Thomas de Brikeville, possibly son of Richard, was holding in 1316.<sup>34</sup> In 1329 a William de Brikeville dealt by fine with two messuages, 2 carucates of land and 40s. rent in Bentley, East Tytherley, Broughton, Awbridge and Kimbridge.<sup>35</sup> Seven years later Alice wife of Thomas Payn died seised of a carucate of land and pleas and perquisites of court in Bentley, Broughton and East Tytherley, which she held for life of the inheritance of William de Putton, a minor in the king's wardship.<sup>36</sup> The same year the king granted this land in custody to John Scotney for a rent of 67s. 1½d.<sup>37</sup> In 1338 John son of Thomas de Brikeville impleaded William son of William de Putton for a messuage and 2 carucates of land in Bentley,<sup>38</sup> and still prosecuted the suit in 1343,<sup>39</sup> but the decision of the judges is not extant. William de Putton the minor came of age next year, when he was holding one messuage and 1 carucate of land in Bentley, Broughton and East Tytherley with pleas and perquisites of court.<sup>40</sup> From this date the manor possibly followed the descent of East Tytherley (q.v.). It was, at all events, purchased about 1822 under the name of Great Bentley by Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmid and passed like his moiety of East Tytherley to the present owner, Captain F. J. Dalgety.<sup>41</sup>

It is probable that Osmund's holding in Bentley was at some date purchased by the owner of Compton Monceux Manor in the parish of King's Somborne,<sup>42</sup> and if so it is represented by the half a hide of land in 'Bencifeld' (sic) which Richard de Pershute was holding at the beginning of the 13th century of the old enfeoffment of William de Monceux, lord of Compton Monceux.<sup>43</sup> In 1249 this same Richard granted half a hide of land in Bentley, excepting pasture, called Thornhull, to Nicholas de Bossington and his wife Joan, to hold for life at a rent of 2s. and 1 lb. of cummin.<sup>44</sup> Richard was followed by Nicholas de Pershute, who held the property until his death in 1327,<sup>45</sup> when he was followed by his son and heir Peter.<sup>46</sup> Peter obtained licence to have mass celebrated in the oratory of his house in the parish of Mottisfont,<sup>47</sup> and died seised of the manor of Bentley, which he held of the heirs of William Fiennes, late lord of Compton Monceaux, in 1361, leaving as his heir his son Nicholas.<sup>48</sup> The history of the manor is identical with that of Shelvey in Eling (q.v.) until the death of Edmund Erneley in 1485,<sup>49</sup> and it may subsequently have merged in the manor of Great Bentley.

William the Archer granted land in BENTLEY which had been held of him by Robert the Wheelwright to the priory of Mottisfont, and his gift was confirmed by Henry III in 1227.<sup>50</sup> The prior and convent continued to hold this land until the Dissolution and may have acquired other land there, for in 1536 their manor of BENTLEY, afterwards called LITTLE BENTLEY, was granted to William Lord Sandys with the rest of their possessions.<sup>51</sup> From this date it followed the same descent as the manor of Mottisfont (q.v.) until 1671,<sup>52</sup> when Henry Lord Sandys combined with John Hutchins, who held a lease of the manor, in conveying it to Nicholas Blake to the use of Peter Blake.<sup>53</sup> Peter Blake died about the beginning of 1692, leaving his estates to his son Peter.<sup>54</sup> The latter only survived his father a year, and the property passed in accordance with his will to his sister Sarah, the wife of Edmund Lambert of Boyton<sup>55</sup> (co. The family of Lambert continued to hold the manor until 1778,<sup>56</sup> when Edward Lambert sold it to George Jennings, whose family continued in possession until 1866.<sup>57</sup> At this date Mr. Jennings sold it to Mr. F. xvi cent.) was held by Sir Walter Romsey in 1316,<sup>59</sup> and from this date it followed the same descent as the manor of Romsey Horseys in Romsey (q.v.) until about 1537,<sup>60</sup> when William Horsey conveyed it to Sir Richard Lister.<sup>61</sup> Sir Richard died seised in 1559, leaving as his heir his grandson Richard son of Sir Michael Lister.<sup>62</sup> The manor changed hands soon after, and in 1570 was conveyed by Andrew Reade and others to Nicholas Scroope,<sup>63</sup> who in 1584 joined with Andrew Reade in conveying it to William Lord Sandys.<sup>64</sup> From this date it followed the same descent as the manor of Mottisfont<sup>65</sup> (q.v.). The site is marked at the present day by Mount Farm and Hyde Farm, both situated in the southern extremity of the parish.

Land in CADBURY (Kadebiry and Cadebiri, xiii cent. ; Caddebury, xvi cent.) in Mottisfont was granted by William Briwere to the priory,<sup>66</sup> and followed the same descent as the manor of Mottisfont<sup>67</sup> (q.v.). It is represented at the present time by Cadbury Farm in the west of the parish, the property of Mrs. Vaudrey Barker-Mill.

A messuage and land in OAKLEY (Hacle, xiii cent. ; Ockele, Okle, xiv cent. ; Okelee, xv cent.) in Mottisfont, which may perhaps be identified with the 'Hotlop'<sup>68</sup> of Domesday Book, were held of the king in chief by Hugh le Queynte (probably Quintin) at his death in 1308.<sup>69</sup> His son and heir John<sup>70</sup> granted one messuage and 1 carucate of land in Oakley by Mottisfont, pasture in Oakley meadow and pannage for thirty swine in Buckholt Wood to Peter le Tannere and Margery his wife for life, with reversion to Adam de Bukesgate and Eugenia his wife, in 1332.<sup>71</sup> This estate subsequently followed for a considerable time the same descent as the Bukesgate moiety of the manor of West Tytherley<sup>72</sup> (q.v.), but in 1539 was apparently in the possession of a certain Thomas Welles.<sup>73</sup> It is represented at the present day by Oakley Farm, a short distance north of the village.

There was a mill at Oakley in the 13th century,<sup>74</sup> and in the 14th century there is mention of a water-mill and a fulling-mill.<sup>75</sup>

the Conquest by Chening.<sup>76</sup> Nothing further is known of the property until 1346, when John Kenne, Nicholas Wyard and Peter Dunbridge were holding half a knight's fee in Pittleworth and Dunbridge.<sup>77</sup> By 1428 this property had come into the possession of John Uvedale, lord of the manor of Pittleworth in Bossington parish,<sup>78</sup> and Dunbridge doubtless followed the same descent as that manor (q.v.). The site is marked by Dunbridge Farm in the south-west of the parish near the Old Canal.

The manor of KIMBRIDGE (Kyngbrigg, xiii and xiv cent.; Kymbrigge, xv cent.) was held in the 13th century of the manor of East Tytherley.<sup>79</sup> It was said in 1474-5 to be held of the manor of Michelmersh,<sup>80</sup> but in 1638-9 the manor of Kimbridge was held of the manor of East Tytherley, while certain land there called Pollins<sup>81</sup> was held of the manor of Michelmersh.<sup>82</sup>

In the middle of the 13th century half a fee in Kimbridge and West Tytherley was held by Lambert de Saumo, John de 'Okingbrig' and Christine de 'Kingbrig'.<sup>83</sup> The manor had probably been held at the beginning of the century by the family of Kimbridge, for Michael de Kimbridge was a witness to a deed of earlier date than 1229.<sup>84</sup> In 1316

Herring was in possession of the manor in 1679,<sup>85</sup> but it had passed before 1766 to Thomas Lee Dummer,<sup>86</sup> and has since descended in the same way as North Baddesley<sup>85</sup> (q.v.) to Mr. Tankerville Chamberlayne, the present owner.

The church of ST. ANDREW consists of a chancel 27 ft. 10½ in. by 16 ft. 9 in., a nave 51 ft. 6 in. by 18 ft. 11 in., and a south porch. The greater part of the church belongs to the first half of the 12th century, and, except for the introduction of a few windows, it appears to have remained unaltered until the 15th century, when the chancel was partly rebuilt and lengthened eastward, and the nave was probably lengthened westward at the same time, or perhaps late in the 14th century. The church was reroofed about the beginning of the 16th century. The bell-cot was restored in the 19th century. The whole church is plastered externally and internally.

The two-centred east window of the chancel is of mid-15th-century date, and has three cinquefoiled lights with tracery. In the north wall is a window of similar date of two cinquefoiled lights with a quatrefoil over. An identical window in the south wall is now blocked up. At the west of both north and south walls are early 14th-century windows of two trefoiled lights with a quatrefoil over, probably set in part of the older chancel wall. Between the two windows on the north is a small priest's door with a pointed head, and on the south is a square-headed mid-15th-century window with tracery. The flat pointed rear arch and jambs are continuously moulded, and stopped with small octagonal moulded bases. The 12th-century chancel arch has a single square order on the east, but on the west two moulded

Thomas Polayn held the manor, which had previously belonged to Matthew Polayn.<sup>85</sup> The manor remained in the Polayn family, probably passing from Amice Polayn, who died in 1349, to her son John,<sup>86</sup> and from him to his son, a second John, who died about 1412-13.<sup>87</sup> His heir was his niece Rose wife of John Fish, daughter of Christine Holewelle,<sup>88</sup> but it is not known whether she ever held the manor. John Canterton died in 1473-4 holding the manor of Kimbridge, which had been settled upon him and his wife Alice and their issue.<sup>89</sup> The manor appears to have descended to the Canterton family<sup>90</sup> until about 1607-8, when it was probably sold by John Canterton to John Herring.<sup>91</sup> John died in 1637, and the manor passed to his son John.<sup>92</sup> William orders, the outer enriched with zigzag. It is supported on circular shafts with moulded and spurred bases, cushion capitals (one of which with the abacus over is restored), and moulded abaci now somewhat mutilated but originally mitred round the imposts. The section of the abaci is of the same character as that of the string-course beneath the windows in the eastern parts of Romsey Abbey Church.

The nave is lit on the north by a 14th-century window. Partly under it is a tomb recess of the same date with a moulded two-centred head. Opposite in the south wall is a window identical in date and design, under which is a square recess with a piscina drain. A little to the west of the piscina is another tomb recess, also of 14th-century date, with a slightly ogee-moulded head and a scroll-moulded label. At the south-west is a two-light window of uncertain date. The south door in the middle of the wall is of 12th-century date, with a round head of one order, and an edge chamfer which is probably an addition. There was probably a north door opposite to it, which cannot now be seen. The south porch is of late date and of brick, rough cast. The west window is of the 15th century, with a two-centred head. The west door is of late 14th-century date and continuously moulded with a double ogee of early section and has an external label.

MOTTISPONT CHURCH : THE CHANCEL ARCH

SHERFIELD ENGLISH CHURCH : EARLY 17TH-CENTURY COMMUNION TABLE

The font has a Purbeck marble bowl, much retooled, but perhaps of the 12th century, on a modern stem and base.

The roofs are both old, but that of the nave is quite plain and undatable. That of the chancel is probably of late 15th-century date, and has a moulded wall plate and two curiously cambered tie-beams. The bell-cot is over the west end of the nave. It is quite plain, has recently been reshingled and has a pyramidal tiled roof. It is supported upon trusses carried by six strutted wall posts within the nave. The communion table is of early 17th-century date.

On the south wall of the chancel are a monument of Renaissance detail, with the date 1584 and the initials I. M. on shields held by putti, and kneeling figures of a man in civilian dress, his wife, one son and two daughters, the figure of the eldest son being broken away. No trace of the original colouring remains.

In the floor of the chancel is a brass plate to William Sandys, 1628, with his arms, a ragged cross quartered with a chevron between three birds' claws razed and bendy vair and (?gules). The inscription tells that he preferred to be buried here ad fontem on his own land to sharing his ancestors' tomb ad viam at the Vyne. In the south wall of the nave is inserted a stone carved with two shields on a draped canopy. A modern inscription below records that the church of St. Michael at Bremen was built 1693 by Daniel Meinertzhagen and Bruno Heilman, senators of the free city of Bremen, and that at its rebuilding in 1898 the carved stone was removed and sent by the senate of Bremen to the English descendants of Daniel Meinertzhagen. The dexter shield bears a bend with a molet thereon, and above it is the crest, a pair of wings with a molet on each. The other shield bears six fruit trees and over all a bend with three bunches of grapes thereon and has a like tree as crest.

The east window is completely filled with 15th-century white and gold glass, generally said to have been brought from the Holy Ghost Chapel near Basingstoke, and made out with new glass. The style, however, is entirely unlike that of the glass now in Basingstoke Church, which is known to have been in the chapel. In the centre light is the Crucifixion with the figures of our Lady and St. John on a red background. In the side lights are figures of St. Peter and St. Andrew on blue backgrounds, with their names below in modern capitals. In the two smaller lights over is the coronation of our Lady between St. John and St. Katharine with seraphs standing on wheels in the outer lights, and in the head, with figures of angels swinging censers in the small side lights. The figures are excellently drawn and the colouring extremely fine. The 15th-century two-light window on the south of the chancel also contains some contemporary white and gold fragments, probably St. Michael, St. Katharine and a bishop, and a number of quarries, each ornamented with a single floral form. In the two windows at the west of the chancel are some fragments of late 14th-century glass, that to the north containing a nearly complete and splendidly drawn head of Christ. There has been a like head on the south, but the red borders charged with gold lis in the heads of the main lights were not designed for their present position. In the north-east window are more fragments of this and other borders.

The bell-cot contains five bells. The treble bears the churchwardens' names and the date 1675. The second was cast by William Tozier in 1718. The third is marked F.F.R.V. 1663. The fourth is dated 1678, and the fifth was recast in 1891.

The plate consists of a silver chalice probably of 1586, the gift of John Howorth, rector, and a silver paten of 1707, the gift of the Rev. Oliver D'Oyley St. John in 1830.

The registers are contained in four books. The first contains baptisms and burials from 1701 to 1761 and marriages from 1701 to 1723, with a few later entries, in part copied from an earlier paper register. The second contains marriages after a gap, from 1754 to 1788, and the third marriages from 1789 to 1812. The fourth contains baptisms and burials from 1788 to 1812.

The advowson of the church of ADVOWSON Mottisfont with the dependent chapelries of Broughton, Pittleworth, East Dean, East and West Tytherley and Lockerley, followed the descent of the manor of Mottisfont Treasury<sup>96</sup> (q.v.) till it was forfeited to the Crown by the attainder of Edward Duke of Somerset. In 1586 it was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Christopher Hatton,<sup>97</sup> but before 1628 it had passed to Sir William Sandys.<sup>98</sup> Henry Danvers Earl of Danby presented to the living in 1640, and Henry Marquess of Dorchester in 1664,<sup>99</sup> and the latter sold the advowson in 1673 to William Thompson.<sup>100</sup>

Thirty-six years later the latter conveyed it to Francis Annesley, from whom it passed by sale to William Gibbon in 1720.<sup>101</sup> The trustees of the South Sea Company were the next patrons of the living, selling the advowson in 1726 to John Fuller, whose devisees, Thomas, John, Frances and Rose Fuller, conveyed it in 1764 to Sir Brian Broughton-Delves, bart.<sup>102</sup> Lady Broughton-Delves sold the advowson in 1766 after the death of her husband to Mr. Goodyer St. John, by whose family it continued to be held until 1884, when the Rev. Paulet St. John sold it to Captain F. G. Dalgety, from whom it

SHERFIELD ENGLISH

Sirefelle (xi cent.); Shirefelde (xiii cent.); Shyr-feld, Sherefeld Englysshe (xv cent.); Shervill (xvi cent.).

The parish of Sherfield English lies in a valley on the Wiltshire border and contains nearly 1,848 acres of land, of which 987 acres are arable,  $345\frac{1}{4}$  permanent grass and  $431\frac{3}{4}$  woodland.<sup>1</sup>

The village is in the south of the parish on the main road from Salisbury to Romsey. The manor-house has been pulled down in modern times, but two brick cottages in the lane near the site of the old church mark the spot where the entrance gates once stood.

Birchwood, from which 'a plot of land not exceeding nine acres' was included in the sale of the manor to John Ingram Lockhart in 1785,<sup>2</sup> is in the south-east of the parish, while in the extreme south is Sherfield Mill, probably on the site of the mill mentioned in Domesday Book.<sup>3</sup>

The common lands known as Sherfield Warren were inclosed in 1810.<sup>4</sup>

The soil is loam, the subsoil sand and gravel; but there are several old chalk pits in the northern part of the parish. The chief crops are wheat, barley and oats.

The manor of SHERFIELD ENGLISH MANOR which Edric held in the reign of Edward the Confessor belonged after the Conquest to Hugh de Port,<sup>5</sup> with whose successors the St. Johns the overlordship continued until the end of the 15th century.<sup>6</sup>

In 1166 Richard de Anesia held the manor as one knight's fee of John de Port,<sup>7</sup> while at the beginning of the 13th century a Robert de Anesia was holding the same of the old feoffment of Richard de Anesia of Robert de St. John.<sup>8</sup> It is uncertain at what date the Engleys family first became tenants of the manor, but Gilbert l'Engleys held lands in the neighbourhood as early as 1254, in which year he was fined for wasting his wood in Melchet Forest.<sup>9</sup> Richard l'Engleys, who was coroner in the county of Southampton and died in 1309,<sup>10</sup> seems to have succeeded to the estate, for 'a knight's fee in Sherfield formerly held by Richard l'Engleys' is mentioned in documents of the 14th century.<sup>11</sup> Aline la Engleys, who was probably Richard's widow, was seised of the manor in 1316<sup>12</sup>; she was succeeded

Sherfield had, however, apparently been settled on Joan sister of Richard and wife of Nicholas Woodlock,<sup>15</sup> who in 1359 joined with her in granting a life-interest in the manor to her mother Alice and her second husband, Robert Gerberd.<sup>16</sup> In 1369 Joan obtained a quitclaim of half the manor from her niece Margaret,<sup>17</sup> daughter and heir of Richard l'Engleys and then wife of Philip Dauntsey.<sup>18</sup> Thomas Woodlock was grandson and heir of Joan,<sup>19</sup> but only obtained Sherfield after the death of his mother Eleanor, on whom the manor had apparently been settled for life.<sup>20</sup> Thomas apparently left no issue, for in 1428 the manor was in the possession of Thomas Ringwood, as husband of Joan Bayford, a distant kinswoman and heir of Thomas Woodlock.<sup>21</sup>

Charles Ringwood, probably grandson or great-grandson of Thomas, died seised of the manor in 1488, leaving a son and heir John, then two years old.<sup>22</sup> This John was twice married, and was succeeded at his death in 1544<sup>23</sup> by his second wife Isabel, upon whom he had settled the manor for life<sup>24</sup> with reversion to his son and heir Charles. She afterwards married Christopher Willoughby, and a suit was then brought against her in Chancery by Henry son and heir of her stepson Charles,<sup>25</sup> and Elizabeth the widow of Anthony Ringwood, probably another stepson.<sup>26</sup> The plaintiffs did not, however, agree in their statements, for Henry denied that a conveyance had ever been made to Isabel,<sup>27</sup> while Elizabeth stated that her late husband Anthony

Ringwood had bequeathed to her his interest in a lease which had been conveyed to him by John Ringwood the younger,<sup>28</sup> to whom Isabel had let the estate.<sup>29</sup> The case was decided in favour of the Willoughbys, and the manor was accordingly released to Isabel and her husband in 1566.<sup>30</sup>

In 1567 Henry son of Charles Ringwood, to whom the reversion of the manor belonged after the death of Isabel, sold his right to Lionel Tichborne,<sup>31</sup> who died in the lifetime of Isabel Willoughby, leaving his son Roger as his heir.<sup>32</sup> Roger died seized of the manor in 1620,<sup>33</sup> and was succeeded by his brother Michael, who sold the estate to Bartholomew Smith in 1629.<sup>34</sup> The Tichbornes, however, continued to hold the manor on lease from the Smiths, and in 1651 Bartholomew, who was probably the son of the purchaser, complained that his estate had been sequestered for the recusancy of the widow of the lessee, Michael Tichborne.<sup>35</sup> He therefore petitioned 'that he might not suffer for the crime of his tenant and that the sequestration might be discharged.'<sup>36</sup> The petition was at first considered,<sup>37</sup> but was eventually disregarded, the Parliamentary Commissioners having discovered that Bartholomew was himself a recusant.<sup>38</sup>

James, the elder son of Bartholomew Smith, joined a religious order in 1685, and the estate passed to his brother Bartholomew, whose daughter Anastasia married William Sheldon.<sup>39</sup> Their grandson, Edward Sheldon, sold Sherfield English in 1785 to John Ingram Lockhart,<sup>40</sup> whose family remained in possession for the next hundred years. Maria, the daughter and heiress of James Lockhart, married John Smith of Ellingham Hall (co. Norf.) in 1828,<sup>41</sup> and their son, Mr. Henry Lockhart Smith, who succeeded to Sherfield English on his grandmother's death, was lord of the manor until 1 January 1903,<sup>42</sup> when he sold it to Louisa Lady Ashburton.<sup>43</sup> She died a month later, and the estate then passed to its present owner, her grandson, Lord Spencer Douglas Compton.<sup>44</sup>

The church of ST. LEONARD, CHURCH built in 1903 by the late Lady Ashburton in memory of her only child, Mary Florence Marchioness of Northampton, who died in 1902, is on practically the same site as that built by the Rev. the Hon. F. Baring in 1858, but pulled down in 1902-3 on account of its insecurity. When the nave of the original church, which stood about a quarter of a mile north of the later site, was removed in 1859 two stone coffins were discovered and sold to Sir John Cope of Lockerley Hall, where they remain.<sup>45</sup> In 1907, when the chancel of this church was pulled down, the upper half of one of the coffin lids was found built into what had been the space of the chancel arch.<sup>46</sup> This lid and various other details figure in the modern church. The church is built of red brick with stone dressings in 15th-century style. It consists of a chancel, a central tower with transepts and a nave with north and south aisles and north porch.

In the vestry is a very richly carved early 17th-century communion table, with a line of balusters between the legs and on one end a shield with two lions rampant in chief, and in base two bars wavy. Preserved at the rectory is another communion table with plain chamfered legs. Four panels of linen pattern and a line of quatrefoils are also preserved in a door in the vestry. The altar rails and font cover are of 18th-century date. The pulpit has six panels, three bearing allegorical figures of 'Temperance,' 'Justice' and 'Charity,' and the others fanciful shields with helmets and foliage enrichment. On the south wall is a mural tablet to Mary Fortune (15 March 1697-8). At the rectory is a panelled octagonal font of late date removed from the old church.

The bells are eight in number and modern; they are contained in an octagonal stone bell turret which rises from the square central tower and has four flying buttresses from the angles. It is finished by a short leaded spire.

The church has one set of plated vessels, a chalice, paten, flagon and almsplate, dated 1752.

The earliest register book contains mixed entries 1640 to 1746; the second and partly parallel, 1693 to 1702 curiously combined with churchwardens' accounts; the third, baptisms and burials 1741 to 1811. A marriage book appears to be missing between 1702 and 1754, but from that date there is the usual printed copy with entries up to 1812.

The advowson of Sherfield English ADVOWSON belonged to the lords of the manor until the middle of the 17th century.<sup>47</sup>

It was included by Michael Tichborne in the sale to Bartholomew Smith in 1629,<sup>48</sup> but seems to have become separated from the manor before 1666.<sup>49</sup> It was bought, apparently between 1737<sup>50</sup> and 1769, by Robert Bristow, whose family exercised the right of presentation for about a hundred years.<sup>51</sup> In 1875 the living was in the gift of Louisa Lady Ashburton,<sup>52</sup> by whom the advowson was transferred in June 1902 to the Church Pastoral Aid Society, to whom the living now belongs.<sup>53</sup>

There are no endowed charities in the parish.

SHIPTON BELLINGER

Sceptone (xi cent.); Shipeton (xii cent.); Septon, Schypton (xiii cent.); Shupton Berenger (xiv cent.); Shipton Bellyngar (xvi cent.).

The parish of Shipton Bellinger, on the borders of Wiltshire, covers an area of 2,560 acres, of which 406½ acres are arable land, 877½ are permanent grass, mostly for sheep pasture, and 119 acres are woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup>

The ground rises towards the centre of the parish to its greatest height, 565 ft. above the ordnance datum. Near here is the village, the main street of which joins the road from Marlborough to Salisbury, near Shipton Farm. The River Bourne sometimes flows through the village street for two years in succession, but at other times its course is dry. East of the village is the parish church of St. Peter, and half a mile south is Snoddington Manor House, the residence of Mr. H. C. Formby, J.P.

The soil is very light except on the summit of the hills, where it is clay, and the subsoil is chalk. The common fields were inclosed in 1793 under a Private Act of the previous year.<sup>2</sup>

through his marriage with Sibyl daughter of Robert de Ewyas.<sup>5</sup> It descended from him to John Lord De La Warr, son of Roger De La Warr by Clarice daughter of Sir John de Tregoz,<sup>6</sup> with whose descendants it remained until the 15th century. It was held by the service of one rose yearly, as of the castle of Ewyas (co. Heref.), which, on the death of Sir John de Tregoz, had been assigned to John Lord De La Warr.<sup>7</sup>

The mesne lordship belonged in 1167 to Loewis,<sup>8</sup> and from him passed to Peter le Kenet, who was holding two knights' fees in Shipton in the middle of the 13th century.<sup>9</sup> The next lord of the manor was probably Ruald de Calva, who, in conjunction with his wife Beatrice, endowed the priory of Newark (co. Sur.) with the advowson of the church of Shipton Bellinger.<sup>10</sup> In 1296 Ingram Berenger held the manor,<sup>11</sup> and in 1316 he obtained a grant of free warren in his demesne lands of Shipton.<sup>12</sup> In 1332 and again in 1334 Ingram entailed the manor on his son John, who married firstly Alice Stonor and secondly a certain Emma.<sup>13</sup> John died in 1343, leaving a son and heir Ingram, aged two.<sup>14</sup> His widow Emma married Edmund Hakluyt as her second husband,<sup>15</sup> and the latter held the manor in right of his wife until his death in 1360,<sup>16</sup> when he was followed by Nicholas Berenger,<sup>17</sup> probably a younger brother of Ingram, who must have died young. Nicholas at his death in 1382 left two daughters as his heirs<sup>18</sup>: Joan, afterwards the wife of Peter Stantor, and Anastasia, afterwards the wife of Stephen Bodenham.<sup>19</sup> On the death of Joan in 1385 her heir was her sister Anastasia, then aged fourteen,<sup>20</sup> but her husband, Peter Stantor, who was to hold the custody of the manor during the minority of the heir,<sup>21</sup> remained in possession until his death in 1415, at which date Robert Bodenham, son and heir of Anastasia, attained his majority.<sup>22</sup> Robert, who was holding the manor in 1428,<sup>23</sup> became involved in financial difficulties,<sup>24</sup> and on his death in 1466<sup>25</sup> the manor passed to his principal creditor, John Hall of Salisbury.<sup>26</sup> John Hall died in 1479 and was followed by his son and heir William.<sup>27</sup> In 1502 William conveyed the manor to Richard Bishop of Winchester and others,<sup>28</sup> by whom it was transferred to the Prior and convent of St. Swithun in 1504.<sup>29</sup> The prior and convent held Shipton Bellinger until the Dissolution, and in 1541<sup>30</sup> the newly-constituted Dean and Chapter of Winchester obtained a grant of the same from Henry VIII.<sup>31</sup>

SHIPTON BELLINGER

On the abolition of the dean and chapter in 1650 Shipton Bellinger was sold to Thomas Hussey of Laverstock,<sup>32</sup> but was restored in the usual way on the accession of Charles II. The dean and chapter then continued in possession until 1859,<sup>33</sup> when they apparently sold the manor to Mr. Francis Sloane-Stanley, lord of South Tidworth, who was the owner in 1867.<sup>34</sup> Ten years later Mr. Stanley sold the estate to Sir John Kelk, bart.,<sup>35</sup> who on his death in 1886 was followed by his son and heir Sir John William Kelk, bart.<sup>36</sup> The latter sold Shipton Bellinger in 1906 to the War Office for military purposes,<sup>37</sup> so that the manor is now vested in the Crown.

The manor of SNODDINGTON belonged before the Conquest to Tovi and at the time of the Domesday Survey to Hugh de Port, tenant-in-chief.<sup>38</sup> It was held in the 13th century of Robert de Pont de L'Arche, lord of Newton Valence, and by him of Robert St. John, a descendant of Hugh de Port.<sup>39</sup> The overlordship of the St. John family subsequently lapsed, and the manor was held henceforward as of the manor of Newton Valence (q.v.) by suit of court and the service due from the fourth part of a knight's fee.<sup>40</sup>

At the beginning of the 13th century Thomas de Port and Margery de Cundy held jointly of Robert de St. John the fourth part of a knight's fee in Snoddington,<sup>41</sup> and a century later, in 1305, Gilbert Cundy held the same land, valued at 60s., of Aymer de Valence.<sup>42</sup> However, before 1316, Snoddington had come into the possession of Ingram Berenger,<sup>43</sup> lord of Shipton Bellinger, who two years later obtained from Thomas Harengod and Eleanor his wife<sup>44</sup> a quitclaim of all their rights in two messuages and 2 carucates of land in Snoddington for a rent of £5 during the life of Eleanor.<sup>45</sup> From this date the manor followed almost exactly the descent of Shipton Bellinger<sup>46</sup> (q.v.) until 1466, when Robert Bodenham died seised only of the reversion of the manor. This right passed to his infant grandson and heir Richard, son of his son Robert,<sup>47</sup> who as soon as he came into possession evidently sold the manor, probably to pay his grandfather's debts, to Tristram Fauntleroy,<sup>48</sup> a younger son of the Dorset family of that name. Tristram died in 1538, leaving a son and heir Brian,<sup>49</sup> whose son Henry held the manor until his death in 1578.<sup>50</sup> His heir was his son William,<sup>51</sup> who evidently died in a few years without issue, since his brother Henry was returned as the heir of his father Henry in 1589.<sup>52</sup> From this date the descent of the manor is unknown until the beginning of the 18th century, when it was in the possession of Richard Bird. Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Richard, brought Snoddington in marriage to Ralph Etwall of Andover, and the manor continued in the Etwall family until 1885, when Mr. William Etwall sold it to Mr. William H. Alexander.<sup>53</sup> The latter dying in 1905 devised the manor by will to Mr. H. C. Formby, B.A., J.P., the present owner.<sup>54</sup>

The manor of Snoddington contained a mill worth 20s. in the 14th century.<sup>55</sup> The place-name Milborowe possibly marked its site in the 18th century.

In 1086 Robert son of Gerold held property in Shipton which had been held by Ulstan of King Edward before the Conquest.<sup>56</sup> This land followed the same descent as and subsequently merged in the manor of South Tidworth in the hundred of Andover<sup>57</sup> (q.v.).

The church of ST. PETER consists of CHURCH a chancel 21 ft. 3 in. by 16 ft. 3 in., with a vestry on the north side, and a nave 49 ft. 4 in. by 18 ft. 2 in., with a south porch and a wooden bell turret over the west end. The Bodenham and (2) Thomas Semelye, died seised of a moiety of the manor in 1407. One-third of the manor passed to her husband Thomas Semelye, who died seised in 1420 (Inq. p.m. 8 Hen. IV, no. 78, 110); (4) Robert Bodenham, on his death in 1466, was seised of the reversion consequent on the death of his sister Anastasia Bodenham (Inq. p.m. 6 Edw. IV, no. 34).

concerning lands in Snoddington in 1305 (Inq. a.q.d. file 46, no. 24). This is borne out by the fact that John de Romsey appears in the transaction of 1318 as placing his claim also, in order, evidently, to quitclaim to Ingram Berenger.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

walling is of flint, with wrought stones irregularly built into the facing, and the roofs are tiled, the woodwork being good plain modern work, with an effective framing to carry the western turret. The fittings are entirely modern.

Very little can be said of the age of the building, as every part except a little of the north wall of the nave has been refaced or rebuilt. In 1879 the chancel was rebuilt, with the re-use of two old windows and a doorway on the south, the vestry and the south porch added, and the west buttresses and part of the west wall of the nave renewed. No details earlier than c. 1325 are to be seen.

The chancel has a modern east window of two trefoiled lights with a square head, a south-east window of a single trefoiled light, of 14th-century work re-used, and a south-west window of two trefoiled lights, also re-used. Between them is a doorway with 14th-century jambs and modern four-centred head. The sill of the south-east window serves as a sedile, and to the east is a modern credence recess with a shelf.

The vestry, on the north side, has a small single light on the east, and a two-light window, and an outer doorway in the north wall, and opens to the chancel by a segmental chamfered arch.

The chancel arch is two-centred, and has two chamfered orders. It has been retooled, which gives it a modern appearance, but the masonry is probably of 14th-century date. Beneath it is a stone screen of three trefoiled openings in 14th-century style; it purports to be a reproduction of an old stone screen of which only the springers of the side arches remained.

The only window in the south wall of the nave at the south-east and that opposite to it in the north wall are 14th-century windows of two trefoiled lights of unusual design. The main lights only are old, and have a transom over them, the sexfoiled opening filling the two-centred head of the window being entirely modern, but apparently following the old design. The mullions and tracery have a roll on the outer order. The south window has the lower stones of a label with head stops. The second window on the north side is a modern copy of the others.

The south doorway has continuous mouldings and a two-centred arch of 14th-century date, a good deal retooled, and the modern west window of the nave has three trefoiled lights under a low segmental arch.

The turret contains three bells, the treble bearing the black letter inscription, 'Johannes Cristi care dingnare pro nobis orare,' with a cross between the first and last words, and a medallion between all the other words, with a man's head in the centre surrounded by the inscription, 'Balthasar Caspar Melchoir.' The second bell is inscribed, 'GOD · BE · OVR · GUYD R.B. 1600,' and the tenor, 'Sancte Nicolae ora pro nobis.'

The plate consists of a Sheffield-plated chalice and paten, c. 1820.

The registers contain (1) baptisms 1563 to 1727, marriages 1548 to 1721, and burials 1565 to 1723; (2) baptisms 1743 to 1789 and burials 1756 to 1789; and at the end are two pages of baptisms and burials for 1801 to 1805, and burials 1813 and 1814 on the first page; (3) baptisms 1789 to 1812.

The church of Shipton Bellinger ADVOWSON was held in 1086 by the lord of the manor,<sup>58</sup> but early in the 13th century it was granted to the priory of Newark (co. Surr.) by Ruald de Calva and Beatrice his wife,<sup>59</sup> and the grant was confirmed by Robert de Tregoz, overlord of Shipton Bellinger<sup>60</sup> (q.v.). The rectory was appropriated to the prior and convent, who presented a vicar.<sup>61</sup> The priory continued in possession until the Dissolution, when the patronage passed to the Crown, by whom it was leased out until the middle of the 17th century.<sup>62</sup> The advowson belonged in 1665 and 1667 to John Shirley,<sup>63</sup> and from him passed to the family of Macham, who presented as late as 1761,<sup>64</sup> after which date the descent is obscure. In 1859 the vicarage was in the gift of the executors of the late Mr. Thomas Assheton Smith,<sup>65</sup> whose widow and sole legatee on her death the same year left all her property to her nephew, Mr. Francis Sloane-Stanley.<sup>66</sup> Mr. Stanley sold the advowson in 1877 to Sir John Kelk, bart.,<sup>67</sup> from whom it descended to his son and heir, Sir John William Kelk, bart.,<sup>68</sup> the present patron.

A chapel in Snoddington was granted with the church of Shipton Bellinger to the Prior and convent of Newark (co. Surr.).<sup>69</sup>

In 1312 Ingram Berenger, lord of both manors, obtained permission to grant land in Shipton to maintain a chaplain in the church there,<sup>70</sup> and twelve years later he granted the advowson of the church of Alderton in Whiteparish (co. Wilts.) to the Prioress and convent of Amesbury (co. Wilts.) to find two chaplains to celebrate divine service daily in the parish church of Shipton Bellinger and in the chapel of Snoddington for his good estate and for his soul after death.<sup>71</sup> There are apparently no endowed charities in the parish.

EAST TYTHERLEY

Tederleg (xi cent.); Tyderleg, Thundersleye, Tydresle (xiii cent.); Estderlegh, Tuderley, Estuderley (xiv cent.).

The parish of East Tytherley covers an area of 2,678 acres, of which 984½ acres are arable land, 879½ acres permanent grass and 761 acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The village is almost in the centre of the parish on the road from West Tytherley to Lockerley. Lockerley Hall, the residence of Captain Dalgety, lies south of the village. It is a red-brick house with stone dressings, built (1868-71) in Elizabethan style and nearly surrounded by a terraced garden. In the park, surrounding the site of the old Tytherley House, there are some fine cedar, elm and other trees, most of which were planted by Denys Rolle (1748-97); there are also two grand avenues of yew trees. The cedars, of which more than thirty specimens survive, were brought to Tytherley by Denys Rolle about 1787 and his six daughters helped to plant them. The church of St. Peter is about a mile away from Lockerley Hall. Queenwood Farm<sup>2</sup> is near the Roman road, which runs through the northern extremity of the parish, and is reached from the village by the shady walk known as Queenwood Avenue. Hildon House in the north-eastern extremity of the parish, formerly known as Rose Hill, was purchased about 1857 by Sir Augustus Webster, who resided there until his death in 1886. His son, the eighth and present baronet (Sir Augustus Webster), pulled down the house and built the present structure of white brick and stone with Renaissance features. In 1902 he sold it, with the attached estate in Broughton and other adjacent parishes, to Mr. George Briscoe, the present owner. The soil is clay and the subsoil chalk.

The manor of EAST TYTHERLEY MANORS had at an early date four adjoining members—Lockerley, Holbury, East Dean and Broughton.<sup>3</sup> These members were separated from it by royal grant to John de Vienna and Ellen his wife at the beginning of the 14th century,<sup>4</sup> and the estate was reduced to its extent at the time of the Domesday Survey. It had then extended into Lockerley,<sup>5</sup> and the manor was consequently called the manor of EAST TYTHERLEY AND LOCKERLEY or TYTHERLEY AND LOCKERLEY. In the 15th century it was known also as QUEEN COURT, a name which it probably acquired during the time that it was held by Queen Philippa.

The manor was held in 1086 of the king by Alwi the son of Saulf, whose father had held it as an alod of Edward the Confessor.<sup>6</sup> Local tradition has it that two tenants of the manor had fought for Harold and had both been killed at the battle of Hastings. Thomas de Columbars, who was in possession at the end of the 12th century, was living in 1229.<sup>7</sup> Michael de Columbars, probably his son, inclosed the park of Tytherley with a ditch and hedge,<sup>8</sup> and in 1245 his grandson Matthew<sup>9</sup> paid 100 marks for leave to keep it inclosed and to make other inclosures.<sup>10</sup> Matthew seems to have fought for the barons in the Civil War,<sup>11</sup> but must afterwards have made his peace with the king, for in 1270 he received a grant for his good service that he and his heirs should be quit of the lawing of their dogs within the manor of Tytherley with its members of Lockerley and Holbury, which were within the metes of the forest of Buckholt.<sup>12</sup>

Matthew de Columbars married Maud the daughter of Eudo de Moreville,<sup>13</sup> and died childless about 1273. He was succeeded by his brother Michael,<sup>14</sup> who granted the manor to Sir John de Cobeham for the yearly rent of a black sparrow-hawk.<sup>15</sup> This grant seems to have been made for life only with reversion to the Crown, for in 1310 the king's tenant, John de Vienna, was in possession.<sup>16</sup> Isabel de Hastings was lady of the manor of East Tytherley in 1333,<sup>17</sup> and it is possible that she was then holding it by virtue of a grant made by Edward II in 1311 by her husband Ralph de Monthermer and his sons Thomas and Edward.<sup>18</sup> On the death of Isabel in 1335 the custody of the manor was granted to

<sup>9</sup> Matthew is called son of Michael in the Charter Roll, but in the St. Denys Cartulary Gilbert de Columbars is clearly described as son of Michael and father of Matthew (Add. MS. 15314, fol. 111 d.). Gilbert de Columbars was certainly at one time lord of East Tytherley, for in the same cartulary there is mention of his 'court of Tiderleg' (ibid. fol. 87 d.).

This grant was enrolled in 1310, when the estate was in the hands of John de Vienna, and was disputed the same year by John de Lisle, the husband of Nichola daughter and heiress of Michael de Columbars (ibid.). In 1363 his great-grandson, also John de Lisle, sued Sir John de Cobeham, the great-grandson of Michael's grantee, apparently on the plea that the grant had only been made for purposes of re-ensfeoffment. Cobeham pleaded in answer that he was not seised of the manor (De Banc. R. Hil. 36 Edw. III, m. 38). The Lisle claim was renewed in 1402, when Chippenham was in possession (De Banc. R. East. 3 Hen. IV, m. 134), and again in 1407, when the estate had been given to Sir Francis Court (De Banc. R. 585, East. 8 Hen. IV, m. 441). On both these occasions the defendant successfully pleaded the king's grant.

<sup>18</sup> Cal. Pat. 1307-13, p. 319. In the grant the manor is called the manor of West Tytherley, but this is probably a mistake for East Tytherley. West Tytherley was not in the hands of the Crown at this date. Ralph de Monthermer was certainly lord of East Tytherley in 1316 (Feud. Aids, ii, 311).

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

William de Montagu,<sup>19</sup> but in the same year the king gave the manor to Queen Philippa,<sup>20</sup> who continued to hold it until her death in 1369. Edward III then granted it to Walter Chippenham for ten years,<sup>21</sup> and extended the grant in 1372 to a life grant for a yearly rent of £45.<sup>22</sup> This was cancelled in 1402, when Henry IV, 'with the assent of Walter and Alice his wife,' granted the manor to Sir Francis Court and his wife Joan, and the longer liver of them, at a rent of £20.<sup>23</sup> In 1408 the king gave up his claim to the rent and also granted the reversion to Sir Francis and his heirs male.<sup>24</sup> Sir Francis Court died in 1413,<sup>25</sup> leaving the manor to his elder son Thomas, then nine years old, who died under age in 1424 and was succeeded by his brother Henry.<sup>26</sup> Henry seems to have died childless, for the estate reverted to the Crown,<sup>27</sup> and was granted by Edward IV in 1462 to Gerard de la Hey and Richard Hamond to hold for seven years.<sup>28</sup> Six months later, however, he granted the same estate for life to his yeoman John Rede,<sup>29</sup> who afterwards 'complained that he could not receive the issues, but that the said Gerard and Richard prevented him under colour of the first letters patent. He therefore prayed that the first letters patent should be revoked, and accordingly . . . the said letters patent to the said Gerard and Richard were annulled.'<sup>30</sup> John Rede seems to have died shortly afterwards, for in 1464 Elizabeth the queen of Edward IV received a grant of the manor.<sup>31</sup> Richard III on his accession granted a ten years' lease of the manor to John Tresswell, Thomas Hylles and Richard Hyll at a rent of £21 6s. 8d.<sup>32</sup>

In 1496 'the manor of Tytherley and Lockerley, formerly Columbars,' was granted by Henry VII for a yearly rent of £33 13s. 4d. to George Bainbridge,<sup>33</sup> who died in 1512, and was succeeded by Roger his son and heir.<sup>34</sup> In July 1558 Thomas Bainbridge, the son and heir of Roger, was burnt for heresy,<sup>35</sup> and the estate passed in accordance with a settlement made by him to his kinswoman Anne the wife of Richard Giffard.<sup>36</sup> Her son Sir Henry Giffard died in 1592, leaving two sons,<sup>37</sup> of whom the elder, William, succeeded his grandmother on her death in 1594<sup>38</sup>; he died in 1597,<sup>39</sup> and the estate passed to his brother Richard, who sold it in 1626 to Sir Henry Wallop.<sup>40</sup> In 1653 Robert the son and heir of Sir Henry Wallop sold the manor to Joseph Garthwaite and Richard Wither,<sup>41</sup> who conveyed it in the following year to Henry Rolle, Lord Chief Justice of the Upper Bench of Westminster.<sup>42</sup> The Rolles continued in possession until 1801,<sup>43</sup> when John Lord Rolle sold the manor to William Steele Wakeford of Andover,<sup>44</sup> whose sons and co-heirs sold it about 1822 to Mr. Francis Bailey and Mr. Goldsmid, afterwards Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmid, bart.<sup>45</sup> As a Jew the latter was precluded from owning landed estates in England, and tradition says that, being anxious to become a landed proprietor and having an idea that the Emancipation Act would shortly be passed, he found the purchase money, the conveyance being made in the name of Bailey, who, however, refused to give up the property even after the Act had been passed. A compromise was effected in 1833, when the property was divided; Mr. Bailey took one moiety of the lands, and Sir Isaac the other moiety together with the house and the manorial rights.<sup>46</sup> In 1849 Mr. Bailey's moiety was sold to Mr. afterwards Sir William Fothergill Cooke, one of the inventors of the electric telegraph; he built here a house, which he called 'Oaklands,' in 1850, and sold it together with his moiety of the estate in 1866 to Mr. Frederick Gonnerman Dalgety.<sup>47</sup> In the following year Mr. Dalgety, finding that he could not easily adapt the house to his requirements, pulled it down and built upon its site the mansion now known as Lockerley Hall.

Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmid's moiety of the estate passed from him to Sir Francis Goldsmid and then in succession to the latter's nephew, Sir Julian Goldsmid, who sold it in 1879 to Mr. F. G. Dalgety,<sup>48</sup> whose eldest son, Captain Frederick John Dalgety, is the present owner of the whole estate.

East Tytherley Manor House, the home of the Giffards and Rolles, was a fine Elizabethan mansion, which stood close to the parish church. Shortly after the Rolle family bought the house it was very much altered, and some fine ceilings and friezes by Parisian artists were added. The Goldsmids did not occupy the house after the time of the Corn Laws agitation; it was tenanted for many years by General Yates, uncle of Sir Robert Peel, until his death in 1854, and was afterwards allowed to remain unoccupied except by caretakers. In 1903 a portion of the roof fell in, and the rest of the building having become much dilapidated Captain Dalgety was reluctantly compelled to have it pulled down. It was then found that a quantity of the materials had been used before, and upon excavating the foundations a cellar doorway of two stop-chamfered orders was discovered apparently of late 13th-century date, thus to some extent confirming the local tradition that there was a fine manor-house upon the same site in the reign of Henry III.

There were two mills in East Tytherley at the time of the Domesday Survey<sup>49</sup>; these are said to have stood on the sites of Holbury Mill and Ford Mill, the former of which is now on the boundary between the parishes of East Dean and Lockerley, and partly in each parish, while the latter is solely in Lockerley.

Another appurtenance of the manor was a fishery of the water there from the bridge called 'Totesbrigge' to 'Shydesbrigge.'<sup>50</sup>

A small manor in Tytherley was held at the time of the Domesday Survey by Papald' of Gilbert de Breteville, and had previously been held as an alod of King Edward by Chening.<sup>51</sup> It is possible that this holding may be identified with HOLBURY (q.v.), now in the parish of Lockerley, which was certainly a member of East Tytherley in the reign of Henry III.<sup>52</sup>

The church of ST. PETER CHURCH consists of a chancel 32 ft. 1 in. by 18 ft. 7 in. with a north-west vestry, a nave 59 ft. 3 in. by 23 ft. 10 in., a north transeptal tower 12 ft. square, a south transept 13 ft. 7 in. by 10 ft. and a north porch. The history of the church is of the simplest; the chancel and nave as they now stand were built about the middle of the 13th century and remained unaltered until 1863, when the porch, transept, vestry and tower were added, the latter in 1893, the others earlier. The church was also reroofed and the walls were slightly raised, and the floor put at a higher level, a number of old tombstones being covered up in the process, and the whole building rather drastically restored. The tower was added in 1898 and in digging the foundations for it a silver penny of the time of Henry III was found.

The chancel is lit by seven original lancet lights, three to the east and two each to north and south, with plain rear arches and splays and external chamfers and rebates for wooden glazing frames. One of these (on the north) now opens into the vestry. At the south-west is a plain pointed priest's door, also original, and in a position precluding the existence of a low side window. On the north is a modern door to the vestry. The latter is lit on the north by a small two-light window and has an external door to the east. The two-centred chancel arch is also original, with two chamfered orders and an undercut label with mask drips. The responds have half-octagonal pilasters with moulded capitals carried round the imposts to the drips of the label. Externally the chancel has been a good deal modernized, and the buttresses, though of correct detail, appear quite new.

The nave was originally lit by six lancets on each side similar to, but larger than, those of the chancel, and arranged three on each side of the north and south doors. Two of those on the south have been destroyed by the addition of the transept and two on the north have been reset in the tower. In both cases the windows removed are the pair immediately east of the doors, which are of the same date and type as the windows. The south door, now blocked, was once covered by a porch which was destroyed at the building of the transept. This transept opens to the nave by a modern arch of similar detail to the chancel arch. The tower arch is also of similar detail but is not carried quite to the floor level.

In the west wall is a large lancet of the same date as the others and also with the external rebate. The buttresses of the nave are precisely similar to those of the chancel and are offset at a steep pitch. Externally against the south-east buttress is inset a small defaced corbel head.

The south transept has a window of three lancet lights on the south and an external door to the east.

The tower is entered by a door from the porch. It is of three stages with a wide tiled offset below the top one and is surmounted by a shingled spire. The belfry openings are plain lancets and two of the lancets of the nave are reset, one in the second stage to the north and one in the ground stage to the east. In the ground stage is also a three-light lancet window.

The porch is set in the angle of the west wall of the tower and the north wall of the nave. It has a two-light window to the west and an entrance with shafted jambs.

The roofs and open seating throughout are modern. A number of fragments of carved deal enriched mouldings of very late 17th-century date are in some of the pews and stalls, and the altar rails formed of a fine carved oak balustrade were brought from the manor-house. The sawn-off end of a 17th-century communion table forms a credence shelf.

The late 13th-century font has an octagonal bowl and a circular moulded stem and base.

At the west end of the nave are the mutilated remains of a 16th-century monument, consisting of the upper part of an altar tomb of Richard Giffard, second son of Sir William Giffard of Schill, kt., who died 15 November 1568, aged 69, and Anne his wife, daughter of John Goring of Burton (co. Suss.). There are small effigies of Richard in armour, his wife and their three sons Henry, John and William in civilian dress, and one daughter Katherine wife of Sir Henry Wallop of Farley. There is a long inscription in English.

Above are the arms of Giffard, gules ten bezants, with a helm crested with a hand holding a bunch of lilies. Two shields below have Giffard impaling Goring quarterly of five: 1, a chevron between three rings; 2, on a chief indented three molets; 3, on a chief three roundels; 4, on a bend four leopards passant; 5, a fesse and a quarter with a leopard's head therein; and this quartered coat of Goring alone. Preserved on the tomb is a visored funeral helm with a crest carved in wood.

In the window of the vestry is a well-preserved piece of 13th-century glass representing St. Peter. In the porch windows are two figures of the same date and similar in design representing a bishop and an archbishop in mass vestments, the latter having a pall on his chasuble. Both are bearded and mitred and wear green dalmatics.

There are eight bells in the modern tower, two of which were added in 1900.

The plate consists of two chalices, two patens, a flagon and an almsdish, all of silver. The chalices were given by Joseph Dover, curate, in 1705, and the patens bear the same date.

The registers are as follows:—(1) all entries, 1562 to 1682; (2) the same, 1683 to 1731; (3) the same, 1734 to 1812, with marriages to 1754 only; (4) marriages, 1754 to 1812.

At the time of the Domesday Survey East Tytherley was a chapelry annexed to Mottisfont and forming part of the property of Thomas, Archbishop of York,<sup>53</sup> but it was afterwards separated from it and became a separate parish.<sup>54</sup> The church, together with certain lands belonging to it, was granted to the priory of St. Denys by Southampton by Michael de Columbars, lord of East Tytherley. This charter was confirmed by Michael's son Gilbert de Columbars with the consent of Matthew his son and heir.<sup>55</sup> Matthew de Columbars confirmed the charters of his father and grandfather, and in addition granted to the church of East Tytherley and the vicar of that church in free alms 1 acre in East Tytherley which Nicholas the former vicar had held of him.<sup>56</sup> Adam Orlton, Bishop of Winchester, confirmed the appropriation of the church to the Prior and convent of St. Denys in 1334.<sup>57</sup>

At the Dissolution the rectory and the advowson of the vicarage fell into the hands of the king, who granted them in 1544 to Robert Luard and Alice his wife.<sup>58</sup> John Reade, the owner in 1581, sold them to Sir Henry Giffard,<sup>59</sup> who died in 1592, leaving as his heir his son William.<sup>60</sup> William succeeded to the manor on the death of his grandmother in 1594,<sup>61</sup> and from that date the manor and advowson have followed the same descent.

The living is a perpetual curacy 'donative,' but now called a 'vicarage' under the Bishop of Oxford's Act. Its value is only a rent-charge of £40 on the manor augmented to £120 by the voluntary gift of the lords of the manor since 1803. There is no vicarage, but the vicar resides in a house belonging to the patron as a tenant at will and at a peppercorn rent.<sup>62</sup>

SHERFIELD ENGLISH CHURCH : PANEL OF PULPIT

WEST TYTHERLEY

Tederleg (xi cent.); Tyderle, Chuderleg, Westhuderleg, Westiderleg, Tuderlegh (xiii cent.); West Uderle, Westaderle, Westerdeley (xiv cent.); West Tyderley, Westtytherley (xvi cent.).

The parish of West Tytherley contains 2,918 acres, of which 1,089½ acres are arable land, 961½ acres permanent grass and 710½ acres woodland.<sup>1</sup>

The village is almost in the centre of the parish; at its southern end is the church, built in 1833 in place of a church which stood a few yards from the present site.

Norman Court, a large house restored by the late Mr. Thomas Baring and now occupied by Mr. Washington Singer, is in the north-west corner of the parish, and is surrounded by a well-wooded park of more than 150 acres. South of the park and on the road from West Tytherley village to the common there are six almshouses, each with a garden, for old people.

Over the western boundary of the shire and parish is a detached portion of Winterslow which formed part of the great serjeanty of West Tytherley in the 13th century.<sup>2</sup>

By an Order in Council of March 1883 the Hampshire portion of West Dean parish, which until 1474 was a separate Hampshire parish called West Dean All Saints, was amalgamated with West Tytherley. The county boundary also underwent slight change, and the site of All Saints' Church is now in Wiltshire.

The soil is clay and chalk, and the subsoil chalk. The chief crops are wheat, barley and oats.

Buckholt (Bocholt, Bokolt, xiii cent.; Boucholte, Bokholte, Blockholt, Brokholt, xiv cent.), formerly extra-parochial, is now a separate civil parish lying to the north of the Tytherleys; it contains 1,102 acres, of which 433½ are arable, 370½ permanent grass and 50 woodland.<sup>3</sup> There is no church, and the only dwelling-places are Buckholt Farm and some cottages. Queenwood College, which stood on the border of East Tytherley parish, was entirely demolished about 1903, after having been partially destroyed by fire. This building, at first called Harmony Hall, was built in 1841 as the home of a socialistic community under Robert Owen. The scheme soon failed and the place was left unoccupied till 1847, when the building, together with the farm of 600 acres, passed into other hands. It was afterwards used for a school, which was given up at the beginning of 1896; here Tyndall and Frankland held appointments and Professor Fawcett was a pupil.

The Roman road from Winchester to Sarum runs past Buckholt Farm and through the southern part of the parish. Cold Harbour, the site of mediaeval glass-works, lies a little to the north, and the remains of glass-works are also to be found near Hassock.<sup>4</sup> In the north-eastern part of the parish, not far from Broughton Down, is a tumulus known as the Turret.

A few fine specimens of the beech-tree, from which Buckholt is said to have derived its name, are still to be found, but the site of the forest is now occupied principally by rolling downs, hardly cultivated. The soil is clay and light loam, and the subsoil chalk. The chief crops are wheat, barley, oats and turnips.

The manor of WEST TYTHERLEY MANORS is perhaps represented by the land which is said in Domesday Book to have been held of King Edward as three manors by three freemen, two of whom were killed at the battle of Hastings<sup>5</sup>; this estate belonged at the time of the Survey to Alwi the son of Turber, but his right to it was disputed by the men of the hundred, who declared that they had never seen his predecessor Alwin Ret given seisin, and that unless the king bore witness to his claim he had nothing there.<sup>6</sup>

At the beginning of the 13th century West Tytherley was held of the king by Geoffrey de Porton and Richard de Cardeville, who both held in serjeanty, viz. by the service of a mounted serjeant, with hauberk, iron cap and lance, for forty days within the realm of England.<sup>7</sup> On the death of the former in 1220 his moiety passed to his brother, Robert de Porton,<sup>8</sup> who died six years later, leaving as heirs his nephew Walter de Langford and his niece Maud daughter of Gilbert and wife of Hugh de Burguynon.<sup>9</sup> The estate in West Tytherley was apparently assigned to Walter, and from him passed before 1253<sup>10</sup> to his son Roger de Langford, who was succeeded before 1272 by a Walter de Langford, probably his son. The latter granted his moiety of the manor, in exchange for the manor of Little Winterbourne (co. Wilts.),<sup>11</sup> for life to Robert Waleran, who died in 1272, leaving a minor as his heir.<sup>12</sup> The estate in West Tytherley was then taken into the king's hands, but was afterwards restored to Walter de Langford on condition that the manor of Little Winterbourne should be kept for the king's use until the heir of Robert Waleran came of age.<sup>13</sup>

In 1276 the custody of part of the lands which had belonged to Walter de Langford was granted during the minority of his daughter and heir Joan to Walter de Helyun at a rent of £9 9s.<sup>14</sup> He surrendered the lease four years later, and a fresh grant was made to Hugh Escote,<sup>15</sup> who had married Joan the heiress of Walter.<sup>16</sup> She died seised of the estate in 1316, leaving a son and heir Walter,<sup>17</sup> who in 1333 obtained licence to settle his moiety of West Tytherley Manor on himself for life with remainder in fee-tail to Hugh, his son.<sup>18</sup> Walter died in 1342,<sup>19</sup> and in 1350 Hugh conveyed the land to William de Overton,<sup>20</sup> who died about 1361, leaving a son and heir Thomas.<sup>21</sup> Thomas died in August 1370<sup>22</sup>; his son Michael, who was born after his father's death, died a minor in 1389,<sup>23</sup> when the estate passed to Elizabeth the wife of Robert Tawke and daughter of Isabel the sister of Thomas.<sup>24</sup> It then remained in the Tawke family<sup>25</sup> until William Tawke died in 1504, leaving two daughters, of whom the younger, Joan, succeeded to his lands in West Tytherley,<sup>26</sup> and died in 1561, leaving as heir Humphrey,<sup>27</sup> her eldest son by her first husband, Richard Ryman. He left the estate at his death in 1568 to his son and heir John,<sup>28</sup> who was holding in 1586,<sup>29</sup> but subsequently sold the estate to the Whiteheads,<sup>30</sup> a family which had been established at Norman Court in this parish since 1433.

Richard de Cardeville, who held the other moiety of West Tytherley Manor in the reign of Henry III, died about 1247, leaving as his heir his son Sir William de Cardeville.<sup>31</sup> Sir William died in 1254; he was succeeded by his son Richard,<sup>32</sup> who enfeoffed Richard Bukesgate and Isabel his wife of the estate.<sup>33</sup> Richard Bukesgate died in 1310<sup>34</sup> and his wife in 1315<sup>35</sup>; their heir was their son Adam, who left his moiety of West Tytherley Manor, at his death in 1333, to his three daughters and co-heirs: Joan the wife of Thomas Bynedone, Helen the wife of Richard Bettesthorn, and Katherine the wife of Giles Escote.<sup>36</sup>

William Frere, who may have been the grandson of Joan Bynedone, held part of a moiety of West Tytherley Manor in 1377<sup>37</sup>; it seems to have been bought before 1400 by the descendants of Helen and Katherine.<sup>38</sup>

Helen the wife of Richard Bettesthorn had three daughters and co-heirs, Agnes, Joan and Margaret.<sup>39</sup> The eldest, Agnes, married Henry Bradway, who survived her and died seised of her land in 1361, leaving as his heir their son John.<sup>40</sup> Joan and Margaret granted the reversion of their property in 1364 to John Bettesthorn,<sup>41</sup> who was seised in 1377<sup>42</sup> and died in 1380, leaving a son and heir John, who died in 1399.<sup>43</sup> His heir was his daughter Elizabeth, the wife of Sir John Berkley,<sup>44</sup> who seems to have conveyed the land shortly after her father's death to her kinsman, John Bradway.<sup>45</sup> In 1400 John Bradway died seised of lands in West Tytherley which he held as parcel of the great serjeanty with Robert Tawke and William Escote; he left as his heir his daughter Katherine, then aged twelve.<sup>46</sup>

Katherine, the youngest daughter of Adam Bukesgate and wife of Giles Escote, died seised of a third part of the moiety of West Tytherley Manor in 1361,<sup>47</sup> leaving as her heir her son William, who in 1377 obtained leave to settle the estate in tail on his heirs by his wife Elizabeth.<sup>48</sup> William's descendants must have remained in possession of the land for more than a hundred years, for in 1508 Walter Escote, who was probably a great-grandson, settled on John Everard, the son of his daughter Margaret, his property in West Tytherley,<sup>49</sup> which apparently included at this date the other two-thirds of the moiety of which Adam Bukesgate had died seised.<sup>50</sup>

In 1519 Sir John Dawtreay died seised of this estate,<sup>51</sup> which was described as the 'manor' in a grant of the wardship of his son and heir Francis<sup>52</sup>; it cannot, however, have been the whole manor, for one moiety was then the property of the Rymans. Francis Dawtreay married Blanche, the kinswoman and heir of Robert Willoughby Lord Broke<sup>53</sup>; he was knighted by Henry VIII and made Sheriff of Dorset and Somerset in 1546, and of Hants<sup>54</sup> in 1548. Sir Francis seems to have sold the property before

1552, for in that year Thomas Welles died seised of it, leaving as his heir his son Gilbert.<sup>65</sup> About 1574 William Stanesby died seised of the estate and was succeeded by his brother John,<sup>66</sup> who may have sold it to the Whiteheads.<sup>67</sup>

In 1684 Richard Whitehead was the lord of the manor,<sup>68</sup> which subsequently followed the descent of Shirley in Millbrook until the beginning of the 19th century, when it was sold by the Thistlethwayte family to Charles Wall,<sup>69</sup> who on his death in 1815 was succeeded by his son Charles Baring Wall. The latter died unmarried in 1853 and the manor then passed in accordance with his will to his mother's nephew, Thomas Baring,<sup>60</sup> second son of Sir Thomas Baring, bart., her eldest brother. Thomas Baring, who was M.P. for Huntingdon, and head of the great mercantile house of Baring Brothers, died unmarried in 1873,<sup>61</sup> having devised his estates to his cousin William Henry Baring.<sup>62</sup> The latter's son, Mr. Francis Charles Baring, was lord of the manor in 1906, but subsequently sold it to Mr. Washington Singer, the present owner.<sup>63</sup>

The manor of WEST DEAN was held of the king in chief as part of the barony of Dean.<sup>64</sup> Before the Conquest Boda held it of King Edward as an alod, and after the Conquest it passed to Waleran the Huntsman,<sup>65</sup> whose descendants assumed the name of Waleran and held the manor<sup>66</sup> until the death of Walter Waleran about 1200.<sup>67</sup> He left three daughters: Cecily wife of John de Monmouth, Isabel wife of William de Nevill, and Aubree, who married firstly Robert de Pole, secondly John de Ingham and thirdly William de Botereaux.<sup>68</sup> John de Monmouth, son and successor of John and Cecily, was executed in 1280-1 for the murder of Adam de Gilbert, chaplain of Wells, and in 1305 his share of the manor was restored by the king to his cousins, the representatives of the other two daughters of Walter Waleran.<sup>69</sup>

Aubree de Botereaux died in 1269-70 and was succeeded by Oliver Ingham, her son by her second husband.<sup>70</sup> The manor descended from father to son in the Ingham family<sup>71</sup> until 1344, when Oliver Ingham died leaving co-heirs, his daughter Joan wife of Roger Lestrangle, and his granddaughter Mary daughter of John Curzon.<sup>72</sup> Mary subsequently married Stephen Tumby and died in 1349-50 holding land at East Dean belonging to the barony of Dean, her heir being her aunt Joan Lestrangle,<sup>73</sup> who married as a second husband Sir Miles Stapleton of Bedale. He died 1364-5 and his son Miles succeeded.<sup>74</sup> The property descended in the Stapleton family until the death of Sir Miles Stapleton, grandson of the last-named Miles, in 1466. He left co-heirs, his daughters Elizabeth wife of Sir William Calthorp and Joan wife of Christopher Harcourt.<sup>75</sup> There is no indication that any part of the manor passed to the Calthorps. In 1500 Miles Harcourt son of Christopher and Joan released all his claim in West Dean to Sir John Huddleston, his mother's second husband.<sup>76</sup> This was no doubt a quitclaim to Sir John for life, for this moiety of the manor remained in the Harcourt family until 1578-9, when it was sold by Walter Harcourt and his son Robert to Henry Giffard.<sup>77</sup>

The share of the manor held by Isabel wife of William Nevill passed from her to her daughter Joan, who married Jordan de St. Martin.<sup>78</sup> Joan, then called Joan de Nevill, died in 1263, when her son William de St. Martin succeeded to the estate.<sup>79</sup> William died in 1290-1,<sup>80</sup> and the estate passed from his son and successor Reginald in 1314-15 to his son Laurence.<sup>81</sup> The latter died in 1318, leaving two daughters, Sibyl and Joan,<sup>82</sup> but the estate was held by Sibyl widow of Laurence and afterwards wife of John de Scures until her death in 1349, when Laurence, a posthumous son of Laurence de St. Martin, succeeded to the moiety of the manor.<sup>83</sup> He died in 1385-6, leaving as his heirs his nephew Henry Popham son of his sister Sibyl, and his great-nephew Thomas son of Laurence Calston son of his second sister Joan.<sup>84</sup> The estate in West Dean was evidently assigned to Henry Popham, for he died seised of it in 1418-19, leaving Stephen his son and heir.<sup>85</sup> Stephen and his brother John both died without male issue, and the estate having been entailed on heirs male passed to their cousin John son of Sir John Popham.<sup>86</sup> He died in 1463 without issue, and his heirs were the four daughters of Stephen Popham above named.<sup>87</sup> This property in West Dean was assigned to Elizabeth wife of John Barentyn.<sup>88</sup> John's grandson William Barentyn<sup>89</sup> sold the estate to Sir William Essex, who died seised of it 1550-1.<sup>90</sup> The moiety of the manor was sold in 1571-2 by Thomas Essex, probably the grandson of William, to James Yate of Upham,<sup>91</sup> who died in 1576, leaving as his heirs his kinsfolk Arthur Whitehart, John Bright, John Simpson, Clara Jones, Jane Baker, and Joan Haines,<sup>92</sup> by whom the manor was sold in 1577 to Henry Giffard.<sup>93</sup>

Henry Giffard died in 1592 holding the whole of the manor of West Dean, and was succeeded by his son William,<sup>94</sup> on whose death in 1597 the manor passed to his brother Richard.<sup>95</sup> He was afterwards knighted and sold the manor in 1618 to George Evelyn,<sup>96</sup> who was succeeded in 1636 by his son John.<sup>97</sup> Elizabeth daughter and heir of John married Robert Pierrepont, and her three sons, Robert, William and Evelyn, became successively Earls of Kingston-upon-Hull.<sup>98</sup> The last was created Duke of Kingston-upon-Hull in 1715 and died in 1726, when he was succeeded by his grandson Evelyn,<sup>99</sup> the last Duke of Kingston-upon-Hull. In 1733 the manor was vested by Evelyn Duke of Kingston-upon-Hull in trustees,<sup>100</sup> of whom it was apparently purchased by Arthur Lord Ranelagh.<sup>101</sup> He died without issue in 1754, leaving West Dean to his widow Selina.<sup>102</sup> On her death in 1781 the manor seems to have passed to the representatives of the six sisters of Arthur Lord Ranelagh, and one-twelfth of it was sold in 1820 by Richard Wynne and Catherine his wife, and Richard Beaver Wynne, to Thomas Winch, the remaining eleven-twelfths being conveyed to the same grantee at the same date by John Willoughby Earl of Enniskillen, John Burdett and Mary Anne his wife and Charles Marquess of Drogheda, the descendants of Elizabeth Cole, Margaret Burdett and Mary Moore, three of the sisters of Lord Ranelagh.<sup>103</sup> Winch was evidently a trustee for Charles Baring Wall, to whom the manor passed in 1820.<sup>104</sup> It subsequently passed with Norman Court and West Tytherley to Mr. Washington Singer, the present owner.

NORMAN COURT, which takes its name from its 14th-century owners, lies at the north-west extremity of the parish. It was held of Waleran the Huntsman at the time of the Domesday Survey by Roger, and had previously been held by Alvrice of King Edward as an alod.<sup>105</sup> The overlordship continued with the descendants of Waleran as late as the 16th century, this manor being held of their manor of West Dean.<sup>106</sup> The actual owner of the estate at the beginning of the 13th century was William de Loverez, who was returned by the Testa de Nevill as holding 1 hide of land in West Tytherley by the service of the fourth part of a knight's fee of the old enfeoffment of Aubree de Botereaux.<sup>107</sup> He had died before 1243, in which year his son and heir was ordered to be delivered to Stephen Longespée, who had purchased his marriage for two palfreys.<sup>108</sup> Walter de Loverez died seised of a carucate of land in West Tytherley held of Oliver de Ingham in 1272, leaving as his heir his son John.<sup>109</sup> John de Loverez died in 1279 and was succeeded by his three-year-old son Richard,<sup>110</sup> who left the estate on his death in 1297 to his uncle Stephen de Loverez.<sup>111</sup> Stephen sold the West Bailey of Buckholt Forest in 1334 to Roger Norman,<sup>112</sup> and it is probable that the manor was included in the sale, for Roger was seised of it in 1337, in which year he received a grant of free warren in his demesne lands in West Tytherley.<sup>113</sup> He died in April 1349, leaving as heir his infant grandson Giles,<sup>114</sup> during whose minority the manor was in the custody of William de Overton at a yearly rent of £12.<sup>115</sup> Giles Norman died while he was still under age in 1362 and was succeeded by his first cousin Margaret the wife of John Chamberlayne.<sup>116</sup> From this date the manor followed the descent of Shirley in Millbrook in Buddlesgate Hundred<sup>117</sup> until the beginning of the 19th century,<sup>118</sup> when it was sold by the Thistlethwayte family to Mr. Charles Wall, together with the manor of West Tytherley<sup>119</sup> (q.v.), the descent of which it has followed up to the present day.

The EAST BAILEY of BUCKBAILIWICKS HOLT FOREST was held by the Putton family as early as the reign of Henry III, for in 1255 James de Putton died seised of 1 virgate of land in Broughton, which he held of the king 'by service of keeping the bailiwick of La Bokolt by himself on horseback and one sergeant on foot, and 20s. to the king's keeper of Clarendon.'<sup>120</sup> William the son of James de Putton succeeded to the office: he died about 1298,<sup>121</sup> leaving the bailiwick to his son John,<sup>122</sup> who at his death in 1321 left a son William as his heir.<sup>123</sup> William died in 1327,<sup>124</sup> leaving two sons, of whom the elder, John, died in 1331 while he was under age<sup>125</sup>; his heir was his brother William, who obtained seisin of the East Bailey in February 1345.<sup>126</sup>

In 1402 Thomas Kenne was seised of the 'land in Broughton and Bokholte called Estbayllie' which he conveyed in that year to John Malwayn<sup>127</sup>: the bailiwick passed shortly afterwards to John Shepton and Joan his wife, who sold it in 1412 to John Uvedale.<sup>128</sup>

In May 1485 a commission was issued to Thomas West De La Warr and others to inquire into the petition of Elizabeth Uvedale, who declared that the East Bailey of Buckholt had been demised to her jointly with her late husband Thomas Uvedale, and that it had been mistakenly confiscated at the attainder of William Uvedale of Wickham.<sup>129</sup> Elizabeth's petition must have been granted, for she was seised of the bailiwick at her death in 1488.<sup>130</sup> Her heir was her son Robert, who died in 1502, leaving the bailiwick to his half-brother William.<sup>131</sup> The great-grandson and namesake of this William is mentioned as a free forester of Buckholt in 1567,<sup>132</sup> but does not seem to have been seised of the bailiwick at his death two years later.<sup>133</sup>

After this date the history of the East Bailey becomes somewhat obscure; it seems to have been granted in 1598 by Elizabeth to Richard Richards, Henry Leyborne and Hannibal Roos for their lives,<sup>134</sup> and in 1631 by Charles I to William Fenwick 'to be held by him for thirty-one years immediately after the deaths or surrender of the aforesaid.'<sup>135</sup> In 1673 the wood called the East Bailey of Buckholt Wood was granted by Charles II to Robert Challoner to be held for twenty-seven years from 23 August 1676,<sup>136</sup> but it subsequently passed to the Whiteheads,<sup>137</sup> and has since followed the descent of the manor of Norman Court in West Tytherley (q.v.).

The WEST BAILEY of BUCKHOLT has throughout followed the descent of the manor of Norman Court in West Tytherley<sup>138</sup> (q.v.), and is now the property of Mr. Washington Singer.<sup>139</sup>

In 1334, when the bailiwick was granted by Stephen de Loverez to Roger Norman, it was found by inquisition to be worth nothing,<sup>140</sup> but in 1497 when Maurice Whitehead died seised of it it was said to be worth, with the fees and profits, 10s. yearly.<sup>141</sup> The bailiffs had also the right to have four trees yearly for firewood out of the West Bailey and all windfalls of dead trees.<sup>142</sup>

The church, of unknown dedication, consists of chancel, nave, west gallery, west tower and south porch. The chancel is ashlar built, the rest of flint and red brick. The chancel has a three-light east window of 14th-century style and two trefoiled lancets in the north and south walls. The chancel arch is modern, with foliate corbelled capitals. The nave has two modern three-light windows in the north wall and another blocked. The south side has two similar windows and a two-light window on the south side of the tower. The west and south doors are plain, and the porch is modern. There is an early 13th-century font of black marble. The bowl is square with traces of foliage on the sides, the stem circular, with four modern shafts. In the churchyard are the remains of a 15th-century octagonal panelled font. The tower is in two stages; it has a two-light west window and single belfry lights.

On the nave floor are several brasses, among them a small effigy of a lady in large angular head-dress, low-cut dress, close short sleeves, large gauntlets and girdle with pendant.

There is a small tablet dated 1632 to the second wife of Richard Whitehead, daughter of Robert Dove, another to Robert son and heir of John Whitehead, another to Sir Henry Whitehead and Dame Anne his wife (ob. 1623); with a shield of his arms; and another to Christian fifth daughter of Richard Whitehead, and wife of William Thomas, with their infant son (1655).

The tower contains three bells; the first bears no marks, the second bears in badly defined and widely-spaced Gothic capitals the inscription 'Sante Tome,' the third was cast by William Tozier in 1725.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of late 16th-century date; another of 1656 given by the Rev. Arundell Bouverie, rector, in 1829; a paten of 1741 given by Charles Baring Wall in 1829; a silver-mounted glass flagon and a pewter almsdish.

The first book of the registers contains all entries from 1654, baptisms to 1801, burials to 1678 and marriages to 1754. Burials are separately continued, in a second book, from 1678 to 1812, and marriages in a third from 1754 to 1812. The fourth book contains baptisms between 1802 and 1813.

At the time of the Domesday ADVOWSONS Survey West Tytherley was a chapelry annexed to the church of Mottisfont, which formed part of the property of Thomas Archbishop of York.<sup>143</sup> In the middle of the 12th century William Archbishop of York granted the chapel of West Tytherley, which was of the fee of Hugh de la Hale and Geoffrey de Porton, to the church of St. Denys and the canons there, to hold by the annual payment of 3s. to the church of Mottisfont.<sup>144</sup> In spite of this grant the advowson is found later in the possession of the lords of the manor: one moiety was sold by Robert brother of Geoffrey de Porton to the Prior of Ivychurch (co. Wilts.),<sup>145</sup> who conveyed it in 1271 to Robert Waleran.<sup>146</sup> The other moiety was sold in 1261 by Richard de Cardeville to John Maunsel, treasurer of York,<sup>147</sup> most of whose property was afterwards granted to Robert Waleran.<sup>148</sup> Probably this circumstance gave rise to the belief that Waleran was the sole patron, for after his death the king presented to the church, on account of the idiocy of the heir, in 1293<sup>149</sup> and again in 1295.<sup>150</sup> A few years later, however, the right of presentation was in dispute between the Escotes and Bukesgates, lords of the several moieties of West Tytherley Manor, and in 1306<sup>151</sup> an inquiry into the matter took place.

The claim of Hugh Escote and Joan his wife was based on the ground that John Maunsel had granted the advowson to Geoffrey and Clarice de Childewick, who sold to Walter de Langford, the father of the said Joan, whose heir she was.<sup>152</sup> It was true that Robert Waleran had been in possession of the right, but he had held it for life only of the grant of Walter de Langford.<sup>153</sup>

Richard and Isabel Bukesgate claimed that 'the Prior of the minster of Ederosy (Ivychurch) by feoffment of Robert de Porton made to him of the advowson, and also Richard de Cardeville . . . alternately and successively used to present to the church'<sup>154</sup>; the prior had granted his right to Robert Waleran, but Richard de Cardeville's had descended to his grandson and namesake, who had enfeoffed Richard Bukesgate and Isabel his wife jointly.<sup>155</sup> The suit was eventually decided in favour of the Escotes<sup>156</sup>; although Bishop Woodlock at first refused to admit their priest,<sup>157</sup> he afterwards yielded, and Hugh and Joan remained in undisputed possession of the advowson for the rest of their lives.<sup>158</sup> They were succeeded in 1316 by their son Walter, who twice presented to the church<sup>159</sup>; he died in 1342.<sup>160</sup> In 1350 Hugh, his son and heir, granted the advowson with the manor to William de Overton,<sup>161</sup> but the validity of this grant was afterwards disputed by King Edward III, who sued Thomas de Overton, William's son and heir, for the presentation, and was adjudged to have recovered it in 1363.<sup>162</sup> Nevertheless, the king does not seem ever to have exercised the right, and when Beaufort was Bishop of Winchester another inquiry into the ownership of the advowson was made,<sup>163</sup> on which occasion the Prior of Ivychurch appeared and formally renounced a claim which had not been put forward by his predecessors for more than a hundred and thirty years.<sup>164</sup>

The patronage was subsequently shared by Thomas Tawke and Walter Escote, the owners of the two several parts of West Tytherley Manor,<sup>165</sup> and it is probable that from about this date the owners of the moieties presented alternately<sup>166</sup> until the whole estate came into the hands of the Whiteheads. Richard Whitehead presented in 1621,<sup>167</sup> and from that date the advowson has belonged to the lords of the manor.<sup>168</sup>

The advowson of the church of All Saints at West Dean (co. Hants) was apparently assigned on the partition of the lands of Walter Waleran to Isabel de Nevill and her descendants, while that of St. Mary West Dean (co. Wilts.) was assigned to Aubree de Botereaux, for the presentations to West Dean All Saints were made by the St. Martins and Pophams<sup>169</sup> until 1474, when the parish of West Dean in Hampshire was united for ecclesiastical purposes with that of West Dean (co. Wilts.), the former being insufficient to support a rector of its own. The church was from henceforth to be a chapel, and the rector of St. Mary West Dean was to celebrate mass there once a week and to keep the chancel in repair.<sup>170</sup> The date at which the chapel was destroyed is not known, but in March 1870 a stone coffin was found in a field called 'All Hallon,' to the west of the village of West Dean, and further excavations led to the discovery of the foundations of the eastern end of the chancel.<sup>171</sup>

In 1735 John Webb by will left CHARITIES £100 for the poor not receiving relief from the parish. This sum with additions from the sacrament money was invested in £180 consols. The stock is held by the official trustees, and the dividends amounting to £4 10s. are duly distributed.

NETHER WALLOP

Wallope (xi cent.); Wappol (xii cent.); Wellop, Welhop (xiii cent.); Netherwellup (xiv cent.).

The parish of Nether Wallop covers an area of 7,391 acres, of which 4 acres are land covered with water, 3,503½ acres are arable land, 2,804½ acres are permanent grass and 489½ acres are woodland.<sup>1</sup> The ground reaches its highest point (518 ft. above the ordnance datum) near Old Lodge, the residence of the Duke of Hamilton, in the west of the parish, whence it slopes east towards the village on the banks of the Wallop Brook. Middle Wallop, forming the connecting link between Over Wallop and Nether Wallop, and partly in both parishes, contains Fifehead Manor House, the residence of Mr. Frank Potheary, on the Nether Wallop side. To the south is Wallop House, the residence of Mrs. Ross, east again of which is Heathmanstreet Manor Farm. The church of St. Andrew is at the south end of the village, and beyond it is Garlogs, the residence of Mr. Bertram Herbert Lyne-Stevens, in grounds and an estate of about 500 acres. Danebury Hill, east of the village, was the site of the Stockbridge races, which existed until 1898. The racing stables established here by John Day, subsequently owned by Thomas Cannon and at present by Mr. W. H. Moore, are well known.

The soil is chalk. The common fields were inclosed in 1797 by authority of a Private Act of the previous year.<sup>2</sup>

In Domesday Book Nether Wallop MANORS and Over Wallop are not distinguished by name, and it is therefore difficult to state which entries refer to Nether and which to Over Wallop. Hugh de Port's holdings<sup>3</sup> were in Over Wallop, and their history is given under that parish. The estate belonging to the royal manor of Broughton<sup>4</sup> was in Nether Wallop, and formed that part of the estate called Garlogs (q.v.) which in the 14th century was held of the Prior of God's House, Portsmouth, lord of Broughton Manor. The rest of 'Wallope' formed part of the possessions of the Crown at the time of the Domesday Survey. The largest estate had paid geld for 22 hides in the reign of Edward the Confessor, and had then been held by Countess Gueda (Gythra) of Earl Godwin. It contained three mills worth 15s. and a salt-pan worth 5d. The third penny of six hundreds had belonged to it in the reign of Edward the Confessor, and it had had also free right of pasture and pannage in all the woods belonging to those six hundreds. In this estate were a chapel with 8 acres of tithe belonging to it, and a church to which belonged a hide and a moiety of the tithes of the manor, and the whole cirset and 46d. from the villeins' tithes and one half of the lands. Although worth only £27 it was farmed for £31 5s.<sup>5</sup> It is possible that this holding comprised nearly the whole of Nether Wallop and the eastern portion of Over Wallop. If so, it included the whole estate in Wallop (both Nether and Over) which was given to the abbey of Amesbury, the manor of Wallop Fifehead which was held of Amesbury, the manor of Wallop Heathmanstreet and that part of the Garlogs which was held of Amesbury. The second estate had formed part of the possessions of Earl Harold, and had then paid geld for 17 hides. It contained three mills and paid £27 10s., although worth only £23.<sup>6</sup> It is probable that this estate covered the western portion of Over Wallop and formed the later manor of Wallop Moyles (q.v.).

Besides the two estates forming part of the royal demesne there were two other tenements in Wallop held directly of the king. One paid geld for 1 hide, and was held by four Englishmen who had succeeded their father in its possession.<sup>7</sup> The other which Alric had held of King Edward paid geld for 2 hides and was in the possession of Alsi the son of Brixi.<sup>8</sup> It is possible that these holdings represent the later manors of Over Wallop Buckland and Nether Wallop Buckland (q.v.).

The chief manor of NETHER WALLOP had its origin in the estate in Wallop worth £37 a year which was granted by Henry II in 1177 to the monastery of Amesbury<sup>9</sup> (co. Wilts.) at the time of its conversion into a cell to the abbey of Fontevrault in Anjou,<sup>10</sup> the Cluniac nuns, its former occupants, having been removed and dispersed into other nunneries as a punishment for ill living.<sup>11</sup>

This grant was confirmed by King John in 1199,<sup>12</sup> by Pope Innocent III in 1201,<sup>13</sup> by Henry III in 1270<sup>14</sup> and by Edward I in 1281.<sup>15</sup> In 1231 Peter Fitz Herbert was admonished not to disturb the nuns in their possessions in Wallop for which he had sued them.<sup>16</sup> His son and heir Herbert Fitz Peter, however, impleaded the prioress for 4 carucates of land in Wallop in 1242, whereupon the prioress produced her charter from Henry II.<sup>17</sup> However, it was not until 1273 that Reginald, brother and heir of Herbert,<sup>18</sup> gave up to the prioress all claim to the manor in return for 200 marks.<sup>19</sup> In 1280 the prioress claimed pillory, tumbrel, gallows and the assize of bread and ale in her manor of Nether Wallop, and, although the jurors then declared they knew not by what warrant,<sup>20</sup> six years later Edward I confirmed these rights when his daughter took the veil at Amesbury,<sup>21</sup> and added that of free warren.<sup>22</sup>

The manor remained in the possession of Amesbury until the Dissolution.<sup>23</sup> In 1545 Henry VIII granted it to Lord Chancellor Wriothesley,<sup>24</sup> who sold it two years later to Sir William Paulet, afterwards Marquess

In 1491 Henry VII granted the Prioress of Amesbury the right to hold an annual fair on the Feast of St. Anne and the days before and after at Danebury Hill (Dunneburyhill, xv cent.; Dunbery Hill, xvi cent.), in her manor of Nether Wallop.<sup>27</sup> This fair, the annual value of which was stated to be 6s. 4d. in 1539,<sup>28</sup> was granted to Robert Lord in 1544,<sup>29</sup> but has been discontinued since the 17th century.

The manor of NETHER WALLOP BUCKLAND, known alternatively in later days as PLACE (Buklund, xv cent.; Bukland, xvi cent.), belonged in the latter half of the 13th century to the family of Buckland. The overlordship belonged to Edmund Plantagenet Earl of Kent, and continued to be held by his descendants until the beginning of the 15th century.<sup>30</sup>

In 1270 John Buckland granted a messuage and a carucate of land in Wallop to Hugh son of Hugh Buckland and his issue for a rent of £20 during the life of John, with reversion in default of issue to John and his heirs for ever.<sup>31</sup> Hugh had three sons, Hugh, William and Robert, and one daughter, Clarice, on whom a messuage, 140 acres of land and 42s. rent in Nether Wallop were settled in fee-tail in succession in 1271 with contingent remainder to one Ralph Buckland and his heirs.<sup>32</sup> John son of Ralph came eventually into possession and died seised of the manor in 1362,<sup>33</sup> leaving a brother and heir, Sir Thomas Buckland,<sup>34</sup> who settled it in 1377 on himself and his wife Maud with reversion on their death to his daughter and heir Margaret wife of Sir John Wroth.<sup>35</sup> Sir Thomas died in 1378-9 and was followed by Sir John Wroth,<sup>36</sup> who died in 1396, leaving a son and heir John.<sup>37</sup> The latter died in 1407, leaving as his heir his son John,<sup>38</sup> who died young without issue,<sup>39</sup> and was followed by his sister and heir Elizabeth wife of Sir William Palton, who held the manor until her death in 1413.<sup>40</sup> Her cousin and heir Sir John Tiptoft son of Agnes, sister of her father Sir John Wroth,<sup>41</sup> succeeded her in possession of Nether Wallop Buckland,<sup>42</sup> which he held until his death in 1443, when he was followed by his son and heir John.<sup>43</sup> The latter was created Earl of Worcester in 1449,<sup>44</sup> but adhering to the house of York in the Wars of the Roses was taken prisoner and beheaded on Tower Hill for high treason in 1470.<sup>45</sup> His son and heir Edward<sup>46</sup> died a minor in 1485, leaving as his heirs his three paternal aunts, Philippa wife of Thomas Lord Ros, Joan wife of Sir Edmund Ingoldsthorpe and Joyce wife of Sir Edmund Sutton or Dudley.<sup>47</sup>

The manor of Nether Wallop Buckland fell to the share of Philippa, then a widow,<sup>48</sup> and passed from her to her son and heir Edmund Lord Ros, who died unmarried and of unsound mind in 1508, leaving as his heirs his sisters Eleanor wife of Sir Robert Manners and Isabel wife of Sir Thomas Lovell.<sup>49</sup> Nether Wallop Buckland passed to the latter,<sup>50</sup> but on the death of Sir Thomas Lovell without issue in 1524 the manor passed by will to his wife's great-nephew Thomas Manners Lord Ros.<sup>51</sup> Thomas Lord Ros, then Earl of Rutland,<sup>52</sup> conveyed it in 1541 to Sir George Paulet,<sup>53</sup> on whose death it passed to his son and heir Sir Hampden Paulet.<sup>54</sup>

Elizabeth daughter and heir of Sir Hampden married Sir Francis Dowse of Broughton<sup>55</sup> (q.v.), whose descendant Thomas Dowse died in 1799,<sup>56</sup> leaving a son and heir Thomas Augustus,<sup>57</sup> who dealt with the manor by recovery in 1802.<sup>58</sup> On his death he was followed by his son Thomas Augustus, who was living in 1846.<sup>59</sup>

No manorial rights now attach to this estate, which survives only as Place Farm.

A mill, perhaps representing one of those existing in Wallop in 1086, belonged to the manor of Wallop Fifehead in 1311.<sup>77</sup>

Two hides of land in Nether Wallop, which in the 16th century acquired the name of the manor of WALLOP HEATHMANSTREET, were held in the 12th century by the Norman family of Bendeng.<sup>78</sup> In 1208 King John granted the estate lately belonging to Stephen de Bendeng to his servant Matthew de Wallop to hold during his pleasure.<sup>79</sup> In 1221-2 Henry III ordered the lands of Matthew in Wallop which the escheator had taken into his hands to be replevied to Matthew until further orders,<sup>80</sup> but finally granted them in 1227 to Ralph de Willinton for the rent of a yearling sparrow-hawk.<sup>81</sup> Some time after 1232<sup>82</sup> Ralph granted 2 hides at Wallop to the Abbot and convent of St. Peter, Gloucester,<sup>83</sup> who in turn granted the estate to Henry de Reigate in fee-farm.<sup>84</sup> Henry apparently surrendered the property before 1279, in which year the Abbot and convent of St. Peter granted it to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont in fee-farm for a rent of six marks yearly to the abbot and a sparrow-hawk yearly to the king.<sup>85</sup> In 1345 the Prior and convent of Mottisfont acquired right of assize of bread and ale in Wallop,<sup>86</sup> and they continued to hold the manor in fee-farm until the dissolution of the priory in 1536.<sup>87</sup> The same year Henry VIII granted the manor with other property belonging to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont to William Lord Sandys.<sup>88</sup> The abbey of St. Peter, Gloucester, was dissolved in 1540,<sup>89</sup> and the fee-farm of £4 granted in 1541 to the newly-constituted Dean and Chapter of Gloucester.<sup>90</sup> William Lord Sandys thereupon apparently quit-

The family may have been preceded in its possession of Wallop Fifehead by Gerald de Wallop, who in the Testa de Nevill was stated to be holding one knight's fee in Wallop of the old feoffment of the Earl of Hertford (Testa de Nevill, 231). Gerald was also holding 1 hide of land in Britford of John de Grimstead (ibid. 155). The Testa de Nevill 'Hertford' may be a mistake for 'Hereford.' Among the possessions of Humphrey de Bohun Earl of Hereford and Essex in 1372 was a fee in Wallop held by the Prioress of Amesbury (Inq. p.m. 46 Edw. III, no. 10).

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

claimed the manor to the dean and chapter, who four years later made an exchange with the Crown for various other lands.<sup>91</sup>

William Marquess of Winchester, who had probably obtained the manor by royal grant, sold it in 1571 by the description of the manor of Wallop Heathmanstreet in Nether Wallop to William Egerton,<sup>92</sup> who obtained a confirmation of the sale from Queen Elizabeth in 1580.<sup>93</sup> He died in 1593, and his son and heir William<sup>94</sup> sold the manor the following year to Thomas Elye,<sup>95</sup> who held it till his death in 1615. According to a previous settlement<sup>96</sup> it then passed to his younger son Thomas, who died in 1631, leaving an infant son and heir Thomas.<sup>97</sup> The estate passed soon afterwards to the Rev. Matthew Bucket, who died in 1652,<sup>98</sup> but its history for the next hundred years is unknown. It came into the possession of Edward Sheldon before 1775,<sup>99</sup> but from this date its history again becomes obscure. The present lord of the manor is Mr. Philip Shuttleworth Darnell.

The property in Nether Wallop called GARLOGS (Galrug, Garlonge, Galerugg, Galrogge, xiv cent.; Garlogge, xvi cent.), held partly of the Prioress of Amesbury (co. Wilts.) and partly of the Warden of God's House, Portsmouth, was settled in 1318 for life on Juliane late the wife of Benedict Galrug, with remainder on her death to her son John Aygnel and Maud his wife.<sup>100</sup> It passed soon afterwards to Richard Tidworth, who died seised of a messuage and a carucate of land in Nether Wallop at Garlogs in 1353, leaving a son and heir John.<sup>101</sup> The latter died in 1362, his heir being his cousin John son of John Ingpen, then three years old.<sup>102</sup> The manor remained in the Ingpen family until about the middle of the 16th century, when it passed to Nicholas Gore of Nether Wallop, from whom it descended to his son and heir Richard,<sup>103</sup> and the manor remained in the Gore family until the end of the 18th century, since it was in the hands of a Walter Blunt before 1778.<sup>104</sup> Garlogs changed hands again soon afterwards, passing before 1855 to Mr. John Hibbert Brewer,<sup>105</sup> whose descendant, another Mr. Brewer, sold it about 1903 to the present owner, Dr. Lyne-Stevens, of Enham Place, Knights Enham.<sup>106</sup>

In 1346 John Flaundres was stated to be holding in Nether Wallop one-quarter of a knight's fee formerly belonging to Roger Flaundres.<sup>107</sup> In 1428 the estate was divided between Thomas Benbury and Richard Wallop, probably the younger son of Thomas Wallop, lord of Over Wallop,<sup>108</sup> but nothing further has been learnt concerning its history beyond the fact that Richard III in 1484 made a grant to his servant John Brice alias Blewmantell of all the lands, rents and services lately belonging to Thomas Benbury in Andover, Wallop and Hartfordbridge, and in the king's hands by reason of his forfeiture.<sup>109</sup>

The church of ST. ANDREW consists of a chancel, with a crossing at the west end, a nave, wide north and south aisles continuing eastward and overlapping the west wall of the chancel.

The history of the building appears to be that an aisleless nave and chancel, the former measuring about 15 ft. by 11 ft., stood here early in the 12th century, having in its north wall the doorway which is now in the north aisle. Towards the end of the 12th century a south aisle was added to the nave, and in the first quarter of the 13th a considerable scheme of enlargement was begun. A north aisle was added, and the nave prolonged eastward about as far as the east wall of the old chancel, which was then entirely pulled down, and at the east of the lengthened nave a small compartment of equal width was set out, apparently as a chancel or sanctuary, the thinness of its walls being against the otherwise natural theory that it was meant for a central tower, with a larger chancel further to the east. The present chancel unfortunately retains no old detail, and the date of its building must remain doubtful; it is possibly not earlier than the 15th century, and it seems that during this century both aisles of the nave were widened and probably lengthened eastwards to their present line. The date of the arches in the north and south walls of the small 13th-century compartment, now forming a sort of crossing between nave and chancel, is very doubtful; a late 12th-century capital appears in one respond and two 13th-century capitals in others, all apparently inserted, as the arches fit none of them. The east arch opening to the present chancel is a modern forgery of 12th-century work, and the arch opening to the nave has like capitals which may be in part old and re-used from the late 12th-century chancel arch destroyed in the 13th century, when the nave was lengthened. There are evidences in both arcades of the abutment of walls and arches running southwards and north-

In the same year John Southover died seised of 100 acres of land in Nether Wallop which he was holding of the inwards across the line of the aisles, and the east arches of the two arcades may have opened originally into transept chapels wider than the nave aisles. The present west tower was built in 1704, but its east wall seems part of an older tower on the same site. The walls of the 'crossing' have apparently been heightened, perhaps in the 15th century, but there seems no reason to suppose that it was ever carried up as a tower.

The site slopes steeply northward and eastward, and there has evidently been a failure of foundation on the north, the aisle wall being heavily buttressed and partly faced with red brick.

The chancel has been recently restored and all the windows are modern. The three-light east window is of 15th-century style, and the north and south walls have each two square-headed two-light windows. There is a modern south door. The arch between the chancel and the crossing, in which the quire seats are placed, appears to be entirely modern, though the wall above is old. The rood-loft stood against its west face, reached by a stair in the south-east angle of the north aisle. The crossing has a flat plaster ceiling and a low-pitched tiled roof, distinct from that of the nave or chancel. On the north side a pointed arch opens into the east end of the north aisle; the respond on the east consists of part of a half-octagonal moulded capital and shaft, and that on the west is similar but complete. Both are of the 13th century, but apparently re-used here. The arch on the south side opens into the east end of the south aisle, now occupied by the organ, and has no east respond, but that on the west is a half-rounded shaft with a late 12th-century fluted capital. The arch to the nave is pointed, with a square inner and chamfered outer order, resting on moulded abaci with cable mould beneath, and concave scalloped capitals, with half-round shafts and mutilated bases, all so painted and plastered that it is difficult to tell old work from new; but parts of the capitals seem to be of late 12th-century date.

The nave arcades are of four bays, with a break on each side between the first and second bays. The arches are pointed of two chamfered orders, and have circular capitals and columns, but the three western bays of the south arcade have late 12th-century capitals, while the rest have simple 13th-century moulded capitals. The east arches on both sides are wider than the rest. There is a 15th-century corbel head, with traces of the springing of an arch, on the north face of the pier between the first and second arches of the north arcade. The three west bays of the south arcade have a large roll label towards the nave; the others have no labels. All details are clogged and blunted by paint and plaster. The clearstory consists of three square-headed two-light windows on each side, now partly blocked by the raising of the aisle roofs. The roofs of the nave and of both aisles are of the 15th century, with cambered and moulded ties. The wall plates in the nave are embattled. The aisle roofs are of heavier timbers and wider span, and only one plate in each aisle is embattled.

The north aisle has a 15th-century three-light window at the east and west. On each side of the east window are contemporary image niches, with pinnacled side shafts and projecting crocketed canopies. The east window in the north wall was possibly the east window of the aisle before its lengthening. To the west of it are three high, narrow windows of two lights with shouldered trefoil heads and wood lintels, probably 14th-century work reset when the aisles were widened. The north doorway is round-headed, of two orders, the inner with a continuous angle roll, the outer chamfered—clearly a later alteration. In the jambs, but not fitting to the outer order, are two cushion capitals and jamb shafts with moulded bases, the oldest work in the building. The door has three 16th-century panels in an 18th-century framing, and the wooden porch has 16th-century work in its oldest parts, as the moulded barge-board on the north gable.

The south aisle repeats the eastern arrangement of window and niches in the north aisle, and the south wall has three windows like those in the north aisle but shorter. The south door is plastered and of uncertain but late date. The small modern south porch is used as a vestry. Close to the door, inside, is a moulded 13th-century base inserted in the wall. The west window, of the 15th century, is of two lights with a quatrefoil in the head.

The tower arch is high, two-centred, and of two chamfered orders, the inner springing from small moulded and scalloped capitals on half-round shafts, which look like old work except in their proportions. A 15th-century screen with moulded uprights and embattled cresting and fitted with modern doors is set across the opening of the arch.

The tower is dated 1704, but may include the masonry of an earlier tower in its walls. A tablet on the west external walls is inscribed, 'M. William Cleverly, John Leach, Church Wardens, Thomas Muspratt, Masons, Anno mdcciii.' There are four rough belfry windows and a loop light in the south wall; the west window of the ground story is a modern insertion.

The octagonal font is modern, of 15th-century style. The pews in the aisles are heavy and simple 17th-century work, and the quire seats contain some good panelling. A much-worn slab in the north aisle is said to have shown within recent times the consecration crosses of an altar slab. The north-east angle buttress has a stone with two incised crosses, one perhaps an original consecration cross.

On the floor of the nave is a small brass with inscription of Mary Gore (1437) and at the east end of the north aisle is a casement of a very fine late 14th or early 15th-century brass of a bishop or mitred abbot under a canopy. Several other slabs are evidently ancient, but bear no marks of brasses or lettering.

On the chancel floor is a slab to John Miller, who married Esther daughter of Francis Dowse, 1647; with a shield of arms, a mill-rind impaling a chequy chevron between three running greyhounds. A second slab is to his widow Esther, who afterwards married Sir Henry Paulet, third son of William Marquess of Winchester, and died 1697. On a lozenge are the arms of Dowse between those of Miller and Paulet.

A third slab is to Hester Miller and her sister Elizabeth, 1706 and 1725, with two mill-rinds on a lozenge.

There is another slab to W. D. Clarke, 'late minister' of Nether Wallop, and Susanna his wife, 1680. In the churchyard at the west end of the church is a pyramidal monument to Francis Dowse and Anne his wife, 1760 and 1757. A shield with the tinctures partly lost bears Dowse impaling Azure two bars or a canton ermineois.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The tower contains five bells. The treble, inscribed in Gothic capitals, 'God be our guide,' bears the date 1642 and the initials of the founder, I.H. The second is inscribed on the lip, 'P. Wells of Aldbourne 1770.' The third is inscribed, 'God is my hope 1642,' and is by the same founder as the treble. The fourth is inscribed, 'Be meeke and loly to heare the word of God 1585,' and bears the initials of John Wallis of Salisbury. The fifth was cast by Clement Tozier in 1702.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1786 given in 1831, a paten of 1640 given by Alexander Crawley in that year and a flagon of 1874 given in that year by Percival L. Hambro.

The registers are as follows:—(1) burials 1631 to 1776, marriages and baptisms 1653 to 1678; (2) baptisms 1679 to 1780; marriages 1680 to 1754; (3) marriages, 1754 to 1812.

If the identification of the Domesday entries of Wallop is correct, the church to which belonged a hide and a moiety of the tithes of the manor, and the whole circa 46d. from the villeins' tithes and one-half of the lands,<sup>110</sup> was probably the church of Nether Wallop. From the 13th century the Treasurer of York Cathedral by arrangement with the dean and chapter presented a rector, who in turn presented a vicar.<sup>111</sup> In 1291 the annual value of the church was £66 13s. 4d., and of the vicarage £5. The Treasurer of York received at that date a pension of £3 6s. 8d. and an annual payment of £1 10s. in lieu of certain tithes.<sup>112</sup> Early in the 15th century the rectory was appropriated by the Dean and Chapter of York to the sub-chapter and vicars choral of the Cathedral,<sup>113</sup> who have continued to hold the advowson of the vicarage down to the present day.<sup>114</sup>

There is a Wesleyan Methodist chapel in Nether Wallop.

In 1559 Sir Richard Rede, by CHARITIES his will dated 27 March, charged his manor of Tangley with £4 a year for ever to be paid to the poor people of Nether Wallop and Over Wallop. The land charged belongs to different owners, who pay their respective portions.

In 1759 Francis Dowse, by his will, gave to the parish of Wallop £1,000 South Sea Annuities, the income to be applied towards the support of poor people past their labour and for education. The legacy is represented by £1,058 4s. consols, with the official trustees, of which one moiety (£529 2s. consols) was under an Order of 17 May 1904 made under the Board of Education Act, 1899, constituted the 'Douce's educational foundation' and the other moiety the eleemosynary charity.

In 1652 the Rev. Matthew Bucket, by his will, dated 1 October, bequeathed £20 for the poor, to be laid out in the purchase of an annuity of 20s. By deed of 20 September 1660 the annuity was charged on the Manor Farm of Heathmanstreet, now belonging to Mr. Philip Shuttleworth Darnell.

In 1870 John Brownjohn, by a codicil to his will, dated 16 December, bequeathed £298 1s. 7d. India 3 per Cent. stock upon trust that out of the annual income £3 should be paid in sums of 2s. 6d. to each of twenty-four of the oldest poor on St. Thomas's Day, and the remainder, £5 18s. 8d., to the Nether Wallop Clothing Club.

In 1892 Miss Emily Brownjohn, by will, left £102 11s. 3d. like stock, the dividends amounting to £3 1s. 4d. to be distributed in blankets, coats, &c., among the poor on 1 November.

The sums of stock are held by the official trustees, the dividends being duly applied by the churchwardens.

The Rev. Henry Powney, by will, proved 1876, left £100 (less duty) to the minister and churchwardens for the benefit of the poor. The trust fund is deposited in the Wilts. and Dorset Bank, and the annual income is distributed in sums varying from 2s. 6d. to 3s. to each recipient.

William Warwick, by will, dated 20 May 1826, bequeathed £600 consols, the dividends to be applied for the education of poor children of Nether Wallop under the direction and at the discretion of the churchwardens and overseers of the parish.

The trust fund is held by the official trustees, by whom the dividends amounting to £15 a year are remitted to the churchwardens and overseers.

OVER WALLOP

Wallope (xi cent.); Wellop (xiii cent.); Uverwallop, Over Welhop, Upwellop (xiv cent.).

The parish of Over Wallop lies on the borders of Wiltshire and covers an area of 4,672 acres, including 2,889 acres of arable land, 299½ acres of permanent grass and 61½ acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The main London to Exeter line of the London and South Western Railway passes north-west of the parish, which is served by Grately Station. The ground slopes downwards from the south-west from Tower Hill (555 ft. above the ordnance datum) to the village in the south-east. The village lies along the banks of the Wallop Brook and forms with Middle and Nether Wallop one long straggling village, which is crossed by the main road from Salisbury to Andover. Townshend Manor House, the residence of Mr. Carbery Evans, is north-west of the village. Near it are Pottery Drove and Pottery Field, commemorating one of the early lords of the manor, Matthew de Poteria.

The soil is chalk.

The common fields of Over Wallop were inclosed in 1787 by authority of a Private Act of the previous year.<sup>2</sup>

The following place-names occur:—Trenchardstapel in 'Over Wallop Priores' (xiv cent.),<sup>3</sup> Bowerefeld (xvi cent.).<sup>4</sup>

The manor of OVER WALLOP, MANORS afterwards called WALLOP MOYLES, was possibly the estate which had belonged to Earl Harold, and in 1086 was Crown property.<sup>5</sup> It belonged at the end of the 12th century to Matthew de Poteria, a Norman,<sup>6</sup> and apparently an absentee landlord who farmed it to Baldwin de Winton.<sup>7</sup> On the death of Matthew, c. 1204, the manor escheated to King John,<sup>8</sup> who granted the custody during his pleasure to James de Poteria.<sup>9</sup> The estate was held in chief by the service due from one knight's fee.<sup>10</sup>

The manor passed soon after to the family from which it took its distinguishing name, being granted in 1222 by Henry III to Nicholas de Moels,<sup>11</sup> who as seneschal of Gascony defeated the King of Navarre,<sup>12</sup> and subsequently became Constable of Dover Castle and Warden of the Cinque Ports.<sup>13</sup> Henry III visited Wallop in 1225,<sup>14</sup> and five years later granted Nicholas ten oaks in the New Forest for the support of his household.<sup>15</sup> Nicholas died before 1284, in which year his son and heir Roger was summoned to show his warrant for not attending the king's hundred court of Thorngate as part of the service due for the manor of Wallop Moyles.<sup>16</sup> Roger in the same year claimed the right to assize of bread and ale in Wallop.<sup>17</sup> He died in 1294-5, leaving a son and heir John,<sup>18</sup> who, having distinguished himself in the Scotch wars, was summoned to Parliament as a baron in 1299.<sup>19</sup> He died in 1310,<sup>20</sup> having settled the manor of Wallop Moyles seven years before on himself and his wife Maud.<sup>21</sup> His son and heir Nicholas,<sup>22</sup> also a distinguished soldier,<sup>23</sup> succeeded to the estate, but died in 1316, leaving a brother and heir Roger,<sup>24</sup> who died some months later.<sup>25</sup> John brother and heir of Roger had livery of his lands in 1325 on attaining his majority,<sup>26</sup> and on his death in 1337 left two daughters and heirs, Muriel and Isabel.<sup>27</sup> The manor of Wallop Moyles fell to Muriel and her husband, Sir Thomas Courtenay,<sup>28</sup> who settled it in 1344 on themselves in tail male.<sup>29</sup> On the death of Sir Thomas in 1362 it passed to his son and heir Hugh,<sup>30</sup> who dying a minor in 1369 left as his heirs his sister Margaret and his nephew John Dynham son of his sister Muriel.<sup>31</sup> Over Wallop Moyles was assigned to John Dynham,<sup>32</sup> who was holding one knight's fee in Wallop formerly belonging to John Moels in 1428,<sup>33</sup> but died the same year.<sup>34</sup> His son and heir, Sir John Dynham,<sup>35</sup> died in 1457, leaving a son and heir John,<sup>36</sup> who dying before 1502 left as his heirs his two sisters, Elizabeth widow of Fulke Bouchier Lord Fitz Warine, and then wife of Sir Thomas Brandon, and Joan wife of John Zouche Lord Zouche, and his two nephews, Sir Edmund Carew of Mohuns Ottery, son of his sister Margaret, and Sir John Arundell of Lanherne (co. Cornw.), son of his sister Catherine.<sup>37</sup> The subsequent history of the four parts is for some time obscure. Lady Fitz Warine died in 1516<sup>38</sup> and Sir John Arundell in 1545, each seised of a fourth part.<sup>39</sup> One-fourth came before long into the possession of Sir William Compton, from whom it passed to his son and heir Peter,<sup>40</sup> who died in 1544.<sup>41</sup> Peter's son and heir Henry, born after his death, sold this fourth part in 1571 to Sir Richard Rede,<sup>42</sup> late Lord Chancellor of Ireland and Master of Requests,<sup>43</sup> who subsequently acquired the whole of the manor of which he died seised in 1576.<sup>44</sup> His son and heir Innocent sold Over Wallop Moyles in 1577 to his cousin Nicholas,<sup>45</sup> who in 1579, 'being very ill and intending to defraud

the queen of the custody of his heirs and lands,' conveyed the manor to Henry Pyle of Wallop.<sup>46</sup> He died the next year, leaving two daughters and heirs, Eleanor and Margaret, aged nine and seven respectively.<sup>47</sup> The manor was subsequently purchased by the Wallop family, Robert Wallop of Farleigh Wallop (co. Hants) being seised of it on his attainder in 1661.<sup>48</sup> From this date it followed the descent of Farleigh Wallop in Bermondspit Hundred (q.v.),<sup>49</sup> the present owner being Isaac Newton Wallop fifth Earl of Portsmouth.

The house POTREY COURT (Potrey Court, xvi cent.; Pettry Court, xvii cent.) in Wallop Moyles, of which Henry Pyle, the grandson of John Pyle, died seised in 1617,<sup>50</sup> no doubt took its name from that of the Norman lord of the manor in the 12th century, Matthew de Poteria.

The ruined water-mill, of which John Tidworth died seised in 1362, was held of Sir Thomas Courtenay, lord of Wallop Moyles, and probably stood on the site of one of the mills existing at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>51</sup>

The origin of the manor of OVER WALLOP, held for over five and a half centuries by the Wallop family, is obscure, but the hide of land held before the Conquest by Edric, and in 1086 by Boda of Hugh de Port, and the half-manor held before the Conquest by Godric, and in 1086 by Hugh de Port,<sup>52</sup> probably represent the fourth part of a knight's fee in Wallop held by Richard de Wallop of Herbert Fitz Peter, the lord of Wolverton, in the 13th century.<sup>53</sup> Wallop occurs in 14th-century lists of the St. John knights' fees,<sup>54</sup> but in 1362 the manor was said to be held of Edward de St. John as of his manor of Wolverton by the service of the fourth part of a knight's fee.<sup>55</sup> On the death of Richard de Wallop the estate in Wallop passed to his widow Euphemia, who in 1297-8 was stated to be holding the wood of Wallop which had been afforested by Henry II.<sup>56</sup> In 1335 it was in the hands of another Richard de Wallop, who in that year settled two messuages, lands and rents in Over Wallop upon himself for life, with successive remainders to Alice daughter of Roger Husee for life and to Thomas Wallop the son of Richard and his issue.<sup>57</sup>

Seven years later a further settlement of two messuages, lands and rents in Over and Nether Wallop and the advowson of the church of Over Wallop was made upon Richard for life with remainder to Thomas and Margaret his wife and their issue.<sup>58</sup> Richard de Wallop was still living in 1346, in which year he was stated to be holding the fourth part of a fee in Wallop, formerly belonging to Richard de Barton.<sup>59</sup> His son Thomas died seised of two messuages, 2 carucates of land and perquisites of court in Over and Nether Wallop, and the advowson of the church of Over Wallop in 1361, leaving as his heir his son John.<sup>60</sup>

The latter was living in 1428, when he was seventy-six years of age, and he probably died soon after.<sup>61</sup> John was followed by Thomas, from whom the manor passed to his son and heir John Wallop of Farleigh Wallop.<sup>62</sup> John's son and heir Richard died seised of the manor of Over Wallop in 1503,<sup>63</sup> and from this date it followed the descent of Farleigh Wallop in the hundred of Bermondspit (q.v.),<sup>64</sup> the present lord being Isaac Newton Wallop fifth Earl of Portsmouth.

In the 12th century (1166) William de Wallop was holding a knight's fee of Humphrey de Bohun of the old fiefment (i.e. created before 1135) as it had been held of the grandfather of Humphrey, and in the 13th century Gerald (Girard) de Wallop held what was evidently the same fee of the Earl of Hereford (Bohun).<sup>65</sup> The overlordship merged in the Crown with the rest of the Bohun fee in 1372-3 and the holding probably merged in the Wallop manor of Over Wallop.

The manor of OVER WALLOP BUCKLAND followed the same descent as the manor of Nether Wallop Buckland (q.v.) until 1541, when Thomas Earl of Rutland sold it to Sir William Warham,<sup>66</sup> who settled it in 1560 on himself and his wife Elizabeth for their lives, with remainder to his cousin and sole heir Anne, and her husband Francis Moires.<sup>67</sup> Sir William died before 1570, in which year Francis Moires and his wife Anne sold the reversion of the manor after the death of Lady Warham to Sir William Forster of Aldermaston (co. Berks.).<sup>68</sup> The manor remained in the Forster family<sup>69</sup> until 1608, when Sir William Forster sold it to Sir Henry Wallop,<sup>69</sup> since which time it has followed the descent of the main manor of Over Wallop (q.v.).

The land in Wallop, worth £37 a year, which Henry II granted to the nuns of Amesbury (co. Wilts.), was mainly in Nether Wallop,<sup>70</sup> but it also included part of Over Wallop. This estate was known as Over Wallop Prioress,<sup>71</sup> and the rents of assize here payable to the Prioress and convent of Amesbury were worth £11 7s. 8½d. a year in the 16th century.<sup>72</sup> Of this sum £1 5s. 4½d. came from a water-mill, which was held on lease by Thomas Hachard.<sup>73</sup>

Land in OVER WALLOP was held in 1232-3 by Thomas Mauduit of the heirs of William Briwere by the service of 2s. to a scutage.<sup>74</sup> This land passed before 1272 to John Waleran, who at this date conveyed it to Robert son of John Waleran, to hold of him for a pair of silver spurs or 3d. rent yearly at the Nativity of St. John the Baptist.<sup>75</sup> Robert subsequently enfeoffed Oliver de Ingham, who died seised in 1282, when the land was charged with the following rents in consequence of successive enfeoffments—18d. yearly for ever to Patrick de Chaworth, 12d. yearly to John de Farlington, descendants of William Briwere, £1 13s. 4d. yearly for ever to Thomas de Maydenhatch, and £15 yearly for life to Beatrice Mauduit.<sup>76</sup> John son and heir of Oliver<sup>77</sup> apparently granted the estate at a rent of 40s. to Robert Burbache,<sup>78</sup> who released all his right to it to Richard Tidworth and Juliane his wife.<sup>79</sup> This grant was confirmed by Oliver son of John Ingham in 1318, when he released them from payment of the yearly rent of 40s.<sup>80</sup> From this date the history of the holding is obscure, but it followed for a time the descent of Garlogs in Nether Wallop<sup>81</sup> (q.v.), descending from the Tidworth family to the Ingpens.<sup>82</sup>

A small property in OVER WALLOP, a so-called manor, was held of the manor of Wallop Moyles in the 15th century by William Ludlow, who on his death in 1478 was followed by his son and heir John.<sup>83</sup> John died nine years later, leaving a son and heir John,<sup>84</sup> who held the property until his death in 1519.<sup>85</sup> His son and heir William,<sup>86</sup> at his death in 1533, left a son and heir George,<sup>87</sup> and from this date the property followed the same descent as the manor of Wyford in Tadley in the hundred of Overton (q.v.) until 1639,<sup>88</sup> when Henry Ludlow died, leaving a son and heir Edmund, aged thirty.<sup>89</sup> The subsequent history of the property is unknown.

The church of ST. PETER consists CHURCH of chancel 28 ft. 6 in. by 18 ft. 4 in., with south vestry and organ chamber, nave 51 ft. by 18 ft., with north and south aisles 7 ft. 10 in. and 9 ft. 6 in. wide respectively, west tower 10 ft. square, and south porch.

The chancel is entirely modern, but there is a good deal of old work in the nave, its history being unfortunately much obscured by modern repairs and alterations. The two west bays of the north arcade are of late 12th-century date, and point to the former existence of an early nave some 30 ft. long, to which a north aisle was added about 1180. A south aisle was added early in the 13th century and the nave apparently lengthened eastward, and a west tower was built at the beginning of the century, but modern alterations have destroyed any reliable evidence of the development of the church. In the 15th century a clearstory was added to the nave, and the tower has been rebuilt in modern times and the whole outer face of the church renewed.

The chancel is of good scale and proportion, and has three lancets at the east set high in the wall, and a pointed barrel roof of oak. In the north wall are two lancets and in the south one. At the west is a light wrought-iron screen on a low stone base, with brass sockets for 28 candles and a gilt cross over the middle door; the wrought-iron pulpit adjoins it on the north-west. There is a piscina with a stone shelf above, 13th-century work re-used, and two modern sedilia. The chancel arch has foliate capitals with banded shafts.

The nave arcades are of four bays, the east bay on the north side being 13th-century work of the same character but of less height and span than that on the south. The second bay on the north is entirely modern, except for the abacus of its west respond, which belongs to the arch in the east bay. In both bays the arches are pointed, of two chamfered orders, but the two west bays have round orders with a chamfered label, square outer order, and modern inner order. The capitals have hollow flutes of late type, and the pillars and responds are round and half-round.

On the south side of the nave the arch of the first bay springs at the east from a square moulded abacus with a curious corbel below, like the bell of a small plain capital dying into the soffit of a chamfered bracket. The same feature occurs in the north arcade, and at the west the arch springs from a moulded string like that now in the second bay of the north arcade. The remaining three bays of the south arcade have pointed arches of two chamfered orders, the inner order being entirely modern, circular moulded capitals and bases, and circular columns, the responds being square. Towards the nave there is a double-chamfered label, the whole being much re-tooled and renewed.

The tower arch is pointed and has two chamfered orders and chamfered abaci of late Romanesque type; the arch has been repaired and is of doubtful date.

The nave clearstory has three square-headed 15th-century windows of two trefoiled lights on the south side and two on the north, and the nave roof is modern. The north aisle has in the east wall an early 14th-century window of three trefoiled lights, with intersecting mullions, formerly three openings with trefoiled heads; the exterior has a chamfered label and mask stops. In the north wall are three square-headed 15th-century windows of three cinquefoiled lights with a roll on the mullions, head and sill. Between the first and second windows is a shallow four-centred recess of 15th-century date, retaining traces of red colour, which must have contained an image or a group of sculpture.

There is a west door to the aisle with round head containing a few old stones; it has a flat chamfered label and restored abaci. It is of late 12th-century date, and was doubtless once on the north side of the aisle.

The south aisle has a 14th-century east window of two trefoiled lights and a quatrefoiled circle over, and three square-headed windows on the south, the first and third perhaps 14th-century work renewed, of three and two trefoiled lights; the second is like those in the north aisle, and the west window is a modern lancet. The south door is round-headed with an edge-roll, and looks like late 12th-century work re-used and patched.

There are no old fittings except two 17th-century benches at the west end of the south aisle, and a fine octagonal 15th-century font at the west end of the nave, with quatrefoiled panels on the bowl, one panel containing a shield apparently of the arms of Incent. On the chamfer below the bowl are two eagles, the other six faces having leaf patterns, and the stem has trefoiled panels.

The tower is modern, in three stages, with two lancet lights for the belfry on each face, and a gabled roof.

Of the bells the treble is by Mears & Stainbank, 1874; the second by R. Wells, 1776; the third is of 1636, with maker's initials I. D. and inscription, 'Praise the Lorde'; the fourth is inscribed, 'O be joyfull in the Lord I D 1631 T K'; and the fifth AADBEACLHI with maker's mark and cross.

The plate consists of a silver chalice undated, another of 1855 and a paten and flagon of the same date, all three presented by Arthur Jenner; there is also a plated flagon.

The registers are as follows:—(1) baptisms 1684 to 1718, burials 1538 to 1725 and marriages 1540 to 1703. This is a transcript made in 1720; there are gaps in the burials between 1625 and 1664 and 1705 and 1713. It also contains briefs from 1717 to 1720; (2) a rough collection of notes in much disorder, with gaps, contains all three entries from 1730 to 1743; (3) baptisms and burials 1730 to 1812, marriages 1730 to 1753; (4) marriages 1754 to 1812.

It is probable that the chapel in ADVOWSON Wallop to which 8 acres of tithe belonged at the time of the Domesday Survey was in Over Wallop.<sup>90</sup> Over Wallop was, however, a separate parish in 1291,<sup>91</sup> although as late as the end of the 14th century a pension of 30s. was paid to the Treasurer of York Cathedral, the patron of Nether Wallop.<sup>92</sup> The advowson was in the possession of Richard de Wallop in 1342,<sup>93</sup> and has continued with his descendants.<sup>94</sup> The living at the present day is a rectory worth £490 a year with three acres of glebe and residence. The tithes of the manor of Over Wallop Moyles, afterwards commuted for a fixed pension of 30s., belonged to the Abbess of Wherwell.<sup>95</sup>

There is a Baptist chapel in that portion of Middle Wallop which is in this parish. It was built in 1848 and seats 180.

In 1707 Edward Pyle, by his will, CHARITIES bearing date 6 June, gave to the poor for ever the yearly sum of 40s. to be made into coats or waistcoats. The annuity is paid by the Earl of Portsmouth.

A further annuity of £5, supposed to have been derived from a donor of the name of Pyle, locally known as the Freemantle Charity, was in 1899 redeemed by the transfer to the official trustees of £200 2½ per cent. Debenture Stock of the Midland Railway Co.

Sir Richard Rede's gift (see under Nether Wallop), the sum of £1 13s. 8d. received, after deduction for land tax, is distributed in money among six poor persons.

The Rev. Henry Wake, by will, proved in 1852, bequeathed a sum of money now represented by £908 7s. 4d. West Australian 3 per cent. Inscribed Stock, the dividends, amounting to £27 5s., to be distributed among six men and six women of sixty years of age and upwards at Christmas in each year.

William Hollins, by will, proved in 1865, bequeathed a sum now represented by £204 New South Wales 3 per cent. stock, the dividends, amounting to £6 2s. 6d., to be applied in the distribution of great coats and blankets.

In 1870 John Brownjohn, by a codicil to his will, dated 16 December, bequeathed £298 1s. 7d. India 3 per cent. stock upon trust that out of the annual income £2 should be paid in sums of 2s. 6d. to each of sixteen of the oldest poor on St. Thomas's Day, and the remainder, £6 18s. 8d., distributed in calico to poor families.

Miss Sarah Brownjohn, by will, proved in 1886, left £98 9s. 9d. like stock, the dividends, amounting to £2 19s., to be distributed under the title of the 'Elizabethan Charity' among eight of the oldest people of the parish on 1 January in each year.

Miss Emma Brownjohn, by will, proved in 1891, left £94 4s. 9d. like stock, the dividends, amounting to £2 16s. 4d., to be given to sick and distressed poor in the month of September yearly.

Miss Emily Brownjohn, by will, proved in 1892, left £102 11s. 3d. like stock, the dividends, amounting to £3 1s. 4d., to be distributed in blankets, coats, &c., on 1 November.

Charles Percival Titt, by will, proved in 1881, bequeathed a sum now represented by £271 19s. 8d. Gold Coast Government 3 per cent. stock, the

EAST WELLOW

Weleue (xi cent.); Welewe, Welwe (xiii cent.); Estwelewe (xiv cent.); Wellowe, Est Weloughe (xv cent.); Wyllow (xvi cent.). The parish of East Wellow is near the Wiltshire border and covers an area of 2,468 acres, of which 687½ acres are arable, 604½ acres permanent grass and 1,085½ acres woodland.<sup>1</sup> The River Blackwater flows from west to east through the parish, which is hilly and very well wooded. There is, properly speaking, no village, only scattered farmsteads. The old church of St. Margaret and the neighbouring vicarage are on high ground near the river in the west of the parish; the churchyard was enlarged in 1882 by a grant of land from Mrs. Smith, then the lady of the manor. Wellow Farm is south-east of the church, and the school, together with Pottery Farm (probably connected with the Poteria family) and Brook Cottage, is further to the south on the banks of a tributary of the Blackwater near Long's Bridge. Peter Newcome, the antiquary, was born at East Wellow in 1684.<sup>2</sup>

Embley House, the birthplace of Florence Nightingale, stands in the north-eastern part of the parish, about two miles west from Romsey town and not far from the high road to Salisbury; it is an old brick building in the Elizabethan style, and is surrounded by a park of about a hundred acres, with extensive shrubberies and plantations, which contain some fine specimens of conifers and rhododendrons. The soil is sand and loam; subsoil clay and gravel.

Dunwood, extra-parochial, lies to the north; it contains an area of about 261½ acres.

West Wellow (Welewe Gurnay, xiii cent.), formerly a tithing of East Wellow, was in Wiltshire in the hundred of Amesbury until 1895, when it was transferred to Hampshire,<sup>3</sup> where it is locally situated in the hundred of Thorngate. It is now a civil parish, although joined for ecclesiastical purposes to East Wellow. It is divided from East Wellow by a tributary of the River Blackwater, which also flows through the parish, and contains 4 acres of land covered with water, and 1,401 acres of land, of which 574½ acres are arable land, 441½ are permanent grass and 12 acres woodland.<sup>4</sup>

To the west is West Wellow Common, while Wellow Wood Common is in the north of the parish. The inclosure award for West Wellow was given 21 September 1811.<sup>5</sup> The soil is also sand and loam with subsoil of sand and clay, producing crops of wheat, barley and roots.

The manor of EAST WELLOW was MANORS held of the king at the time of the Domesday Survey by Agemund, who had previously held it as an alod of King Edward.<sup>15</sup>

At the beginning of the 13th century the manor was held of the king in chief by Stephen de Hampton.<sup>16</sup> William de Hampton, son and heir of Stephen, granted his estate in East Wellow, about 1242, to the Abbot and convent of Netley,<sup>17</sup> who had already acquired land in the parish of the gift of Peter des Roches, Bishop of Winchester.<sup>18</sup> In the following year Denise the widow of Stephen gave up her right to dower in the manor,<sup>19</sup> and Laurence de Coldecot, with the consent of his wife, Mabel daughter of William de Hampton, gave up to the abbey everything which Mabel had, or in the future might have, of the grant of her father in Wellow.<sup>20</sup>

In March 1251 the abbot and convent received a grant from Henry III of a yearly fair at Wellow on the eve and day of St. Margaret,<sup>21</sup> and in the following December of a weekly market there on Wednesdays.<sup>22</sup> The manor remained in the possession of Netley Abbey till the Dissolution,<sup>23</sup> when it was granted by Henry VIII to John Foster and Richard Marden.<sup>24</sup>

Richard Marden died seised of the manor in 1552, and was succeeded by his namesake, the son of his brother George.<sup>25</sup> In 1579 certain articles of complaint against this Richard were brought to the notice of the Privy Council, 'contayninge his disorderllie dealing and contendenge with the Vicar of Wellow, his contempt of Religion and of her Maiestie's proceedinge . . . and their Lordships to the end that some course might be tacken for the mettinge with the disorders of the said Marden . . . thought to mak choise of three . . . to proceed to an effectuell examinacioun of the matter against hime.<sup>26a</sup>

This Richard Marden sold the estate in 1596 to Sir Humphrey Forster,<sup>26</sup> who died in 1601, leaving as his heir his son Sir William Forster,<sup>27</sup> from whom the manor was bought by Anthony Blagrave in 1608.<sup>28</sup> Anthony settled East Wellow in 1615 on Magdalen the wife of his eldest son, Sir John Blagrave,<sup>29</sup> who conveyed it in 1641 to John Stronghill, Thomas Garrard and Jane Blagrave.<sup>30</sup> In 1678 Robert Newmangen was the vouchee in a recovery,<sup>31</sup> but the estate came subsequently into the possession of Thomas Norton,<sup>32</sup> who conveyed it, apparently, between 1707 and 1714, to James Brydges,<sup>33</sup> afterwards Duke of Chandos. James Duke of Chandos died in 1744, leaving the estate to his son Henry,<sup>34</sup> who was succeeded at his death in 1771 by his only son James.<sup>35</sup> The latter died in 1789, leaving a daughter and heir, Anna Elizabeth, who married Richard Earl Temple in 1796.<sup>36</sup> Earl Temple, who became Marquess of Buckingham in 1813 and Duke of Buckingham and Chandos in 1822,<sup>37</sup> sold the estate to Sir Thomas Freeman-Heathcote, bart., of Hursley, on whose death without issue in 1825<sup>38</sup> the estate was sold to William Edward Nightingale.<sup>39</sup> On the death of the latter in 1874 East Wellow passed to his sister Mary, who had married Mr. Samuel Smith.<sup>40</sup> She died in 1889, and was succeeded by her son, Mr. William Shore Smith, who assumed the name of Nightingale and died in 1894.<sup>41</sup> The estate was then sold to Mr. Archibald Coats, the present owner.

The liberties of the manor included, besides the right to hold a weekly market and yearly fair, a free fishery and free warren, which were appurtenances of the manor as late as 1818.<sup>42</sup> There were two mills in Wellow at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>43</sup> and two water and grist-mills were included among the appurtenances of the manor in 1818<sup>44</sup>; there is,

The tithing of WEST WELLOW originally lay in Hampshire, and formed part of the manor of 'Welewe,' held before and at the time of the Domesday Survey by Agemund. Waleran the Huntsman had, however, seized a virgate and a half of land in the manor, and transferred it from Hampshire to Wiltshire.<sup>45</sup> There is nothing to indicate that Waleran's descendants were ever connected with this parish. The overlordship of the fee passed to the Earls of Salisbury, and became annexed to the honour of Salisbury,<sup>46</sup> whose overlordship in connexion with West Wellow is last mentioned in 1417-18.<sup>47</sup>

The immediate holders of the manor were the Gurnays. Thus, about 1240, Robert de Gurnay held a quarter of a knight's fee in Wellow,<sup>48</sup> and in 1267-8 certain of his tenants at West Wellow complained that by his default they were distrained by Henry de Lacy and his wife Margaret<sup>49</sup> for suit at the hundred of Amesbury, in which West Wellow was situated.<sup>50</sup> Robert de Gurnay died in 1269,<sup>51</sup> and the manor evidently passed, with that of Hyde in South Damerham, to his grandson John. In 1296 it was settled, under the name of Wellow Gurnay, upon John de Badeham (i.e. John ap Adam) and his wife Elizabeth,<sup>52</sup> and in 1322 Roger de Gascelyn died seised of rent in Wellow held for life by grant of John ap Adam, with reversion to the grantor.<sup>53</sup> In 1413 Christine Spileman died holding a messuage and 6 acres of land in West Wellow of the Earl of Salisbury. This tenement had come into the hands of Edward III on account of the insanity of Christine, whose heirs were her cousins Maud Hakepanne and Isabel wife of William Edryche.<sup>54</sup> The chaplain of Wellow was returned in 1428 as holding for the service of a fourth part of a knight's fee certain land and tenements in Wellow which had belonged to John 'Babeham.'<sup>55</sup>

Sir Maurice Berkeley of Beverstone (co. Glouc.) died in 1460 holding a messuage and 20 acres of land in Wellow of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury.<sup>56</sup> This estate probably originally formed part of the ap Adams' holding at Wellow, and had perhaps passed with the manor of Beverstone from Thomas son of John ap Adam in 1330 to Thomas de Berkeley, grandfather of Sir Maurice.<sup>57</sup> This estate descended from that time in the same way as Plaitford (q.v. infra) until 1494,<sup>58</sup> when Katherine Lady Stourton died seised of it.<sup>59</sup> From that time no mention of this estate has been found in any deeds, but Hoare, in his History of Wiltshire, states that it passed with Plaitford to the Comptons, Sir Stephen Fox and the Earls of Ilchester; further, that it was sold by the third earl about 1830-40 as 50 acres of land in the parish to the Rev. Samuel Heathcote of Bramshaw.<sup>60</sup>

The estate which was afterwards called 'the manor of WEST WELLOW' had its origin in the considerable estates in West Wellow which passed to John Gauntlett on the death of his father Thomas in 1580.<sup>61</sup> These may at one time have formed part of the possessions of the Gurnays and the ap Adams in Wellow. Henry Gauntlett was the owner in 1589, in which year he made suit to the Privy Council 'that a wood called Wellow Wood, holden in common between the said Gauntlett and others, containing sixteen parts, whereof six and a half belonged to Gauntlett by inheritance, might be accordingly parted and divided, for that great spoil and waste is made by other commoners to the utter decay of the wood and to the prejudice of Gauntlett, which might be redressed if every one knew his own part in several.'<sup>62</sup> The manor was sold in 1603 by Thomas Gauntlett to Nicholas Hide,<sup>63</sup> of whom it was purchased two years later by William Wilkinson, LL.D.<sup>64</sup> William Wilkinson and his wife Hester sold it in 1651 to Peter Legay,<sup>65</sup> who, with his son Isaac, sold it in 1662 to Richard Bigg of Haynes Hill (co. Wilts.).<sup>66</sup> In 1710-11 Thomas and Charles Norton conveyed the manor to Mary Turgis, widow.<sup>67</sup> West Wellow had passed before 1753 to the Dukes of Chandos,<sup>68</sup> and its subsequent descent is the same as that of East Wellow<sup>69</sup> (q.v.), the present owner being Mr. Archibald Coats.

The manor of EMBLEY (Emelei, xi cent.; Emele, xv cent.; Emley, xvii cent.) was held at the time of the Domesday Survey by Bernard Pauncefoot, and had previously been held as an alod of King Edward by Earl Godwin.<sup>70</sup> Its subsequent history is obscure; but it belonged in 1431 to John Shottore of Romsey,<sup>71</sup> and afterwards came into the possession of the Kirbys,<sup>72</sup> from whom it passed to the Ashleys, apparently by marriage, early in the 17th century. Richard Ashley and Elizabeth his wife, formerly a Kirby,<sup>73</sup> dealt with part of the manor by fine in 1622, when they quitclaimed it to Tristram Ashley.<sup>74</sup> It is possible that Tristram had already some property in Embley, for his mother, Joan, was a daughter of John Kirby.<sup>75</sup>

Gabriel Ashley, who was, perhaps, the grandson of Tristram, seems to have succeeded to the estate at the beginning of the 18th century; his daughter Katherine married George Wyndham, the youngest son of Sir Wadham Wyndham of Norrington (co. Wilts.),<sup>76</sup> and apparently succeeded to a moiety of the manor. Probably Margaret the wife of Samuel Oliver was another daughter of Gabriel Ashley, for she was vouchee in a recovery of 1740, and was evidently of kin to the Ashleys.<sup>77</sup> Her representative at the end of the century was John Thorpe of Embley,<sup>78</sup> whose daughter and heir Frances married Sir William Heathcote, bart.,<sup>79</sup> in 1783. Sir William Heathcote and his wife bought the other moiety of Embley Manor from William Wyndham, probably the grandson of Katherine Ashley.<sup>80</sup> From this date the property has followed the descent of the manor of East Wellow, and is now in the possession of Mr. Archibald Coats.<sup>81</sup>

The small estate of DUNWOOD (Dunewode, Denewode, xiii cent.) has always been extra-parochial, probably because it formed in early times part of the royal forest.<sup>82</sup>

At the beginning of the 13th century Patrick Chaworth, lord of Longstock, and William de Rivers, lord of East Dean, held in common, over the whole wood, certain rights of which they made a division in 1237; the former agreed to exercise them over the eastern and the latter over the western part only.<sup>83</sup>

The rights belonging to William de Rivers afterwards passed to Walter de Romsey and Eleanor his wife,<sup>84</sup> who granted them to Matthew de Columbars for rent of one penny in 1279; they were then regarded as an appurtenance of their manor of East Dean,<sup>85</sup> but seem to have been bought shortly afterwards by the Chaworths and added to the manor of Longstock.<sup>86</sup>

Patrick Chaworth's rights descended to his son and heir Pain,<sup>87</sup> who in 1273 mortgaged them to the Prior and convent of Mottisfont, the conditions being that the wood should remain to them, unless Pain or his heirs should pay them 100 marks at Midsummer in the following year.<sup>88</sup> Presumably the money was paid, for Patrick Chaworth, Pain's brother and heir, was seised of 'heibote and housebote' in Dunwood as an appurtenance of his manor of Longstock, at his death in 1283.<sup>89</sup> His daughter and heir Maud brought his property in marriage to Henry of Lancaster,<sup>90</sup> and Dunwood formed part of the Duchy of Lancaster and the manor of Longstock at least as late as the reign of Elizabeth.<sup>91</sup> It was probably alienated from the duchy together with the manor of Longstock in the early part of the 19th century, and was certainly bought by the Rev. T. H. Tragett before 1880<sup>92</sup>; his widow was the owner of the property in 1898.<sup>93</sup> Dunwood was subsequently bought by Mr. Frederick Houghton of Durley,<sup>94</sup> who sold it in 1901 to Mr. Edmund Charles Simson, the present owner.<sup>95</sup>

CHAWORTH. Burelly argent and gules an orle of martlets sable.

The church of ST. MARGARET CHURCH consists of a chancel 26 ft. 6 in. by 14 ft., a nave 20 ft. by 56 ft., a south aisle 6 ft. 5 in. wide, a modern north vestry and a south porch. The nave dates from the early years of the 13th century, and the chancel seems to be a little later. In the 16th century a south aisle and porch were added and the church reroofed. In modern times, besides general repairs, a north vestry has been built covering the north door of the nave.

The east window of the chancel is original work of three grouped lancets chamfered and rebated externally and inclosed by a segmental chamfered rear arch. Internally the lancets are of two orders, the outer having circular shafts with moulded capitals and bases attached to the mullions and small corbels with carved heads at the jambs. In the gable above is a small circular opening, trefoiled, the outer stonework being modern. In the north wall are two original lancets, and close to the west jamb of the eastern of the two is a fair-sized aumbry with a round head, rebated for a wooden door frame. On the south side is a single lancet, a little further to the west than the north-east window, and near the south-west is a small priest's door of 14th-century date, with a pointed chamfered head having close to it on the west a single trefoiled light of contemporary date with a moulded ogee rear arch. The window is transomed and continued downwards to form a low side window, but the lower part is blocked up. East of the south-east window is a small trefoiled piscina, which seems original. The chancel arch is of wood and plaster and four-centred, the masonry of the east gable of the nave being carried, apparently, on a large bressummer.

The nave has on the north-east a window of 16th-century date with three clumsy trefoiled lights under a square head. At the west end of the north wall is a narrow original lancet, very much restored, with a wide internal splay. Between these is the original north door, now opening into the vestry, with chamfered jambs and two-centred head, plain hollow chamfered abaci and an undercut label. It is very much restored, almost the whole of the head being modern. The south door, which is opposite, is exactly similar but less restored. West of the south door is a window of three trefoiled lights of the same date and detail as that on the north. East of the south door is the opening to the south aisle. This has no arcade, a part of the nave wall having been completely removed and the roof carried on a large beam and two stout chamfered posts. Between the south door and the aisle is a much damaged holy water stoup with a pointed head. Two dormer windows on the south witness to the previous existence of a south gallery. The south aisle has a 16th-century east window of three square-headed lights with frame, sill, and mullions of oak, the frame being of two chamfered orders. To the south are two modern windows of three trefoiled lights under square heads.

The north vestry is quite modern, and is lit on the north by a three-lancet window.

The south porch is of plain open timber with dwarf walls and has a pretty cusped barge-board.

The seating, fittings, &c., are largely modern, including the font, which is octagonal and of 15th-century style, but a late 16th-century altar table remains, an unusually handsome example with heavy baluster legs and carved front. There are also some late 17th-century altar rails with flat balusters, and the quire seats and panelling round the altar are made up of 17th-century woodwork, partly from the old pews and partly brought from elsewhere. There is also a fine hexagonal pulpit with carved panels and sounding board, being the old pulpit restored and reframed in 1907. It stands on a bulging baluster stem steadied by four consoles, and on the canopy is the inscription, 'For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest.' The roofs are of roughly dressed timber, probably of 16th-century date. That of the nave has queen post trusses and old, straight diagonal wind braces, with modern match-boarded ceiling. At the west is a small square bell-cot partly carried by the roof and partly by three posts in the nave. The south door of the nave is old, with a single thickness of oak boarding nailed to horizontal battens and retaining its old wood-cased lock and wrought-iron strap hinges.

Externally against the south door is part of a 14th-century coffin slab with a cross, and in the nave is another one complete, but much plainer.

The most interesting feature of the church is the wall painting, an unusually large amount of what seems to be the 13th-century decoration remaining. In some places it is overlaid with 17th-century texts. The east window is elaborately decorated. The rear arch is painted with masonry patterns, the blocks being 'grained' to represent marble in red and yellow alternately. Over the heads of the lights appear two crowned and bearded heads on a background of stars and leaves in yellow, and there are traces of painting in the splays, perhaps a bishop on the south side, the whole having been framed with a running foliage pattern in dark red. The wall surface around is covered with a masonry pattern of oblong stones, each inclosing a spray with a red cinquefoil or a yellow lily.

On the south wall of the chancel, near the east angle, is a painting of the martyrdom of St. Thomas, and in the east splay of the north-east window are traces of a tall crowned figure. The figures of the knights are shown in mail, and carrying rather small shields, of which one displays the three bears' heads of Fitz Urse.

Between the figure subjects the wall surfaces were decorated with masonry patterns like that on the east wall.

On either side of the east window of the chancel is a consecration cross, and another is on the north wall. In the nave two are on the north wall, one on the west, and one on the south.

Originally there seem to have been two on each wall, making the required twelve, but perhaps the side walls of the chancel had only one each, and the other two may have been on the destroyed east wall of the nave.

The nave walls were covered with a running pattern like that in the chancel, but in square instead of oblong stones. At the plate level ran a deep frieze of foliage in dark red and another four feet from the floor, and on the north wall opposite the south door is St. Christopher, and immediately to the east a woman seated spinning, with a knight walking towards her holding two keys. West of the north doorway is part of another scene with a castle. Above St. Christopher, and a little to the west, is a seated figure with upraised right hand, apparently in blessing.

The wooden belfry contains three bells.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1733, a paten of 1714, given in memory of Timothy Goodaker, minister of Wellow, who died in that year, a flagon of 1843, given by Henry Fox Atherley, curate at Wellow from 1840 to 1844, an almsdish of 1829 and a pewter flagon of 1721.

The registers are as follows:—(1) all entries, 1570 and 1653; (2) 1621 to 1740; (3) baptisms and marriages 1731 to 1775; (4) burials 1678 to 1803; (5) and (6) marriages 1755 to 1766 and 1777 to 1812; (7) baptisms and burials 1803 to 1812.

The right of presentation to the ADVOWSON living of East Wellow belonged in early times to the lords of the manor, and was granted about 1242 by William de Hampton to the Abbot and convent of Netley.<sup>96</sup> In 1244 the churches of Shere and East Wellow, valued at £30 a year, were appropriated to the abbey.<sup>97</sup> A dispute relative to the assessment of the vicarage, which arose between Robert the Abbot of Netley and Thomas the vicar of East Wellow, was settled in 1251 through the arbitration of the official of Hugh des Roches, archdeacon of Winchester.<sup>98</sup> The Abbot and convent of Netley continued to be the patrons until the Dissolution.<sup>99</sup>

In the time of Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, the patronage belonged to the king,<sup>100</sup> and though the rectory and tithes were granted by Queen Elizabeth to William Marquess of Winchester in 1561,<sup>101</sup> the advowson of the vicarage remained with the Crown until 1607, in which year James I granted it at a rent of £4 10s. to Christopher Niccolle and Hugh Bullocke.<sup>102</sup> It was bought before 1681 by Thomas Norton,<sup>103</sup> and has since that date followed the descent of the manor.<sup>104</sup> The present patron is Mr. Archibald Coats.

There is a church mission hall at Canada in West Wellow. The Primitive Methodist chapel at West Wellow was registered for marriages in 1874,<sup>105</sup> and the Wesleyan chapel in 1880.<sup>106</sup>

The church lands consist of four CHARITIES several plots of land, mentioned in a parish survey dated in 1734. They are let at £2 a year, which is carried to the church expenses account.

The annual sum of 10s., payable out of a farm at Wellow Mill, is received from Mr. Archibald Coats and distributed between two aged poor in respect of a charity founded by Colonel William Norton.

MELCHET PARK

Milchet (xi cent.); Mylset, Milset, Melcet, Melkset, Mulchet (xiii cent.); Erles Milchet, Milchet, Melchuyt (xv cent.); Melchett (xvii cent.).

The parish of Melchet Park, formerly extra-parochial, contains 539 acres of land and 2 acres of land covered by water, the greater part of which is included within the inclosure of Melchet Park. Park Water, a tributary of the River Blackwater, forms the western boundary between Melchet Park and Landford.

The greater part of the parish stands at an elevation of about 200 ft. above the ordnance datum, but the land falls slightly to the south.

The following place-names occur :—Upper and Lower Whites, Upper and Lower Foxes, Upper and Lower Branches Wood, Close, and Queen's Coppice.<sup>1</sup>

Rights of taking wood and feeding hogs PARK in Melchet Wood belonged at the time of the Domesday Survey to two of the manors of the Abbess of Wilton in Wiltshire, viz. Washerne (Waisel) and South Newton (Newentone).<sup>2</sup> Melchet Wood, Forest or Park, as it is called indifferently,<sup>3</sup> formed part of the royal forest of Clarendon.<sup>4</sup> From a perambulation of the forest of Melchet taken in 1278–9 it appears that additions had been made since the time of Henry II, but these parts were disafforested in consequence of this perambulation.<sup>5</sup> The forest had evidently been inclosed at one time, for a note is added to the perambulation: 'Also the knights say that Alan de Nevill broke the park of Melchet and caused the beasts to stray; and for this cause he has afforested the wood of Melchet (and other woods) after the first coronation of the aforesaid King Henry (Henry II), and therefore they ought to be disafforested, except only the park of Melchet.'<sup>6</sup> From this time until the final inclosure of the park in 1577 apparently only a small part of it was inclosed, for a deponent in 1619 stated that he remembered when only 20 acres about the lodges were railed off from the forest.<sup>7</sup>

During the 13th century such large grants and sales of timber were made from this wood<sup>8</sup> that in 1254–5 the jurors of the hundred court presented that Melchet was wasted by gifts and sales of the king, and by the taking of timber for the king's works at Clarendon and Salisbury.<sup>9</sup> At the same time it was stated that William, father of William Longespée, had made two inclosures containing 40 acres from Melchet, but that animals could enter and go out from these inclosures.<sup>10</sup> However, grants of timber were very numerous till the end of the 13th century, after which they occur less frequently. Much of the timber was used for the works at Clarendon and Salisbury,<sup>11</sup> but a large quantity went to Queen Eleanor in 1276 for the building of Lyndhurst Manor.<sup>12</sup> The Priors of Mottisfont,<sup>13</sup> Breamore<sup>14</sup> and Christchurch Twynham,<sup>15</sup> and the Abbess of Romsey,<sup>16</sup> also obtained grants of timber, and others were made to private individuals.<sup>17</sup> In 1357 the Sheriff of Wiltshire received an order to make a lodge in the king's park of Melchet,<sup>18</sup> and it may have been at about this time that the inclosure took place of the 20 acres surrounding the lodge, as mentioned above.

In early times the office of custodian of the park of Melchet was appurtenant to the manor of Plaitford,<sup>19</sup> and the tradition of this connexion endured till the 17th century,<sup>20</sup> though the owners of Plaitford seem to have lost the office about the middle of the 14th century.<sup>21</sup> The following were wardens of the forest: Alan de Buxhill, appointed 1370, died 1381<sup>22</sup>; Sir Baldwin de Bereford, appointed 1381, surrendered 1399<sup>23</sup>; Sir Peter de Courtenay, appointed 1399<sup>24</sup>; William Winterbourne, appointed 1400, probably as ranger only<sup>25</sup>; Sir Peter de Courtenay died in 1404–5; John Earl of Somerset, the king's brother, appointed 1404–5,<sup>26</sup> died 1410<sup>27</sup>; Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, appointed 1410, died 1446<sup>28</sup>; William Beauchamp, one of the king's carvers, reversion of office granted 1440,<sup>29</sup> renewed in fee tail 1456,<sup>30</sup> died 1457, but apparently not succeeded by his son Richard<sup>31</sup>; William Earl of Arundel, appointed 1461<sup>32</sup>; George Duke of Clarence, by conveyance from the Earl of Arundel,<sup>33</sup> in 1480, the custody during the minority of Edward son of the duke, being granted to John Hays<sup>34</sup>; Sir Richard Sandes and Richard Lister,<sup>35</sup> appointed lieutenants of the forests of Clarendon and Melchet, 1524; Sir Arthur Plantagenet Viscount Lisle, appointed warden 1524.<sup>36</sup> After this date the custody seems to have passed to Sir William Compton, lord of the manor of Plaitford, who may have claimed and obtained it as belonging of ancient right to that manor, and his heirs held it after him.<sup>37</sup>

Under the Comptons Richard Audley was chief ranger of the forest, and lived in the lodge there.<sup>38</sup> He obtained in 1577 a grant from the Crown of a wood containing 240 acres in Melchet Forest for 21 years.<sup>39</sup> Until that time the deer from the forest had been accustomed to feed unmolested over the adjacent manors of Plaitford, Whiteparish, Sherfield English and Landford, and in compensation for the damage done to their crops the tenants of these manors enjoyed common in the forest. Richard Audley in 1577, in spite of opposition,<sup>40</sup> obtained royal licence to inclose the forest with a paling, having secured from the tenants who enjoyed the common rights some sort of quitclaim of these in exchange for the security of their crops from the depredations of the deer. The inclosure remained undisturbed till early in the 17th century, when Sir John Dacombe, who succeeded Richard Audley and his son as ranger of the park, disparked it of deer<sup>41</sup> about 1610, and turned part of it into arable, part into pasture, and part into a coney warren. After this change, Anne Countess of Dorset, widow of Henry first Lord Compton, caused the park palings to be broken down as a protest against the loss of common rights which she claimed as owner of Plaitford Manor.<sup>42</sup>

The park and forest of Melchet had been granted in 1608 by James I to William Brocke for the lives of John, Alice and Dorothy Dacombe, the children of Sir John Dacombe, mentioned above, at a yearly rent of £13 6s. 8d.,<sup>43</sup> but in 1614 they were granted by the Crown to Sir Laurence Hyde at the same yearly rent.<sup>44</sup> This rent was still being paid in 1663-4, when it was granted to Catherine, consort of Charles II.<sup>45</sup> In 1619 a lawsuit on the subject of common rights at Melchet, between Sir Laurence and Sir Henry Compton, led to a commission being held on the inclosure and bounds of Melchet Forest.<sup>46</sup> The bounds were given in different forms by different deponents, and places mentioned as being on the boundary were Dearsall (Dersall), Mooreclose, Chilford, Dunwoode, Deane Hill, Burchwood, Duxmore, Colemore, Ash Deanes Cross, Shadowe (Shade) Oak, Langley Wood, Landford Wood, Deadmansford, Jennyspath, Blackhedge, Darckcorner, Redshute, Marke Oak,

Revestrowde, Meanewood, Gatmoorepond, Donwood Lake, Abbotspond, Stagmoorehill, Clovenwaie and Tymbril Lane.<sup>47</sup> A comparison of these names with the boundaries of the forest as given in 1278-9 shows that its area had not substantially altered. The 13th-century boundaries were as follows: 'from Dudemannesford by Genene path unto the Black hedge, and thence unto the Hole oke, and so unto the Haselenburch, and so unto the Holeway, and thence unto Cartersford, and so unto the Littelburgh, and from thence unto Arnoldesburgh, and so unto Duxmoresheved, and so in the highway unto without the gate of Colemare, and thence by the highway unto Sparew-ok, and so by the lake, ascending unto the head of the same lake, and so by the way unto the Mart ok, and thence unto the Hole lanes heved unto Oxenhall, and thence descending by the Hole oke and the lake which cometh from Halheweneshull, and thence by the same lake unto the Burne at the Rodeschute, and so always by the water unto the Dedemannesford.'<sup>48</sup>

Sir Laurence Hyde died in 1641, and his two sons, Alexander, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, and James Hyde, M.D., sold the forest and park of Melchet in 1664 to Richard Coleman.<sup>49</sup> Susan Coleman, by her will dated 1719, conveyed the property to trustees for the use of her nephews John, Francis and Nathaniel Tregagle in tail male, with remainder in default to their sister Jane wife of Thomas Whichcote.<sup>50</sup> The male issue of the three-brothers failing, the estate passed to Jane daughter of Jane and Thomas Whichcote, who married Christopher son of Sir Francis Whichcote, bart.<sup>51</sup> She obtained licence in 1775 by Act of Parliament to sell the estate, which was purchased in the same year by James Lockhart.<sup>52</sup> James and his wife Sarah sold the park in 1791-2<sup>53</sup> to John Osborne,<sup>54</sup> by whose heirs it was soon afterwards conveyed to Alexander Baring, created Lord Ashburton in 1835.<sup>55</sup> His son William succeeded in 1848, but died without issue male in 1864,<sup>56</sup> and his widow, Louisa Caroline, resided at Melchet Park till her death in 1903. The estate was advertised for sale in 1908, but was not sold, and is still in the possession of the executors of Lady Ashburton.

The present mansion house of Melchet Court is built of red brick and stone, in the Elizabethan style, on rising ground, in a park of 539 acres, and commands extensive views of the surrounding country. It takes the place of a mansion built in the classic style of red brick, relieved by freestone, which was destroyed by fire in 1873.<sup>57</sup> The Court is surrounded by pleasure grounds some 40 acres in extent. A noticeable object in the park until it was pulled down some years ago was the Hindu Temple built by Major Osborne in 1800 in honour of Warren Hastings.<sup>58</sup>

The extra-parochial district of Melchet Park has never had a church, but owing to its convenient proximity most of the residents were in the habit of attending the church of Plaitford, where a seat was provided for their accommodation. On this account serious difficulties arose between the parson of Plaitford and the inhabitants of Melchet Park as to payment of tithes. Commissioners sent by the Crown in 1619 to inquire into the subject reported that it seemed well that the former arrangement as to attendance should continue, and that Sir Laurence Hyde, then owner of Melchet Park, should, on behalf of the inhabitants, pay 20s. yearly at Easter, in lieu of tithes and all other dues.<sup>59</sup> The inhabitants of Melchet Park are at the present day exempt from tithes, possibly on account of this arrangement.

PLAITFORD

Pleiteford (xi cent.) ; Playteford, Playdeford, Pleyford (xiii cent.) ; Playtfourth (xv cent.).

Plaitford, which formed part of Wiltshire until 1895, contains 5 acres of land covered with water and 1,323 acres of land, of which 382 acres are arable, 247½ permanent grass and 136½ woodland.<sup>1</sup>

The River Blackwater flows through Plaitford from west to east, and the parish is generally low-lying, reaching nowhere a greater height than 140 ft.

The original village of Plaitford, with the church, rectory, manor farm and pound, lies to the north of the River Blackwater, but the chief part of the population is now collected near the Southampton and Salisbury high road, which crosses the parish from east to west more than half a mile south of the church. Plaitford Green is a small district in the north of the parish.

Plaitford Wood and Boulder Wood in the north form the chief part of the woodland. Plaitford Common, which occupies all the southern portion of the parish, consists chiefly of rough grass land, and contains little timber. The soil is sand, gravel and clay, and is favourable to the growth of timber. Part of Whiteparish was transferred to Plaitford in 1885.<sup>2</sup>

The manor of PLAITFORD was held MANOR of the king in chief for the service of keeping the park of Melchet.<sup>3</sup> At the time of the Domesday Survey it was held as 2 virgates of land by Edmund, and a virgate of this estate had been held before the Conquest by Algar.<sup>4</sup> Edmund was almost certainly the son of Aiulf, who held West Grimstead at the time of the Survey, and the Edmund son of Aiulf who held 'Bredford' at the same date,<sup>5</sup> for Plaitford afterwards became a member of the manor of West Grimstead.<sup>6</sup> The manor subsequently passed to the family called de Grimstead, who took their name from their chief manor of West Grimstead (co. Wilts.). Both manors probably passed to them by descent from Edmund son of Aiulf, for in 1166 Richard de Grimstead stated that he held no knights of the ancient enfeoffment in the time of Henry I nor of the new enfeoffment after his death, but that he held his demesne for the service of one knight's fee of the king.<sup>7</sup> Richard de Grimstead paid aid for this fee from 1160 until 1171-2.<sup>8</sup> Walter de Grimstead, who held land in Wiltshire from 1186, was probably the successor of Richard.<sup>9</sup> He died about 1213 and his son Richard succeeded.<sup>10</sup> In 1231 Alice widow of Richard de Grimstead paid a fine for having the custody of Richard's heir,<sup>11</sup> and in 1233-4 she demised to Nicholas de Haversham for eight years all her dower in Grimstead for the meadows of Widi-mead, Alderbury and Exmead.<sup>12</sup> Richard's heir was apparently John de Grimstead, who held one fee in Grimstead (which probably included Plaitford) about 1240.<sup>13</sup> In 1274-5 John son of William de Grimstead was holding the manor of Plaitford.<sup>14</sup> He died about 1287-8 and was succeeded by a son Andrew,<sup>15</sup> who, dying in 1324-5, left a son and heir John.<sup>16</sup> The latter died in 1338, and the marriage of his widow, Eleanor, was granted in that year to Peter de Beauchamp.<sup>17</sup> His heir was Adam de Grimstead, his son by his first wife Agnes.<sup>18</sup> Adam died in 1346,<sup>19</sup> but the manor had been settled upon his wife Eleanor,<sup>20</sup> and she held it till her death in 1348.<sup>21</sup> She had married as a second husband John de Tuberville, but her heir was her son John de Grimstead,<sup>22</sup> who died in 1361, leaving as his heir Reginald Perot, son of Isabel, sister of Adam de Grimstead, John's father.<sup>23</sup> Reginald died in 1370, and was succeeded by his son Ralph, then an infant.<sup>24</sup> Dower consisting of several rooms in Plaitford, rents from various tenants and a third of the profits from the view of frankpledge were assigned to Beatrice widow of Reginald.<sup>25</sup> Ralph Perot in 1389 released all his claim in the manor to Sir John Holand, Earl of Huntingdon,<sup>26</sup> and at about the same time Robert Beverley, who had married Beatrice widow of Reginald Perot,<sup>27</sup> and to whom Edward III had granted the wardship of two-thirds of Reginald Perot's land, likewise released his claim to the earl.<sup>28</sup> These conveyances were probably made for the purposes of some settlement, for in 1406 Ralph Perot released all his claim to Sir John de Berkley and Elizabeth his wife.<sup>29</sup> From that time the manor followed the same descent as that of Minstead<sup>30</sup> (q.v. infra) until 1679, when it was sold by Richard Compton to Sir Stephen Fox.<sup>31</sup> Sir Stephen accompanied Charles in his exile and had charge of all the expenses of the royal household. He was made paymaster of the army in 1661, and in 1679 became one of the lords commissioners of the treasury. He died in 1716,<sup>32</sup> and the manor passed to his son Stephen, who was created Earl of Ilchester in 1756.<sup>33</sup> The manor has since descended with the title of Earl of Ilchester.<sup>34</sup>

It was said in 1619 that the steward of Sir Henry Compton's manor of Plaitford, when he held the manor courts, sometimes had sport with greyhounds in Melchet Park, with the allowance of the keeper,<sup>35</sup> that the commons of Plaitford 'bounded from Deadman's Fowrde to Jennys Path and thence to Blackhedge and to Thruxis Stroud,' and that the common of Rexestround and Deersdale belonged to the manor of Plaitford.<sup>36</sup>

A mill existed at Plaitford at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>37</sup> It is mentioned in 1338-9,<sup>38</sup> but no further reference to a mill has been found, and none exists in the parish at the present day.

A court roll of the manor for 1385-6 and a rent roll of 1528-9 are preserved at the Public Record Office.<sup>39</sup>

in Plaitford apparently as appurtenant to his manor of West Grimstead (Feud. Aids, v, 229). Sir John de Berkley did not really acquire the manor of Plaitford until 1406.

The church of ST. PETER lies in a CHURCH hollow close to the Wiltshire border.

The building has a continuous chancel and nave 59½ ft. long and 16 ft. 2 in. wide, a south vestry, west gallery, north porch and west bell-turret of wood.

The walls of the church are probably of early 13th century date and the vestry appears to have been a small chapel, and now contains the only original window in the church, a small lancet with external chamfer and internal rebate. The walls externally are of flint with ironstone quoins and later patching. Internally there is modern plaster.

The chancel has three grouped lancets on the east wall. The north wall has two single lancets and one double, the south wall the same number, and the west two lancets and a sexfoil.

The north and south doorways have plain pointed heads with a continuous chamfer; the south doorway is now blocked. The south vestry appears to have opened to the church by an arch, now blocked and plastered, and no detail is visible; it has a modern east window, an original lancet on the south and a blocked window on the west. It contains a plain wood chest. A trefoiled piscina and single round-headed sedile are plastered. The font is a modern restoration from part of a 13th-century font with four spurs on the angles.

The bell is small and modern.

The plate consists of a plated chalice, paten and flagon.

The earliest register comprises the fragments of another book bound up with a printed edition, and contains mixed entries between 1710 and 1778; the printed section contains baptisms and burials 1781 to 1812. There is a printed marriage and banns book, 1764 to 1810.

Plaitford was a chapelry annexed to the church of West Grimstead<sup>40</sup> until 1866, when it was declared a rectory<sup>41</sup> in the gift of the Earl of Ilchester. The advowson seems to have passed with the manor until 1361, when it was sold with the manor of West Grimstead by John de Grimstead to John de Bettesthorn,<sup>42</sup> who died in 1399, when it passed to his daughter Elizabeth wife of Sir John de Berkley.<sup>43</sup> Sir John acquired the manor in 1406, and the descent of the advowson from that time is identical with that of the manor.<sup>44</sup>

There are no endowed charities in this parish.

THE HUNDRED OF REDBRIDGE

At the time of the Domesday Survey the hundred of Redbridge (Rodbrige, xi cent.) included the parishes of Eling, Fawley, Dibden, Oakley<sup>2</sup> in Mottisfont, 'Hariford' (perhaps Hartford in Beaulieu), Otterwood in Beaulieu, 'Gatingeorde' (perhaps Gatewood in Exbury), 'Titegrave' (perhaps Tidgrove in Kingsclere) and 'Roweste' and 'Northam,' which have not been identified.<sup>3</sup> In 1316 only Eling, Dibden and Stone in Fawley remained in the hundred.<sup>4</sup> Stone was transferred between 1831<sup>5</sup> and 1841 to Dibden Liberty,<sup>6</sup> in which the rest of the parish of Fawley is now situated. Wigley has always formed part of Thorngate Hundred.<sup>7</sup> Cadnam also, which lies partly in the parish of Eling and partly in that of Minstead, has always been in the hundred of Thorngate.<sup>8</sup>

Dibden was assessed apart from the hundred in 1544 to 1546.<sup>9</sup> After 1570-1 Dibden appears as a liberty<sup>10</sup> and became entirely separated from Redbridge Hundred.<sup>11</sup>

Lyndhurst, Minstead and part<sup>12</sup> of Bramshaw were transferred from the New Forest and Nursling from Buddesgate Hundred to this hundred between 1831 and 1841.<sup>13</sup>

William de Valence obtained immunity from suit at the hundred court in the 13th century for Hoke and Strete.<sup>14</sup>

REDBRIDGE HUNDRED

A survey of the hundred was taken in 1651.<sup>15</sup> The court leet and law day were held twice yearly at Hocktide and Martinmas, either at Totton or Lyndhurst, as were the three-weekly hundred courts. In the tithing of Eling it was the custom for the last taker of any land there to do the service of tithing-man. The steward for the courts was usually appointed by the Warden of the New Forest, who was also, as a rule, the owner of the hundred for the time being. The bailiff was appointed by the sheriff of the county.<sup>16</sup>

Redbridge was a royal hundred, but was several times given in dower to the queens consort of England or otherwise granted out by the Crown, and in this way was granted to Eleanor<sup>17</sup> (in 1279) and Margaret<sup>18</sup> (in 1299), consorts of Edward I; Isabella consort of Edward II in 1318,<sup>19</sup> Philippa consort of Edward III in 1331,<sup>20</sup> who granted it to Thomas West in 1333<sup>21</sup> and John de Beauchamp about 1343.<sup>22</sup> The king confirmed it to John de Beauchamp in 1359-60,<sup>23</sup> and granted it to Richard de Pembrugg in 1360-1<sup>24</sup>; to Sir John de Foxle in 1372-3 and 1376<sup>25</sup>; to Edward Duke of York in 1397; to Sir Edward Courtenay in 1415; and to Thomas Earl of Salisbury in 1418.<sup>26</sup> It was granted to Humphrey Duke of Gloucester in 1428, and in 1441 to William de la Pole Earl of Suffolk on the death or cession of Duke Humphrey.<sup>27</sup> The duke held it until his death in 1446-7,<sup>28</sup> and it was granted in 1461 to William Fiennes Lord Say and Sele, who surrendered it in 1467 to William Earl of Arundel, to whom a grant of the hundred was made for life with remainder to Sir Thomas Arundel and his heirs male by Margaret his wife.<sup>29</sup> This grant was confirmed in 1490 to Thomas, then Earl of Arundel.<sup>30</sup> No further grants of the hundred have been found until 1624, when it was granted to the Earl of Pembroke during the minority of the Earl of Southampton, by whose father the hundred had formerly been held.<sup>31</sup> In 1668 a warrant was issued for a grant of the hundred to Charles Lord St. John de Basing,<sup>32</sup> and in 1689 it was confirmed to him as Marquess of Winchester.<sup>33</sup> Presumably in the next century it reverted to the Crown, by whose appointment the office of steward of the hundred of Redbridge and the manor of Lyndhurst is held.<sup>34</sup>

ELING

Edlinges (xi cent.); Elinga, Elinges (xii cent.); Elinges (xiii cent.).

The ancient parish of Eling included the modern parishes of Eling, Netley Marsh, Copythorne, Colbury and Marchwood, the four latter parishes being formed from Eling in 1894.<sup>1</sup> The inclosure award for Eling is dated 30 November 1814.<sup>2</sup>

The modern parish of Eling lies on the western shores of the Southampton Water and includes Rumbridge, Totton and parts of Hounsdown and Pooksgreen. It contains 2,144 acres of land, including 10 acres of inland water, of which 507½ acres are arable land, 947½ permanent grass and 42½ woodland.<sup>3</sup> It lies in the valley of the River Test,<sup>4</sup> which meets Bartley Water, as it flows through the parish, in Eling channel. There is a station at Totton on the London and South Western Railway.

Totton is the most populous part of Eling on account of its saw and flour-mills, chemical manure works, brewery, and tar distilling and creosoting works. A bone-mill and soap manufactory formerly existed there, and a considerable trade, much reduced since the opening of the railway, was carried on in coal, timber and corn. There were also magazines of military stores, and a large shipbuilding establishment, now removed to Redbridge. A fair for cattle takes place at Eling on 5 July. On the banks of the Test are about 50 acres of excellent salt-marsh, over which the inhabitants of Eling enjoy rights of common, except from the second Monday after Easter until 14 August, when only seven persons may feed one horse each. It is then closed for about a month until the grass has been cut and carried. Henry I crossed to Normandy from Eling (Eilling) and King's pleas were held there in his reign.<sup>5</sup>

The small village of Eling lies on the road from Totton to Pooksgreen. The church stands on high ground not far from the water's edge, and near it is the vicarage with its extensive garden and fine trees. To the south is Colbury Manor, the residence of the Misses Hony, and to the north is Downs House, standing in grounds of 140 acres, the property of Mr. Archibald C. Saunders, now occupied by the Hon. Mrs. Montgomerie. There are parks at Rushington House, the seat of Mr. Vere Henry Birch Reynardson, and at Testwood House, the residence of Captain A. P. Beaumont, J.P.

Netley Marsh lies to the north-west of Eling, on low ground rising from 50 ft. in the village to 140 ft. above the ordnance datum at Tatchbury Mount<sup>6</sup> in the west. It includes Calmoor, Hillstreet, Woodlands and part of Ower, and contains 3,886 acres of land, of which 7 acres are covered with water, 1,269 acres are arable land, 1,831 permanent grass and 303½ woodland.<sup>6</sup> The village is on the high road from Fordingbridge to Southampton, and to the west of it is the Hampshire Reformatory School, opened in 1855.<sup>7</sup> Woodlands is south of the village, Calmoor, Hillstreet and Ower (chiefly in Copythorne) are to the north. Cadnam River and the River Blackwater pass through the north of the parish.

There are parks at Little Testwood House (Col. the Hon. Edward Arthur Palk), at Loperwood Manor (Mr. R. C. Sutherland Pearce), at Tatchbury Mount, which has been in the possession of the Timson family for several generations and is now in the possession of Mr. H. T. Timson, and at Tatchbury Manor House (Lieut.-Col. W. C. Pollard). The parish is well wooded by small copses. There is some rough common land to the east of Woodlands. The soil is heavy clay and the subsoil clay.

Copythorne is a large parish, lying low in the valleys of the Cadnam River, the Blackwater and the Bartley Water, including Bartley, Newbridge, Wigley and parts of Cadnam and Ower. It contains 5,551 acres of land with 29 acres of inland water, of which 916 acres are arable land, 1,715 acres permanent grass and 1,59½ acres woodland.<sup>8</sup>

The village is on the high road to Romsey, and to the north of it is Copythorne Common; parts of Cadnam Common and Furzley Common are also in the parish, and Shelly Common, a wide tract of rough common, lies on the north side of the Salisbury and Southampton high road. There are large tracts of woodland in the south, west and north of the parish, and there are parks at Paultons (Captain Roger C. H. Sloane-Stanley), Bartley Lodge (Major F. B. Dalrymple), Beechwood (Col. Charles G. Heathcote, J.P.), and Goldenhays (Mrs. Howard). The soil is clay.

There are tumuli at Barrow Hill, east of the village of Copythorne, and a supposed Roman camp on Half-Moon Common.

The parish of Colbury, including part of Hounsdown, lies low in the valley between the Beaulieu River and Bartley Water. It contains 5,472 acres of land, of which 4 acres are covered by water, 287½ acres are arable land and 930½ permanent grass, while the computed 4,763 acres of woods and plantations extend into the surrounding parishes and the New Forest.<sup>9</sup> The New Forest Union Workhouse is at Ashurst, in this parish near the Lyndhurst Road Station, on the London and South Western Railway.

The village lies along Deerleap Lane, which, opposite Langley Manor, branches south from the Lymington and Southampton high road. Hounsdown is about a quarter of a mile north on this high road.

Marchwood includes that part of the ancient parish of Eling which lies low<sup>10</sup> at the mouth of the River Test and south-east of the town of Eling. It contains 1,599 acres of land, of which 4 acres are covered with water, 430½ acres are arable land, 829½ are pasture land and 181 are woodland.<sup>11</sup> The village lies along the road from Eling to Dibden. There are Government powder magazines and Metropolitan Police barracks.

Byams House, north-east of the village, was rebuilt in 1878, and was for many years the seat of Mr. William Gascoigne Roy, J.P., to whose family it had belonged for over a century. It now belongs to Major John H. Grime Lloyd. Marchwood Park, formerly the property of the Holloway family, but now belonging to Mrs. Ross Porter, is in the south of the parish, and lies partly in Dibden. The soil is clay and sand.

The manor of ELING was held at the MANORS time of the Domesday Survey by the king in demesne. In the time of King Edward it had rendered half a day's ferm, and its hidage was not known. Belonging to Eling were two berwicks in the Isle of Wight and three elsewhere, but when Hugh de Port received the manor the two berwicks in the Isle of Wight were separated from it and were held by Earl William of Hereford. Sixteen villein tenements, three bordar tenements and a considerable amount of woodland had been taken from the manor and put into the New Forest.<sup>15</sup> With the exception of a grant for life to Gervaise de Southampton, who founded God's House, Southampton, about 1193,<sup>16</sup> the manor apparently remained with the Crown<sup>17</sup> until King John early in his reign granted it to Emma de Clere or de Staunton, to hold for the service of a tenth part of a knight's fee.<sup>18</sup> Emma's daughter Cecily married Henry Husee, who, probably for entry without licence, forfeited the manor, which was ordered to be restored to him in 1217.<sup>19</sup> However, this was evidently not done until 1221, when another order to the same effect was given to the Sheriff of Hampshire.<sup>20</sup> About 1227, by covenant with the owners of the neighbouring manors of Testwood, Totton and Winsor as to common of pasture at Eling, Henry and Cecily obtained a place called Parlesham and woodland and pasture in Siggesford and Parlesham and 60 acres of land to the east and north of Necesswude with the right to inclose and reduce it to arable.<sup>21</sup> Cecily Husee died about 1235–6, and was succeeded by her son Matthew.<sup>22</sup> In 1240–1 Maud Husee, possibly widow of Matthew, conveyed a carucate of land in Eling to John de Gatesden, who was to hold it of Maud and her heirs for the service of half a knight's fee.<sup>23</sup> Whatever the relationship between Matthew and Maud Husee, we find that the latter afterwards became the wife of Ralph Chenduit, and together with him in 1242–3 settled the manor upon John de Gatesden and his heirs, with reversion in default to themselves and their heirs.<sup>24</sup>

Margaret, daughter and heir of John de Gatesden, married John de Camoys,<sup>25</sup> and in 1267 Ralph de Camoys, son and heir of John, conveyed all his right in Eling to Robert Waleran.<sup>26</sup> The latter, before his death about 1273,<sup>27</sup> had already conveyed Eling to Alan de Plukenet,<sup>28</sup> but possibly owing to some flaw in the proceedings by which Ralph de Camoys had conveyed his right to Robert Waleran in 1267, Margaret wife of John Camoys brought a successful suit against Alan Plukenet for the manor in 1297–8.<sup>29</sup> Moreover, on her death in 1310–11, the king took fealty for the manor of her son Ralph,<sup>30</sup> who in 1319–20 obtained a grant of free warren in the manor,<sup>31</sup> and settled it in 1323 upon himself and his wife Elizabeth.<sup>32</sup> However, in that year, for some unknown reason, the manor reverted to the Husees, who, from the time when Eling was alienated to John de Gatesden in 1240–1,<sup>32a</sup> had retained their right in the overlordship and the reversion of the manor.<sup>33</sup> In 1345 Henry Husee, great-grandson of the Matthew Husee mentioned above,<sup>34</sup> granted it for life to Hugh de Camoys, the king's yeoman,<sup>35</sup> possibly son of Ralph, son of John and Margaret.<sup>36</sup> This Hugh obtained a grant of free warren in the manor in 1367–8,<sup>37</sup> and in 1372–3 Sir Henry Husee, grandson of Henry the grantor of the manor, gave the reversion after the death of Hugh de Camoys to

<sup>33</sup> Maud, then wife of William Paynel, formerly wife of Ralph Chenduit, granted this interest in 1268–9 to Henry son of Matthew Husee (Feet of F. Div. Co. 53 Hen. III, no. 448; Baker, Hist. of Northants, i, 649). In 1273 this Henry Husee claimed the manor against Alan Plukenet (Cal. # A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester.<sup>38</sup> Hugh was still in possession in 1380,<sup>39</sup> but had apparently died before 1385, in which year William of Wykeham granted the manor to the Warden and scholars of Winchester College,<sup>40</sup> who are the lords of the manor at the present day.

WINCHESTER COL-LEGE. *Argent two

An estate at Eling known as the manor of ELING was held by a family taking their name from the estate by the serjeanty of being bailiff itinerant in the hundreds of East and West Medina and Freshwater in the Isle of Wight, and in the hundreds of Christchurch, Ringwood, Fordingbridge, Redbridge and the New Forest.<sup>41</sup> It is not known how this family obtained the estate, but Edmund de Eling occurs in 1168-9,<sup>42</sup> and in 1228 the Sheriff of Hampshire was commanded to give seisin to Richard de Eling of 4 acres of land and a garden in Eling.<sup>43</sup> Richard was succeeded before 1255-6 by Roger de Eling, who still held the manor in 1279-80.<sup>44</sup> Richard de Eling died in 1345 holding the estate, which was in the same year delivered to his son John,<sup>45</sup> who died seised in 1349-50.<sup>46</sup> On the death of his son and heir John<sup>47</sup> in 1362-3 the manor was divided between his sisters, Emma wife of John Prior and Aubrey wife of John Pyk, and Alice daughter of his third sister Maud.<sup>48</sup> The further descent of this manor has not been traced. Probably with its division between the three co-heirs any manorial rights which had belonged to it fell into abeyance.

The manor of RUMBRIDGE (Rumbrigg, Rombrigg, xiv cent.) or RUSHINGTON probably formed a part of Eling and was in the hands of the Kings of England until 1159, when it was granted to Cobb the Smith.<sup>49</sup> The estate was held for the service of providing either 50 or 100 barbed arrows when the king should come beyond the bridge of Redbridge towards the New Forest, the number of arrows varying in different inquisitions.<sup>50</sup> Cobb, or descendants of the same name, held the estate until 1201-2.<sup>51</sup> In

1212-17 the estate is returned as held by the heir of Cobb the Smith (faber),<sup>52</sup> and this heir was probably Herbert the Smith, to whom the Sheriff of Hants was commanded to restore 12½ acres of meadow in Eling in 1228.<sup>53</sup> In the Testa de Nevill it is stated that the serjeanty of Robert Baldet in 'Redburgh,' for which he paid annually to the Exchequer 100 barbed arrows, was alienated in part: that is to say, 2 virgates were held of Roger by Herbert son of Herbert and Adam de Redburgh for a rent of 5s. a year.<sup>54</sup> John Baldet died in 1256-7 holding a hide of land in Hampshire for the service of 100 barbed arrows, leaving Elias his son and heir,<sup>55</sup> a minor, whose custody was granted in 1257 to Richard Esturmy.<sup>56</sup> In 1316 Elias was holding the vill of 'Brykemerston,'<sup>57</sup> Netley, Berkley, Winsor, Tatchbury, Rumbridge and Newton.<sup>58</sup> He died in 1320-1, leaving a son and heir Philip,<sup>59</sup> who granted the estate to Stephen Baldet, or Baudet, probably a brother or an uncle, and his wife Ursula, and their heirs de se, with reversion in default to Philip and his heirs.<sup>60</sup> Stephen died in 1362, leaving a daughter Christine,<sup>61</sup> but she died without issue in 1367, and under the above grant the manor passed to John Baldet, son and heir of Robert, another brother of Philip.<sup>62</sup> John died in 1443 holding the manor<sup>63</sup> of Rumbridge, which, it is stated, was granted to a certain Philip Baldet, John's ancestor, 'by the name of 24s. rent with the appurtenances.'<sup>64</sup> John's heir was his daughter Ellen,<sup>65</sup> who married William Aldryche and died holding the manor in 1461.<sup>66</sup> Her heir may have been Katherine wife of William Fynemark, for in 1472-3 William and Katherine conveyed five messuages and 24 acres of land in Totton and Rumbridge to Lewis Aynes.<sup>67</sup>

John Canterton died in 1473-4 holding land in Rumbridge and elsewhere which had been settled on him and his wife Alice, who survived him.<sup>68</sup> The manor remained in the Canterton family<sup>69</sup> until 1577, when William Canterton and John his son sold the site of the manor to Richard Bacon.<sup>70</sup> John Bacon and his wife Anne sold the manor in 1602 to Thomas Edmonds,<sup>71</sup> of whom it was purchased in 1626 by Robert Guye.<sup>72</sup> In 1638 West Fashion died seised of the manor, leaving as his heir his nephew Thomas son of George Fashion.<sup>73</sup> The manor passed evidently in the same way as Stone in Fawley to William Bulkly and his wife Mary, who sold it in 1704-5 to Samuel Mason.<sup>74</sup> In 1733 it was purchased of William Olding and his wife Elizabeth by Henry Rositer.<sup>75</sup>

Mr. Walter Lynne resided at Rushington Manor in 1859,<sup>76</sup> and Edward Birch Reynardson, who purchased the estate about 1860,<sup>77</sup> died in 1896, leaving a son, Vere Henry, the present owner of Rushington Manor.<sup>78</sup>

Two estates mentioned in the Domesday Survey under the name Lestorde, or Lestred, are probably to be identified with the modern TESTWOOD (Terstwuode, Therstwuode, xiii cent.). One lay in Bovre (New Forest) Hundred and had been held in the time of King Edward in parage by two allodial owners. At the Conquest it passed to Earl Roger of Shrewsbury, and was counted in the New Forest, except for a quarter of a virgate which was held of the earl by a certain man who had there three bordars.<sup>79</sup> The second estate was in the hundred of Redbridge, and was held under the Bishop of Bayeux by Hugh de Port, of whom it was held by a certain Hugh. In the time of King Edward it had been held of the king by Alsi.<sup>80</sup>

Land at Testwood was acquired during the 13th century by the family of Testwood.<sup>81</sup> In 1227-8 Richard de Testwood, who was in possession of the manor, made a composition with Henry Husee, lord of the manor of Eling, as to common right at Eling,<sup>82</sup> and eight years later Walter de Bruge gave 5 acres of land in Testwood and Totton to Simon de Testwood.<sup>83</sup>

The manor was held of the Abbess of Romsey at a fee farm of £6 10s. 6d.,<sup>84</sup> and was so held until the Dissolution.<sup>85</sup>

Richard de Testwood settled the manor in 1317-18 upon himself for life, with remainder to his son William and Elizabeth his wife and their issue.<sup>86</sup> William, who is called the son of Katherine de Testwood, was in possession of land at Testwood in 1329,<sup>87</sup> and in 1358-9 John son of William de Testwood sold the manor of Testwood to Sir Thomas West.<sup>88</sup> The manor then continued like Oakhanger and Newton Valence<sup>89</sup> (q.v.) in the West family, remaining in the family after these two manors had been sold and passing on the death of Sir Thomas West in 1622 to his grandson and heir Thomas Leigh.<sup>90</sup> The latter was succeeded in 1640-1 by his son Philip,<sup>91</sup> but Testwood was mortgaged in 1691 by Edward Leigh, probably heir of Philip, to John Lord Stawell Baron of Somerton, who soon obtained full possession of the manor.<sup>92</sup> It was sold by the trustees of Lord Stawell in 1695 as the manor and manors of Testwood and Ridge to Gilbert Serle, a merchant of Leghorn,<sup>93</sup> and it subsequently passed like Weston Corbett (q.v.)<sup>94</sup> to Sir William Oglander.<sup>95</sup> The manor is last mentioned in 1830,<sup>96</sup> but all manorial rights have long since lapsed.

Testwood House was in 1848 the seat of Mrs. Sturges Bourne, and passed from her to Miss Ann Sturges Bourne, her daughter.<sup>97</sup> It subsequently went to Lieut.-Col. Bruce, of whom it was purchased in February 1894 by Captain A. P. Beaumont, J.P., the present owner.<sup>98</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey, as in the time of King Edward, Agemund held half a hide of the king in TOTTON.<sup>99</sup> (Totintone, xi cent.; Cotintone, xiii cent.) which was possibly identical with the estate confirmed by Henry III to his newly-founded abbey at Netley in 1251.<sup>100</sup> The abbot held Totton, with land at Testwood, of the tenant-in-chief, William de Hampton, for the service of a sixth part of a knight's fee,<sup>101</sup> and claimed assize of bread and ale and immunity from suit at the hundred of Redbridge.<sup>102</sup> In 1338 the abbot and convent obtained licence to grant lands and fisheries in Totton and Testwood to Roger de Petersfield and Henry Deverel of Netley (Lettele) for a rent of £40,<sup>103</sup> and in 1346 were said to be holding the manor in frank almoign for the fifth part of a knight's fee.<sup>104</sup>

Totton remained with the abbey until the Dissolution,<sup>105</sup> and was granted in 1546 to John Bellowe and John Broxholme.<sup>106</sup> They sold it on the following day to Richard Marden,<sup>107</sup> who died in 1552. His nephew and heir, Richard Marden,<sup>108</sup> sold the manor in 1567 to Chideock Paulet of Odiham,<sup>109</sup> whose son William succeeded his father in 1574,<sup>110</sup> and died in 1595-6, leaving a son and heir William.<sup>111</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

In June 1660 William Paulet, son of the last named William, conveyed the whole manor of Totton, except the farm and lands called Little Testwood, to James Betts of London and his heirs and assigns.<sup>112</sup> The descent of the manor after this time is not clear, but it is probable that the estate which passed to the Betts family then became known as the manor of TOTTON LOPERWOOD, and later as LOPERWOOD only, while Little Testwood alone remained to the Paulet family. Even so the history of Totton Loperwood is a blank throughout the 18th century, but in 1812-13 it was sold by George Jackson and Cordelia his wife to John Whishaw.<sup>113</sup> From Whishaw it was presumably purchased by John Taylor, who sold to Henry Timson of Tatchbury Mount (q.v.). The latter, about 1860, sold to Henry Stanley and Robert Pearce, whose son Robert Charles Sutherland Pearce is the present owner.<sup>114</sup> The house is still known as Loperwood Manor, but all manorial rights have long ceased,<sup>115</sup> and the estate now owned by Mr. Pearce is much smaller than the original Totton Loperwood, since Mr. Timson retained much of the land when he sold to Mr. Pearce's father in 1860.<sup>116</sup>

Little Testwood Farm and lands meanwhile remained to the Paulets from the original manor of Totton. Thus William fifth son of Norton Paulet (1681-1741) of Ampport was called of Little Testwood, and on his death unmarried in 1772 he left his estates by will to his brother George, with remainder to Henry second son of George.<sup>117</sup>

Sir Henry Charles Paulet, son of the last-mentioned Henry, was owner and occupier of Little Testwood House in the early 19th century. He was created a baronet in 1836 and died unmarried in December 1886.<sup>118</sup> Little Testwood House then became the residence of Col. the Hon. Edward Arthur Palk, the present occupier.

Land in Testwood and Totton, later known as the manor of TOTTON, was held for the serjeanty of finding one servant with a hauberk in time of war in England for forty days.<sup>119</sup> It was evidently closely connected with the estates at Bisterne and Minstead held by the same serjeanty, and may possibly, therefore, be identified with 'Hangre' in the hundred of Redbridge, which, like Bisterne and Minstead, was held before the Conquest by Godric Mal, and at the time of the Survey by his sons.<sup>120</sup> At the end of the 12th century these sons were represented by Hugh de Ivez and Robert Fitz Ulf,<sup>121</sup> and the land at Totton, which Hugh and Robert held,<sup>122</sup> passed with and merged into the manor of Minstead (q.v.).

A hide and a half of land in TATCHBURY (Tachburi, x cent. ; Taceberie, Teocreberie, xi cent. ; Tacheberia, xii cent. ; Tachebury, xv and xvi cent.) and Slackstead was given to the abbey of Hyde on its foundation in 903 by Edward the Elder.<sup>123</sup> Another half hide,<sup>124</sup> which he had held of King Edward the Confessor in parage, was also given to the abbey by Ezi the sheriff between 1066 and 1086.<sup>125</sup> A further entry in the Domesday Survey under 'the lands in the New Forest and round about it' states that 2 hides at Tatchbury in Redbridge Hundred had been held by Bolle and Ulviet, but had been put into the New Forest before 1086.<sup>126</sup> Possibly Bolle and Ulviet had been tenants under Hyde Abbey, and the 2 hides held by them included the whole of the abbatial estate.

The abbot and convent evidently held the manor in demesne from the 12th to the 13th century, when Abbot Walter (1222-48) granted it to Laurence Agneil and his wife Maud, daughter of Alan de Wudfold, and to Richard de Langley and John his son to hold of the abbot and his successors for a yearly rent of 20s.<sup>127</sup> A rent of 20s. from Litchfield and Tatchbury was included in the estates of the abbey at the Dissolution.<sup>128</sup>

Another estate in Tatchbury was held by Henry Husee and Cicely his wife, who in 1227 granted two messuages and 40 acres of land in Eling to Nicholas de Tachbury and Rose his wife for their lives, with reversion to the donors.<sup>129</sup> This was probably the nucleus of the later manor which was held in 1316 by Elias Baldet,<sup>130</sup> and of which John Romsey died seised in 1494, holding of the warden of Winchester College.<sup>131</sup>

The manor passed from John Romsey to his son John,<sup>132</sup> who died in 1503, leaving a son and heir William.<sup>133</sup> Thomas Dixe and Radigund his wife, who seems to have been the heiress of William Romsey,<sup>134</sup> sold the manor in 1559 to Richard Dowce.<sup>135</sup> The latter sold it in 1600-1 to John Grindham,<sup>136</sup> who left it by his will dated 1615<sup>137</sup>

to John Oviatt in tail male with remainder to his brothers William, Edward, Thomas and Henry.<sup>138</sup> John Oviatt died without issue male in 1617, and the manor passed under the will to his brother William.<sup>139</sup> It remained in the family of Oviatt<sup>140</sup> until 1758, when William Oviatt conveyed it to George Glasse.<sup>141</sup> By 1786-7 the manor had passed to Richard Wake and his wife Charlotte,<sup>142</sup> and it remained in the family of Wake until the latter half of the 19th century, being in 1859 the property of George Anthony Wake, who resided at Tatchbury Old Manor.<sup>143</sup> It passed from him before 1875 to Courtenay Freeman Wilson, who sold it some years later to Lieut.-Col. W. C. Pollard, the present owner and occupier of the house.

A hide of land in OWER (Ure, Ora, viii cent.; Hore, xi cent.; Overe, xiii cent.; Oure, xiv cent.; Paultons, xvi cent. et seq.) belonged at the time of the Domesday Survey to the Abbot of Glastonbury, under whom it was held by Gislebert de Bretville, as Elsi had held it of the abbot.<sup>144</sup> According to the Glastonbury annals a certain abbess called Begu, or Buggu, gave 3 hides at 'Ora' to Abbot Etfrid, who succeeded about 719, and her grant was confirmed by Ine, king of the West Saxons, while in 745 Cuthred, king of the West Saxons, gave to Abbot Tumbert (or Cumbert) 3 hides at 'Ure.'<sup>145</sup> Probably both these grants refer to Ower in Eling, as the Abbots of Glastonbury do not seem to have held any other estate of that name.

Abbot Herlwin (1102-20) sold several manors, including Ower, to a favourite, Sir Robert Cotel, and at Herlwin's death in 1120 Sir Robert took possession of the manor, which was claimed after his death by his wife and children. Abbot Siegfried, Herlwin's successor, disputed the Cotel's claim to this and other manors, but it was not till the time of Henry de Blois, the successor of Siegfried, that the matter was settled in favour of the abbey and the decision confirmed by Pope Lucius II in 1144.<sup>146</sup> In 1219, in accordance with an award for the settlement of a dispute between the Bishop of Bath and the Abbot of Glastonbury, Camerton, in Somerset, with which Ower was closely connected, was assigned to the Bishop of Bath,<sup>147</sup> and hence in 1280 Ower also was said to be held of the Bishop of Bath,<sup>148</sup> and the Bishops of Bath were overlords as late at least as overlordship. Thus Richard Cotel was in 1166 a tenant under the abbot of 20 librates of land which had belonged to the demesne and had been assigned to the table of the monks, but did no service for it,<sup>150</sup> and it remained in his family<sup>151</sup> until the death of Ellis Cotel<sup>152</sup> in 1337, leaving as his heir a daughter Edith wife of Oliver de Dynham.<sup>153</sup> However, Ower did not pass to the Dynhams, but had evidently been settled in 1323-4, in the same way as Lake and Oare in Wiltshire, upon John de Palton and his wife Joan,<sup>154</sup> for Giles de Palton was holding the manor in 1346.<sup>155</sup> This Giles may have been a brother of Robert son of Sir John and Joan Palton, who was succeeded by his sons Robert and William Palton in succession.<sup>156</sup> Robert, the elder son, died without issue in 1400,<sup>157</sup> and his brother and successor William granted the manor in 1404-5 to Richard Lord Seymour, Elizabeth wife of William Botreaux and others<sup>158</sup>; but this conveyance was apparently made for the purpose of some settlement.

1491, after which date it seems to have been held of the lords of the manor of Camerton.<sup>149</sup>

The Cotel's had continued to hold the manor of the Abbot of Glastonbury after the decision as to his

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

William died in 1450, but he had apparently sold Ower before his death, since it does not appear among his lands,<sup>159</sup> and is next mentioned in 1491, when, in the inquisition on the death of Sir Richard Darell, he is said to have given it in frank marriage with his daughter Margaret to Sir James Lord Audley.<sup>160</sup> Sir James forfeited all his estates in 1497,<sup>161</sup> but they were restored to his son John in 1512.<sup>162</sup> He sold the manor, then known as PALTONS, to Henry VIII, and it was granted by Edward VI in 1547 to William Lord St. John,<sup>163</sup> from whom it passed in 1572 to his third son, Lord Chideock Paulet.<sup>164</sup> He died in 1574, when the manor passed to his son William,<sup>165</sup> who was succeeded in 1595-6 by William his son and heir,<sup>166</sup> on whose death about 1641 Paltons passed to his son William Paulet.<sup>167</sup> It was sold by William Paulet in 1646 as 'all that capital messuage called Paltons which is or lately was parcel of the manor or manors of Wade and Owre' to William Stanley,<sup>168</sup> but from this sale was excepted some part of the manor of Ower, then apparently annexed to Wade, the further descent of which will be found under Wade (q.v.). Paltons or Paultons, as it was called later, had become the capital messuage of Wigley Manor,<sup>169</sup> so that the manor of Ower was practically non-existent.

George Stanley, the son and successor of William,<sup>170</sup> died in 1733 and was succeeded by his son Hans, who died unmarried in 1780. The Paultons estate passed, subject to the lives of his two sisters, Anne Lady Mendip and Mrs. Sarah D'Oyley, to his cousin, Hans Sloane, of South Stoneham,<sup>171</sup> who assumed the name Sloane-Stanley in 1821.<sup>172</sup> He was succeeded by his son William, on whose death in 1860 his son William Hans succeeded to the estate. It passed from him in 1879 to his son Hans, on whose death in 1888 he was succeeded by his son Roger Cyril Hans Sloane-Stanley, the present owner of the estate.

The house is in a park of 230 acres, laid out in the latter part of the 18th century by Welbore Ellis, the first Lord Mendip, and containing a lake of about 20 acres.

The manor of COLBURY (Coldbury, xviii cent.) was given to the Abbot of Beaulieu by Robert de

Punchardon, as all the land which he held in the parish of Eling with the homage and service of Herbert de Bury for his tenement in Colbury, with a rent of 2s. which Herbert paid for his tenement.<sup>173</sup>

This gift was confirmed by the king in 1317,<sup>174</sup> and was probably made after 1229 when Robert was dealing with land at Eling.<sup>175</sup> A grant of free warren in the manor was made in 1359-60 to the Abbot and convent of Beaulieu.<sup>176</sup> Successive abbots remained in possession of the manor<sup>177</sup> until the surrender of the abbey in April 1538,<sup>178</sup> when it passed to the Crown. It was granted in 1544 to Thomas Hopson,<sup>179</sup> of whom it was purchased in the same year by John Mill and his son John.<sup>180</sup> The elder John died in 1551<sup>181</sup> and the younger John was succeeded by his son Lewknor.<sup>182</sup> He died in November 1587, and his son Lewknor died in the following month, leaving John his brother and heir.<sup>183</sup> John was created a baronet in 1619,<sup>184</sup> and the manor descended with the baronetcy until the death of the last baronet in 1835.<sup>185</sup> It then passed in the same way as Nursling (q.v.) to Mrs. Vaudrey Barker-Mill.

Colbury Manor House was at one time the seat of the Vaudreys, but has for many years been occupied by the Misses Hony.

The first mention of the manor of NEWTON BURY (Bury, xiv cent.) occurs in 1228, when the Sheriff of Hampshire was ordered to restore seisin of his land in Eling to Adam de Bruge.<sup>186</sup> Walter de Bruge conveyed certain lands in Testwood and Totton to Simon de Testwood in 1235-6,<sup>187</sup> and in 1255-6 Edmund de Bruge<sup>188</sup> granted Adam de Bruge a messuage and 15 acres of land in Testwood, with the exception of certain land which had formerly belonged to Peter de Krockere, to be held by Adam of Edmund, with reversion to Edmund in default of the issue of Adam.<sup>189</sup> The manor<sup>189a</sup> then followed the same descent as Nursling Beaufeo (q.v.)<sup>190</sup> until the death of John Mill in 1551, when it passed with Colbury to his son John and to his grandson Lewknor. Its subsequent descent has been identical with that of Colbury<sup>191</sup> (q.v.).

The manor occurs in a deed of the 13th century as the 'manor of Eling called Buryland.'<sup>192</sup> The only mention which occurs of the tenure of this manor (now represented by Bury Farm) is in 1493-4, when it was held of the king in socage.<sup>193</sup> It has been stated that it was held by an ancient grant from the Crown by the tenure of presenting the sovereign with a pair of white greyhounds in silver couples whenever he should enter the New Forest, and that this custom was observed in 1789, when the Rev. Sir Charles Mill presented the king with two greyhounds on the occasion of a royal visit to Lyndhurst,<sup>194</sup> but there seems to be no authority for the tradition. The manorial rights in connexion with Newton Bury seem to have lapsed before 1714 and to have become merged with those of Colbury, for the estate then comprised 'a messuage called Newton-bury' in Colbury.<sup>195</sup>

Bury House, as it was called in 1848, was then occupied by Mrs. W. H. Ashurst, widow of Sir Chas. Mill, but later was converted into a farm-house.

The manor of DURLEY (Derleie, xi cent.; Durle, xiv cent.) was held before the Conquest by Saulf of King Edward in parage. At the time of the Survey it was held of Edmund Fitz Payn by Hugh.<sup>196</sup> The manor apparently afterwards passed to the king, for it was granted by King John, probably in 1204, at the same time as the advowson of the church to the priory of Mottisfont.<sup>197</sup> In 1345 the king granted to the prior and convent the assize of bread and ale of their men and tenants of Eling and Durley.<sup>198</sup> The prior also claimed the right to have a tumbrel there.<sup>199</sup> The manor remained in the possession of the priory until its surrender in 1536,<sup>200</sup> when it passed to the Crown. It was granted in the same year to William Sandys Lord Sandys and his wife Margery,<sup>201</sup> and its subsequent descent is the same as that of Longstock Harangod in King's Somborne Hundred<sup>202</sup> (q.v.). It is last mentioned as a manor in 1786,<sup>203</sup> and is now represented by Durley Farm, east of the village of Colbury.

There were two manors of LANGLEY (Langelie, xi cent.; Langel, xiii cent.) at the time of the Domesday Survey; one assessed at 1 hide was held by Hugh de St. Quintin, who had obtained it by exchange for a mill from the Bishop of Bayeux. Four allodial holders had held it in the time of Edward the Confessor.<sup>204</sup> The second estate, assessed at half a hide, was held by Cola the Huntsman of his father Ulviet.<sup>205</sup> As both these estates lay in Redbridge Hundred it is impossible to decide which refers to Langley in Eling and which to South Langley in Fawley.

The manor of LANGLEY or SIDFORD,<sup>206</sup> which included land in Rumbridge, was held of the king in chief for the service of a tenth part of a knight's fee.<sup>207</sup> It was held in the time of Henry I by the Redvers family,<sup>208</sup> and in 1205 King John ordered that William de Redvers, 'Earl of the Isle of Wight,' should have seisin of Rumbridge and Langley, which for some reason had been forfeited.<sup>209</sup>

The manor descended in the same way as the lordship of the Isle of Wight to the Earls of Devon.<sup>210</sup> It was given by Amice Countess of Devon to the priory founded by Baldwin and Hugh de Redvers at Breamore, but in 1267-8 the prior released all his right in the manors of Langley and Rumbridge to Isabel Countess of Albemarle.<sup>211</sup> She must, however, have restored it to the prior, who was holding it in 1280.<sup>212</sup> The overlordship remained annexed to the honour of Carisbrook.<sup>213</sup> The Priors of Breamore retained the manor until the dissolution of their house in 1536,<sup>214</sup> when it was granted to Henry Marquess of Exeter.<sup>215</sup> He forfeited all his estates in 1538-9, and this manor was granted to Anne of Cleves in 1540.<sup>216</sup> She was divorced in the same year and the manor returned to the Crown, but was granted in 1545 to John Mill and his son George.<sup>217</sup> From that time the descent of the manor is identical with that of Nursling Prior<sup>218</sup> in Buddesgate Hundred (q.v.).

A second manor of LANGLEY, which is mentioned for the first time in 1664,<sup>219</sup> passed with the manor of Colbury during the 17th and 18th centuries.<sup>220</sup> It is now probably merged in the other estate at Langley.

The manor of MARCHWOOD (Mercewode, xi cent.; Merchewude, xiii cent.; Marchewood Rumsey, xvi cent.) was held before the Conquest by Ulviet and at the time of the Domesday Survey by his son Alwin.<sup>221</sup> A rent of six quarters of salt in Marchwood passed during the 13th and 14th centuries with the manor of West Tytherley<sup>222</sup> (q.v.), but the manor of Marchwood, known also as Marchwood Romsey, belonged to the Romseys, who had also acquired the rent of salt before 1403-4.<sup>223</sup>

The manor of Marchwood Romsey was held of the Abbess of Romsey by fealty.<sup>224</sup> In 1599 it was said to be held of the Crown, as of the hundred of

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Redbridge.<sup>225</sup> John de Romsey held the vill of Marchwood in 1316,<sup>226</sup> and settled a messuage and 2 carucates of land in Marchwood, North Langley and Testwood upon himself and his wife Maud in 1335-6.<sup>227</sup> He was succeeded by Sir Walter Romsey of Rockbourne, who died in 1403-4 holding land in Marchwood.<sup>228</sup> The manor then passed in the same way as Romsey Horseys (q.v.) until the death of Thomas Horsey in 1477.<sup>229</sup> His brother and successor John Horsey seems to have subinfeudated the manor to John Romsey of Tatchbury, for he died in 1494 holding it of—Horsey,<sup>230</sup> and was succeeded by his son John, who died in 1503 holding it of John Horsey.<sup>231</sup> William Romsey, son and successor of this John, sold the manor to Henry White, who left it by his will dated 12 September 1534 to his executors for sixteen years for the maintenance of his children, with remainder to his sons Robert, Francis and Alban, and to his nephews Thomas and Henry White in tail-male.<sup>232</sup> The manor passed from Robert White to his son William in 1564-5,<sup>233</sup> and William and his wife Margaret conveyed it in 1579 to Richard Beconsawe.<sup>234</sup> This conveyance was probably in the nature of a mortgage, for in 1587 William White sold the manor to Nicholas Venables, and a warranty against Richard and William Beconsawe is inserted in the conveyance.<sup>235</sup> William Rickman died seised of the manor in 1599, leaving his daughter Katherine wife of David Urry his heir.<sup>236</sup> A hundred years later David Urry, described as of St. James', Westminster, sold the manor to Gilbert Serle of Leghorn,<sup>237</sup> and it subsequently passed in the same way as Weston Corbett (q.v.) to Sir William Oglander.<sup>238</sup>

The manor afterwards passed to John Saunders, of Downs House, on whose death in 1832 it descended to his son, Andrew Saunders.<sup>239</sup> Cecil Roy Saunders, who succeeded his father Andrew in 1876, died in 1907, and his brother, Archibald Carmichael Saunders, is now lord of the manor of Marchwood.

In 1489 Sir Richard Darell died seised of a messuage called WADE (La Waude, xiii cent.) and lands in Romsey and Eling held of Lord De La Warr,<sup>240</sup> and of forty messuages in Romsey held of the Abbess of Romsey.<sup>241</sup> The subsequent descent of the manor is identical with that of Paultons or Ower<sup>242</sup> (q.v.) until the sale of Paultons by William Paulet in 1646. Wade was retained and sold in 1660 as the manor of Wade and Ower to James Betts of London.<sup>243</sup>

SAUNDERS. Sable a chevron ermine between three bulls' heads caboshed argent.

Wade Hill Farm was purchased in 1818 from William Young of Moorcourt by Lord Palmerston, who also purchased Wade Park Farm in 1857 from Mr. John Sydney Atkins. In 1859 the estate, which is known as the manor of Wade and Ower, passed by exchange to Winchester College, in whose possession it still is.<sup>244</sup> There was in 1607 'an ordinarie house of name "Wade,"' <sup>245</sup> presumably the manor-house, possibly now represented by the farm-house.

The manor of WIGLEY (Wiggeleia, Wigelay, xii cent.; Wygelee, xiii cent.) apparently belonged to the priory of Amesbury from early times.<sup>246</sup> In 1198-9 the Prioress of Amesbury granted half a hide of land at Wigley to Walter Long.<sup>247</sup> King John granted that the nuns of Fontevault who were established at Amesbury should not be held accountable for damage done by their cart-wheels in the woods of Wallop and Wigley on their daily journey for the collection of fuel.<sup>248</sup> In 1286 a grant of free warren at Wigley was made to the Prioress and nuns of Amesbury.<sup>249</sup>

The manor from that time followed the same descent as Paultons<sup>261</sup> (q.v.), which seems to have become the capital messuage of Wigley Manor before 1646.<sup>262</sup>

The manor of SHELVELEY (Seveleia, Saveleia, Selvelega, xii cent.; Shulvelegh, Shulvele, xiv cent.) was held of the Prioress of Amesbury for a rent of 18s. yearly.<sup>263</sup> This estate was probably acquired by the nuns of Amesbury at the same time and in the same way as Wigley, with which it was closely connected. Alured de Shelveley is mentioned in 1166-7 and in 1168-9,<sup>264</sup> and the mill of Shelveley is mentioned in the Pipe Rolls from 1170 to 1177.<sup>265</sup>

Thomas de Shelveley in 1294-5 granted a messuage, a mill and half a carucate of land in Shelveley and Wigley to Nicholas de Pershute and his wife Maud.<sup>266</sup> It then passed with the manor of Spurshot in Romsey to Nicholas de Pershute.<sup>267</sup> It is uncertain whether it passed from him on his death in 1369-70 to his son William,<sup>268</sup> or whether it had passed out of the possession of the family before that time. It is next mentioned in 1473, when Margaret Erneley died seised of it.<sup>269</sup> Her son and successor Edmund died in 1485 and was succeeded by his son John,<sup>270</sup> who in 1513-14 conveyed the manor to George Baron and Thomas Coke.<sup>271</sup> After this date the estate seems to have lapsed to the overlord, the Prioress of Amesbury. Rent from customary tenants at Shelveley was included among the possessions of the priory at the Dissolution,<sup>272</sup> and was probably included in land at Shelveley which was granted with the manor of Wigley to Edmund Vaughan in 1545.<sup>273</sup> It seems to have become incorporated with Wigley, which is described during the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries as extending into Shelveley.<sup>274</sup> Shelly Farm and Shelly Common to the north of Paultons Park still form part of Wigley Manor.<sup>275</sup>

An estate at CADNAM (Cadenham, xiii cent.; Cadham, xvii cent.) and WINSOR (Windelesore, Winderoures, xiii cent.; Windsor, xvi cent.) belonged to the nuns of Amesbury, who in 1286 obtained a grant of free warren in both estates.<sup>276</sup> They seem to have formed part of the manor of Wigley (q.v.) and rent of customary tenants at Cadnam was paid to the abbey until the Dissolution.<sup>277</sup> The property was probably included in land at Cadnam and Winsor granted with the manor of Wigley to Edmund Vaughan in 1545,<sup>278</sup> and apparently followed the same descent as Wigley<sup>279</sup> (q.v.).

The Abbot of Netley held an estate at WINSOR, and was summoned in 1280 to show why he should not allow his tenants there to do suit at the hundred of Redbridge.<sup>280</sup> In 1255-6 it was said that he had ceased to do suit at the hundred court of Redbridge for the 'soke' of Winsor,<sup>281</sup> and in 1419-20 a charter was produced at the abbot's court of Totton relating to a grant by a former abbot of a tenement in the vill of Winsor.<sup>282</sup> This estate evidently formed a part of the abbot's estate at Totton,<sup>283</sup> and passed with it to the Paulets, probably becoming incorporated with the other estate at Winsor held by that family.

Another manor of WINSOR was annexed to the capital manor of Eling, but is not mentioned until 1372-3, when the reversion of it after the death of Sir Hugh Camoys was conveyed by Sir Henry Husee to William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester.<sup>284</sup> The bishop granted it in 1385 with the manor of Eling to Winchester College,<sup>285</sup> and no further mention of it has been found.

In the time of Henry III Adam de St. Manu-feuto made an encroachment of a quarter of an acre upon the highway at BERKLEY.<sup>286</sup> Berkley followed the descent of Minstead (q.v.), and is now held with the second manor of Totton by Mr. H. F. Compton.<sup>287</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey there were two mills and a fishery in the king's manor of Eling,<sup>288</sup> a fifth of a mill belonged to Agemund's holding at Totton,<sup>289</sup> and there was a mill in the Abbess of Romsey's manor of 'Dodintune.'<sup>290</sup> The mill of Shelveley is mentioned in the Pipe Rolls from 1170 to 1174,<sup>291</sup> and a mill and half a carucate of land at Shelveley and Wigley were granted by Thomas de Shelveley to Nicholas de Pershute and Maud his wife in 1294-5.<sup>292</sup>

There were two water-mills and a fishery in the manor of Testwood in 1380,<sup>293</sup> and it was stated in 1504-5 that Thomas West Lord De La Warr had in 1478 demised to Thomas Avan for forty years a certain water-mill, parcel of the manor of Testwood, together with the water-course leading towards the said mill from a place called 'le Wyldewater,' with all the creeks and fisheries.<sup>294</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

gave to the abbey a fourth part of a mill at Totton with a virgate of land at 'Ryse,' when his daughter became a nun at Romsey.<sup>295</sup>

The flour-mill known as Eling Mill stands on Bartley Water. Testwood Mill is on the River Test opposite Testwood House, and its salmon fishery is still noted.

The church of ST. MARY THE VIRGIN, Eling, consists of a chancel,<sup>296</sup> north chapel of the same length, north vestry, a south chapel, a nave, north aisle, south aisle, north-west tower and south and west porches. The earliest church of which traces remain was perhaps of the 11th century, with chancel and nave of the same size as those now standing, and a small north transept with an eastern chapel or apse. At the end of the 12th century a south aisle was added to the nave, and early in the 13th a north-west chapel to the chancel, replacing whatever building stood to the east of the transept.

PLAN OF ELING CHURCH

Shortly afterwards a north aisle of two bays was added to the nave, west of the transept, and late in the 13th century the chancel arch was rebuilt and made as wide as possible. In the 14th century a south chapel equal in length to the chancel was built, and in the 15th the north-west tower was added, taking up the west bay of the north aisle. The north transept was thrown into the aisle, an arch in continuation of the north arcade taking the place of its south wall, in which there was doubtless a narrow arch. In modern times the north chapel has been rebuilt and lengthened eastwards to equal the chancel, a north-east vestry added, the south aisle widened and the two porches built. Unfortunately the whole church has also been scraped and retooled.

The three-light east window of the chancel is modern with tracery of 14th-century style. At the east end of the north wall is a square locker with a modern head. Above it is a narrow round-headed window with a wide internal splay. The head is made up of a number of very small voussoirs, and the jambs are each of a single slab squared on both edges. The whole has a very early look, and can hardly be later than the end of the 11th century, but its position close to the east wall of the chancel is most unlikely to be the original one. A suggestion has been made that an apse formerly stood to the east of the chancel, but there seems no evidence for this. To the west of this window is an arcade, originally of one bay, but in modern times increased to two, the eastern being modern, with the 13th-century respond reused. The arches are two-centred, of two chamfered orders, and the new central column is copied from the responds, which are semicircular with moulded capital and bases. At the south-east of the chancel is a small trefoiled piscina, probably of the 16th century, with a rounded back to the recess, and a projecting bowl. In the south wall is an early 14th-century Purbeck stone arcade of two bays with two-centred arches of two chamfered orders, an octagonal column and semi-octagonal responds with moulded capital and bases, a good deal retooled. The chancel arch is an insertion of the late 13th century, of the full width of the chancel, but with splayed and shafted jambs towards the nave. It is two-centred, of three moulded orders on the west, carried on circular engaged shafts with moulded capitals and bases; the outer order is stilted at the springing.

The nave arcade is of three bays, not continuous on the north, where the east bay has a very acute two-centred arch of two chamfered orders with half-octagonal responds and moulded capitals, and is of the 15th century, separated by a pier from the rest of the arcade. Of the two 13th-century western bays only the eastern arch and the spring of the western remain, the rest having been destroyed at the building of the tower. The arch is of two chamfered orders and rather obtuse two-centred form, with a roll label towards the nave, and the pillar is octagonal with moulded capitals and base, the latter having angle spurs. Immediately west of this a square projecting buttress to the east tower arch breaks into the line of the arcade, and in the western bay of the nave is the south tower arch, four-centred, of two moulded orders, the outer continuous and the inner carried on semi-octagonal responds with moulded capitals and bases. At the south-east of the nave is a small modern pointed arch pierced through the long abutment of the east respond of the arcade, and above it by 17 ft. 7 in.; north chapel, 12 ft. 3 in. wide; north vestry, 20 ft. by 15 ft. 8 in.; south chapel, 12 ft. wide; nave, 43 ft. 9 in.

is the head of a small trefoiled niche on the level of the rood loft; the position is exceedingly unusual for a piscina, but not absolutely unexampled, and there is no reason why in particular circumstances an altar should not have been placed in the rood loft. The south arcade is continuous, with arches like the middle one on the north but without a label. The columns are octagonal with capitals of late 12th-century character and bases with spurs, some of them of most curious form, but both the capitals and bases have been practically recut. Over the west respond and only visible in the aisle is a very small round-headed opening, formed of a pierced slab of stone with a continuous roll worked on it; it looks like the slab from a double-splayed pre-Conquest window, and if it has an inner splay there is nothing to show it. The three-light west window is modern. The west door and its porch are also modern, of 14th-century design.

The east window of the north chapel is of the 16th century and has three cinquefoiled lights under a four-centred head. It was repaired and reset when the chapel was lengthened. On the north is a modern door to the vestry. The western arch originally led to the transept and is semicircular with one slightly chamfered order springing from the wall on the north with a very rough chamfered abacus. The respond to the south has a modern abacus.

The south chapel appears to have been almost completely rebuilt, but without alteration to its plan. The windows are all modern, and consist of an east window of three lights, one of a single light and one of two lights on the south, with a modern door between them. On the west is an arch to the aisle, a plain round-headed opening set in a very thin wall; its date is doubtful, but probably not very remote.

The north aisle has two 15th-century square-headed windows of three lights. Between them is a break in the wall which represents the extent of the early transept, to the west of which the aisle is reduced in width by about 6 in. At the west is the tower arch, of the same date and detail as that to the south, but with flat responds into which the two orders die, and without capitals or bases.

The whole of the south aisle and the south porch together with their doors and windows are modern, with the exception of part of the east wall containing the transept arch. On the south are two two-light windows and between them a pointed door. The west window is of three lights with tracery. The south porch has an entrance of two chamfered orders and east and west windows of two small pointed lights.

The tower is of late 15th-century date in three low stages with an embattled parapet. The belfry openings were originally of two rounded uncusped lights with square-headed reveals. That to the west has been mutilated and one of the lights to the north has been bricked up. Set in the first string-course is a small pointed window of two chamfered orders, the string being broken over it to form a square outer head. In the ground stage to the north is a single cinquefoiled light. The tower has diagonal buttresses to the north-east and north-west and a square one to the south-west.

The vestry is a modern brick building with a 17th-century three-light transomed window reset in the east wall and an external door to the west, over which is set a carved stone head or 14th-century character. The font is modern. The nave roof is old but of uncertain date, quite plain and of open collar construction, and that of the north aisle is a plain lean-to roof, probably of 16th-century date.

In the north chapel is a brass with an inscription to William Paulet, 1596, 'nobili et illustri Pauletorum de Basing Familia,' and his wife Dulcebella Paget, by whom he had five sons and three daughters. Three shields display: (1) Paulet, three swords in pile, a crescent with a molet thereon for difference, impaling Argent a chevron vair between three talbots sable; (2) nine quarters: Paulet quartering Roos of Gedney, Poynings, St. John, Delamere, Hussey, Skelton, Irby and Delamore; (3) as (1). A white marble wall monument to Richard Paulet of Gray's Inn, 1737, and another to Susanna Serle, 1755, with a very good bust by Rysbrach, are also in the north chapel. Another monument by Rysbrach is at the north-east of the nave, to Elizabeth Serle, 1741. In the north aisle is a light grey marble monument to Gilbert Serle, 1720. The heraldry is illegible except the crest, a burning tower. Near it is a funeral helm with the same crest carved in wood. The helm is supported on a wrought-iron bracket which has a haming bar for a tabard. The tabard, however, has been quite recently taken down and thrown away. At the south-east of the chancel is an early 17th-century monument to Catherine wife of John Mill and daughter of Sir Roger Lewknor of Sussex, and to her son Lewknor Mill, who married Cicely Crooke and had four sons and three daughters. No dates are given.

In the churchyard are a number of very good carved 18th-century headstones, well worthy of careful study as specimens of a local art, all cut in the hard Purbeck stone. One of the best is to Thomas Warwick, 1764, with a ship sailing round the world, and a very curious one is to another mariner, George Bartley, 1765, with portraits of himself, his wife and his ship, his sons and daughters, and the instruments of his profession, sextant, compass, rule, &c. A better example of the same type is in Dibden churchyard.

The church possesses a Last Supper of the Venetian school, c. 1520—unfortunately a great deal restored; it was formerly used as an altar-piece.

The bells are six in number, recast by Pack & Chapman in 1775.

The plate is a fine silver-gilt service consisting of chalice, paten cover, paten and flagon of 1693, given in that year by or in memory of Margaret Leigh, one of the Leighs of Coldrey (Hants), and an alms dish of 1707.

The registers are in seven books: (1) all entries, 1537 to 1673; (2) the same, 1673 to 1750; (3) baptisms and burials, 1750 to 1796; (4) baptisms and burials, 1796 to 1802; (5) baptisms and burials, 1802 to 1812; (6) marriages, 1754 to 1778; and (7) marriages, 1778 to 1812.

The church of ST. MARY, Copythorne, is of brick in debased 'Gothic' style, consisting of chancel, nave, south aisle, north porch and embattled western tower.

CHRIST CHURCH, Colbury, is of flint and stone in 13th-century style, consisting of chancel, nave, north porch and bell-turret.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The church of ST. JOHN, Marchwood, is of brick and stone in 15th-century style, consisting of chancel, nave, south aisle, transepts and a tower with spire.

The church of ST. MATTHEW, Netley Marsh, is of stone in 13th-century style, consisting of chancel, nave, aisles, south porch and bell-turret.

There was a church at Eling at ADVOWSON the time of the Domesday Survey, to which belonged half a carucate of land.<sup>297</sup> The advowson remained in the kings of England until it was granted with the manor by Richard I to Gervaise de Southampton,<sup>298</sup> who gave it to his brother Roger.<sup>299</sup> In 1198-9 a plea took place between Ralph de Hamton on behalf of his father and Robert Bertram as to the church of Eling.<sup>300</sup> The advowson apparently returned to the Crown on the death of Gervaise, and was granted by King John in 1204-5 to the Prior and canons of Mottisfont.<sup>301</sup> The advowson remained in the possession of successive priors until the Dissolution,<sup>302</sup> when it passed to the Crown. It was granted in 1536 to William Sandys Lord Sandys,<sup>303</sup> and passed with the title of Lord Sandys until 1667,<sup>304</sup> when the presentation was made by Lord Sandys for the last time.<sup>305</sup> John Speed, M.D., presented in 1689,<sup>306</sup> and dying in 1711 was succeeded by his son Dr. John Speed, from whom the advowson passed in 1747 to his son, a third Dr. John Speed.<sup>307</sup> His son and successor, the Rev. John Mylles Speed, died without issue in 1792,<sup>308</sup> and his widow Harriet presented to the living in that year.<sup>309</sup> The Rev. Charles Sloman presented in 1797<sup>310</sup> and William Phillips in 1802.<sup>311</sup> The advowson remained in the Phillips family until 1897-8, when it passed from William Phillips to Mr. J. E. Ward, the present patron.<sup>312</sup>

North Eling was formed into an ecclesiastical parish from Eling in 1837.<sup>313</sup> The living is a vicarage in the gift of the trustees of the Rev. W. J. G. Phillips.

Colbury was formed into an ecclesiastical parish from Eling in 1872,<sup>314</sup> and comprises Colbury and Longdown. The living is a vicarage in the gift of Mrs. Vaudrey Barker-Mill, the daughter of Frederick Ibbotson, the founder of the benefice.

Marchwood became a separate ecclesiastical parish in 1843.<sup>315</sup> The church was built and endowed by Horatio Francis Kingsford Holloway in 1843,<sup>316</sup> and the advowson remained in the possession of his family until 1887-8, when it passed to Charles Bartholomew,<sup>317</sup> in whose trustees it is now vested.

Netley Marsh became an ecclesiastical parish in 1855.<sup>318</sup> The church was built in 1854-5 chiefly at the expense of Miss Ann Sturges Bourne, of Testwood House, who endowed the vicarage.<sup>319</sup> The advowson was in her possession until 1892, when it passed to the vicar of Eling,<sup>320</sup> in whom it is now vested.

There is at Totton a chapel of ease to the parish church of Eling, dedicated to St. Mary.

In 1672 the house of Esther Oviat at Eling was licensed for Presbyterian worship.<sup>321</sup> The Congregational chapel at Cadnam was founded in 1790, that at Totton in 1811, and that at Netley Marsh in 1901.<sup>322</sup> There are also a Congregational chapel at Marchwood, Primitive Methodist chapels at Totton and Cadnam, a Baptist chapel at Bartley, and a Gospel mission hall at Totton, erected in 1901.

The parliamentary returns of CHARITIES 1786 state that a house, then vested in the churchwardens, had been given to the poor by a Mrs. Moody. It was used as almshouses for four widows until 1860, when the houses were burnt down.

A little before 1841 Ellingham and Broomy, the latter being constituted a township in 1868, were transferred to Ringwood Hundred. Fordingbridge now comprises Ashley Walk (a township formed in 1868 from part of Godshill and several extra-parochial places), North and South Charford, which are now separate civil parishes, Fordingbridge, Hale, Ibsley, Rockbourne and Woodgreen, which was formerly an extra-parochial district in the tithing of Godshill, and is now a separate civil parish. In 1086 the hundred contained Breamore,<sup>3</sup> North Charford, South Charford,<sup>4</sup> Ellingham,<sup>5</sup> Fordingbridge,<sup>6</sup> Hale,<sup>7</sup> Ibsley<sup>8</sup> and Rockbourne,<sup>9</sup> the manor of Canterton in Minstead,<sup>10</sup> and in addition 'Clatinges,'<sup>11</sup> 'Slacham,' 'Ivare' and 'Bedecotes.'<sup>12</sup> Clatinges was held together with South Charford by William de Chernet of Hugh de Port, and was probably situated near that place. Slacham, Ivare and Bedcote were all in the New Forest.

The modern Eyeworth in Ashley Walk preserves the 11th-century 'Ivare.' Canterton in Minstead was annexed to the New Forest Hundred before 1316,<sup>13</sup> and Breamore became a separate liberty at the end of the 16th or beginning of the 17th century.<sup>14</sup>

In the time of Edward the Confessor there were 36½ hides 12½ virgates in the hundred; in 1086 there were 24 hides 7¼ virgates. In 1280 John de Rivers was holding the hundred of Fordingbridge, which was worth 40s. yearly, and claimed there gallows, pillory, tumbrel, view of frankpledge and assize of bread and ale.<sup>15</sup>

The hundred of Fordingbridge was apparently granted with the manors of Nether Burgate and Rockbourne to Manser Bisset.<sup>16</sup> It was assigned with the manor of Nether Burgate to Margery Rivers, daughter and co-heir of John Rivers, and has since followed the descent of that manor,<sup>17</sup> the present owner being Mr. John Coventry.

In 1651, although it must have belonged to the Bulkeleys, a survey of the hundred was taken as parcel of the possessions of Charles I.<sup>18</sup> It included the nine tithings of Rockford Moyles, Ibsley, Bickton, North Charford, Hale, Over Burgate, Difford, South Charford and Ellingham. The tithing silver amounted to £1 13s. 9d. and the profits of the courts to 15s. The court leet and 'lawdaye' was held at Michaelmas every year, but the sheriff's tourn had long been discontinued. Mr. Coventry still has the right of appointing the coroner for the hundred.<sup>19</sup>

In 1831 the parish of North Charford included 'the tithing of South Charford,' but both were originally and are now separate, though small and decayed parishes, South Charford possessing no village and North Charford only a few scattered houses and the old manor-house, converted in 1880 by Professor Wrightson into an agricultural college. North Charford contains 874½ acres, of which about two-thirds are arable land, and the remainder is permanent grass and woodland.<sup>2</sup> South Charford contains 862½ acres, of which 350 acres are arable, about 400 permanent grass and 100 woodland.<sup>3</sup> The Avon flows through both parishes from north to south and the land on the banks of the river is flat, but from the valley there is a gradual rise east and west respectively to 392 ft. and 383 ft. above the ordnance datum.

The overlordship of NORTH MANORS CHARFORD belonged after the Conquest to the Earls of Salisbury<sup>4</sup> until 1196, when on the death of Edward Earl of Salisbury his only daughter and heir Ela brought the manor in marriage to William Longespée.<sup>5</sup> Their great-granddaughter and heir Margaret married Henry de Laci Earl of Lincoln, and left an only child Alice,<sup>6</sup> who with her second husband Ebulo le Strange<sup>7</sup> conveyed nine knights' fees in Charford and elsewhere to Hugh le Despenser in 1324.<sup>8</sup> After the forfeiture of the Despensers John de Warenne Earl of Surrey and Sussex apparently obtained a life grant of the Charford fee,<sup>9</sup> since in 1343 the manor came into his hands by reason of the minority of William son and heir of William Gerberd, together with the marriage of the said heir.<sup>10</sup> Richard II was returned as overlord in 1397,<sup>11</sup> but subsequently the Bulkeleys claimed the overlordship, asserting that the manor was held of them as of their manor of Nether Burgate and their hundred of Fordingbridge.<sup>12</sup> This was denied by Edward Abarowe, lord of North Charford in 1563,<sup>13</sup> but seventy years later Sir William Bulkeley was stated to be the overlord.<sup>14</sup>

Before the Conquest a certain Alnod held the manor of Edward the Confessor as an alod, but by 1086 he had been succeeded by Rannulf.<sup>15</sup> In the beginning of the 13th century Hamo de Bachampton and Geoffrey son of John held the manor conjointly.<sup>16</sup> Hamo by an undated charter granted a rent of one mark from a tenement in Charford to the canons of Breamore in free alms,<sup>17</sup> and Geoffrey in 1240-1 granted a life interest in a carucate of land in Charford to William Waldrich.<sup>18</sup> Forty years later William Gerberd<sup>19</sup> held the manor, which passed to his heir John Gerberd, who in 1302 settled the reversion of a messuage and 2 carucates of land at Charford after his death on Alice del Escheker, possibly his wife, for life and then on her son and heir John, with contingent remainders, if John died childless, to his brothers William and Thomas and finally to Thomas son of a certain William Gerberd.<sup>20</sup> Alice 'Gileberd' was holding in 1316, but in 1344, since William, apparently her grandson and heir, was a minor, the manor was in the custody of John de Warenne Earl of Surrey.<sup>21</sup> William Gerberd evidently came of age before 1347,<sup>22</sup> and sold the manor before 1353 to Walter atte Bergh or Abarowe,<sup>23</sup> on whose death it passed to his widow Isabel. She subsequently married Hugh Tyrell, and died in 1370, leaving a son and heir John Abarowe,<sup>24</sup> whose widow Christine, dying in 1397, left the manor to her son John Abarowe.<sup>25</sup> In 1455 Walter son of John by his father's death came into possession of the manor,<sup>26</sup> already settled on him and his wife Anne,<sup>27</sup> and afterwards settled it on his second wife Eleanor, who survived him and married Charles Bulkeley. On her death in 1476 her son and heir Maurice Abarowe, then a minor, succeeded to the manor.<sup>28</sup> His son John,<sup>29</sup> who was imprisoned but pardoned for a murder committed in self-defence,<sup>30</sup> settled the manor in 1540-1 on his wife Elizabeth, who was succeeded in 1551 by her grandson Edward son of Erasmus Abarowe.<sup>31</sup> This Edward being childless settled the reversion of the manor on his cousin William, son of Anthony Abarowe, and his wife Andrea, daughter of Andrew Foster.<sup>32</sup> William, then a knight, came into possession in 1603<sup>33</sup> and died in 1627, leaving a son and heir William,<sup>34</sup> on whom he had settled the manor two years before.<sup>35</sup>

For the next hundred years the history of the manor is not definitely known, but it was purchased in the 18th century by Thomas Archer, or his nephew Henry Archer, who was holding it at the time of his death in 1768.<sup>36</sup> It then followed the same descent as Hale (q.v.) until the 19th century,<sup>37</sup> when it was sold to John Coventry of Burgate Manor, to whose son, Mr. John Coventry, it now belongs.

A mill worth 50s. belonged to the manor at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>38</sup> but is not mentioned again.

At the time of the Domesday Survey SOUTH CHARFORD belonged to Hugh de Port.<sup>39</sup> On the death of his descendant Edmund de St. John in 1349 the reversion of two knights' fees in the New Forest, South Charford, Avon and other places, after the death of his widow Elizabeth, was assigned to his elder sister Margaret and her husband, John de St. Philibert.<sup>40</sup> After that date there is no further mention of the overlordship until 1513, when it belonged to the Prior of Breamore.<sup>41</sup> In 1639 the manor was said to be held of the king as of the late priory of Breamore,<sup>42</sup> but from that date the overlordship seems to have lapsed.

The manor was held of Hugh de Port by William de Chernet, who had succeeded the two free men holding it of Edward the Confessor.<sup>43</sup> It remained in his family for over 200 years, belonging to Hugh de Chernet in 1166,<sup>44</sup> and later to John de Chernet,<sup>45</sup> who before 1271 was succeeded by Geoffrey de Chernet, probably his son,<sup>46</sup> who was holding in 1280.<sup>47</sup> In 1293 Iseult de Chernet was dealing with the manor,<sup>48</sup> which passed by inheritance or purchase to Oliver de la Zouche, who in 1305 received a grant of free warren in South Charford and 'la Hyde.'<sup>49</sup> John de la Zouche, probably his son,<sup>50</sup> was holding in 1316 and in 1326 settled the manor on himself and Eleanor his wife with reversion to their son Oliver and Isabel his wife.<sup>51</sup> Oliver succeeded to the manor after 1349,<sup>52</sup> but before 1428 had evidently sold it to Sir John Popham.<sup>53</sup> The latter, who served in France under Henry V and the Duke of Bedford,<sup>54</sup> settled the manor in 1459 on Alice wife of William Herteshorn and daughter of John Malyns, with reversion to her daughter Elizabeth wife of Charles Bulkeley.<sup>55</sup> It thus came into the possession of the Bulkeleys and followed the descent of Burgate in Fordingbridge (q.v.) until 1600,<sup>56</sup> when John Bulkeley conveyed it to Hugh Grove.<sup>57</sup> However, Sir William Dodington was holding in 1624,<sup>58</sup> and five years later settled it on his son Herbert on his marriage with Elizabeth daughter of John Colles.<sup>59</sup> Herbert Dodington died childless in 1633,<sup>60</sup> and his father, who survived, held the manor until his death in 1638, when it passed to his younger son John.<sup>61</sup> The latter left two daughters: Margaret, who married Sir Thomas Hannan but died childless, and Anne,<sup>62</sup> who married firstly Robert Greville fourth Lord Brooke of Beauchamp, by whom she had two daughters,<sup>63</sup> and secondly Thomas Hoby.<sup>64</sup> South Charford passed by sale or settlement to Fulke Greville fifth Lord Brooke, brother of Anne's first husband, and remained in his family until 1747-8,<sup>65</sup> when Francis Lord Brooke sold his Hampshire estates under a Private Act of Parliament.<sup>66</sup> South Charford passed to Henry Archer and has since followed the descent of North Charford<sup>67</sup> (q.v.), the present owner being Mr. John Coventry.

According to an entry in the Testa de Nevill Nicholas de Moels held one knight's fee in Charford of the old enfeoffment of Robert de St. John.<sup>68</sup> However, since the Moels family do not seem to have held land in Charford, it is probable that the entry concerns Rockford (in the parish of Ellingham).

The manor of SEARCHFIELD (Sercheville, xiii cent.; Sechevyle, xiv cent.; Seccheford, xv cent.; Secheilde, xvi cent.) now survives as a farm in North Charford. In 1280 it belonged, with North Charford, to William Gerberd,<sup>69</sup> who apparently sold it to a certain Thomas Tassam.<sup>70</sup> Isabel wife of John Sewale, possibly daughter of Thomas, next held the manor, which she sold in 1346 to Walter Abarowe.<sup>71</sup> It then descended with North Charford until it was sold by William Abarowe in 1634<sup>72</sup> to Sir George Howe of Cold Barwick (co. Wilts.),<sup>73</sup> whose son and heir Sir George Grubham Howe was created a baronet 20 June 1660.<sup>74</sup> Although it does not appear in the will of the latter, who died in 1676,<sup>75</sup> the manor probably passed to his son Sir James Howe, but before 1713 was sold to Thomas Gage<sup>76</sup> and followed the descent of Hale<sup>77</sup> (q.v.). Later it was merged in the manor of North Charford and belongs at the present day to Mr. John Coventry.

PRIORY OF ST. JOHN OF JERUSALEM. Gules a cross argent.

North Charford Chapel was built ADVOWSONS by the beginning of the 14th century,<sup>78</sup> and was in the gift of the Prior of St. John of Jerusalem in England. It is said to have been founded for one priest 'to syng in the same chapell fo' the ease of th enhabytauntes of the manor of Northchartforde.' His salary was the tithe of the manor,<sup>79</sup> which amounted at the time of the Dissolution to £5 13s. 4d.<sup>80</sup> The chapel with its tithes is mentioned in 1628,<sup>81</sup> but before 1727 it was in ruins,<sup>82</sup> and there is no trace of it at the present day.

The chapel of South Charford is said to have been built by Sir John Popham with the consent of the Prior of Breamore, and it was dedicated in 1404 by Nicholas, Suffragan Bishop of Wells, during a vacancy in the See of Winchester.<sup>83</sup> The advowson<sup>84</sup> descended like that of Breamore (q.v.) until 1777,<sup>85</sup>

when George Duke of Manchester sold it to Lady Elizabeth Archer.<sup>86</sup>

Already the chapel was in ruins and the Duke and Duchess of Manchester had granted the 'old material' to Thomas Archer for the enlarging and rebuilding of the church of Hale.<sup>87</sup> The site is still to be seen in a field near South Charford Farm. For ecclesiastical purposes the part of North and South Charford which lies on the east bank of the Avon is annexed to Hale and that on the west to Breamore. There are no endowed charities in Charford.

ELLINGHAM

Adelingham (xi cent.); Elyngham, Aylingham (xiv cent.).

The parish of Ellingham contains 2,558 acres, of which 725½ acres are arable land, 742½ permanent grass and 288½ woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is gravel. The land slopes from west to east from 64 ft. above the ordnance datum near the River Avon to 238 ft. on Rockford Common in the east.

The church, vicarage and a farm lie in a group of trees near the Avon, and are connected by New Bridge with the estate of Somerley on the other side of the river. The main road from Fordingbridge to Ringwood passes east and through the hamlet of Blashford.<sup>2</sup> The village school is in Rockford, a hamlet almost in the centre of the parish. North of Rockford is Moyles Court, the ancient manor-house of the Lisles, converted into a farm-house by Henry Baring of Somerley<sup>3</sup> in the beginning of the 19th century, but restored at a later date by Mr. Frederick Fane.<sup>4</sup> That part of Linwood which is in the New Forest, and lies between Broomy and Ibsley, is in Ellingham, and is probably part of the hide of land said to have been in the Forest in 1086.<sup>5</sup>

The parish was inclosed in 1822.<sup>6</sup>

The ancient place-names include Chappell Field<sup>7</sup> (xvi cent.).

The township of Broomy, including Broomy Lodge (Major Robert Walker), Broomy New Inclosure Cottage, part of Linwood, Roe Inclosure Cottage, Shobley and Holly Hatch, was described in 1831 as an extra-parochial 'district' not heretofore distinguished.<sup>8</sup> It was evidently made up of Crown lands in the New Forest, and became a township in 1868.<sup>9</sup> It contains 4,712 acres, of which about 62½ acres are arable land, 99½ acres permanent grass and more than 1,002½ acres are uncultivated forest land.<sup>10</sup> The soil and subsoil are clay and gravel.

ELLINGHAM was held of the king MANORS in chief,<sup>11</sup> the last mention of the overlordship occurring in 1598.<sup>12</sup>

Cola the Huntsman held the manor in 1086 as Bolne had held it of Edward the Confessor as an alod. In 1160 William de Solers was holding the manor and granted the church of St. Mary, Ellingham, and lands in Ellingham to the abbey of St. Sauveur-le-Vicomte 'for the souls of his predecessors and especially for the soul of Earl Richard, his uncle.'<sup>13</sup> William was still holding the manor in 1167,<sup>14</sup> but by the reign of Richard I William de Punchardon was in possession, and, although he was dispossessed by William de Solers about 1194, he recovered seisin in 1199, and William was fined £6 7s. 5d. for his intrusion.<sup>15</sup> Robert son of William de Punchardon forfeited the manor in 1205,<sup>16</sup> and King John granted it to Thomas Peverell.<sup>17</sup> However, it was restored to Robert de Punchardon or to one of his successors, and descended like the manor of Facombe Punchardons (q.v.)<sup>18</sup> to Richard Punchardon, who died in 1466-7.<sup>19</sup> It had previously been settled on his wife Elizabeth,<sup>20</sup> on whose death in 1499 it was divided between their daughters Philippa wife of Thomas or William Lewston and Anne wife of Thomas Sendy, and William Okeden, son of another daughter Maud.<sup>21</sup> Philippa Lewston and Thomas Sendy were still holding their shares at the time of William Okeden's death in 1517,<sup>22</sup> but before 1536 gave up their right to his son and heir John, who made a settlement of the whole manor in 1539,<sup>23</sup> and died seised in 1558.<sup>24</sup> Philip son of John<sup>25</sup> died childless in 1598, and the manor passed by settlement in tail-male to his nephew William son of William<sup>26</sup> Okeden.

Ellingham belonged to the Okedens until the middle of the 17th century, when William Beconshaw in 1634-5 died seised of the manor,<sup>27</sup> which passed on the death of his son Sir White Beconshaw in 1638 to the two daughters of the latter, Elizabeth wife of Thomas Tipping and Alice wife of John Lisle.<sup>28</sup> In 1658 a final settlement by which Ellingham passed to the Lisles was ratified by William Okeden, possibly a grandson of the last-mentioned William, who sold all reversionary right to William father of John Lisle.<sup>29</sup> This John Lisle the regicide, created Viscount Lisle by Cromwell, was attainted at the Restoration, but escaped to the Continent, where he was assassinated in 1664.<sup>30</sup> Subsequently Ellingham was restored to his son John,<sup>31</sup> who died in 1709, leaving two sons John and Charles Croke Lisle, who both succeeded him in turn and both died childless.<sup>32</sup> The latter, by will proved 1721, entailed his estates on his uncle Edward Lisle,<sup>33</sup> son of William the elder brother of John Lisle the regicide. From Edward the manor passed in turn to three of his sons, Edward, John and Charles,<sup>34</sup> the last being succeeded by a son Charles, who died unmarried in 1818.<sup>35</sup> It then passed to Christopher Taylor, the husband of his sister Mary, who had died in 1800. Their eldest son, Edward Hayles Taylor, who took the name of Lisle in 1822, sold the manor soon afterwards to the Earl of Normanton,<sup>36</sup> whose descendant Henry James Agar Earl of Normanton is the present lord of the manor.

A mill, which cannot now be traced, was attached to the manor in 1086<sup>37</sup> and 1294.<sup>38</sup>

The manor of ROCKFORD or ROCKFORD MOYLES (Rechefort or Rachesford, xii cent.; Rokeford, xiii cent.; Elyngham, xiv cent.; Rokford Meolys alias Elyngham, xv cent.), which Alwi the priest had held of King Edward as an alod, was in 1086 held by Hugh de St. Quintin of Hugh de Port,<sup>39</sup> and the overlordship was annexed to the St. John barony.<sup>40</sup>

In 1167 Rockford was in the possession of Robert Taisson or Tesson,<sup>41</sup> a descendant of the Domesday holder, since Taisson and St. Quintin were used by the family as alternative names. Thus a few years later Walter de St. Quintin granted the chapel of Rockford to the abbey of St. Sauveur-le-Vicomte,<sup>42</sup> and as Walter Taisson added a grant to the abbey of a tithe of all the crops growing in the marsh near his house.<sup>43</sup> His son and successor Robert Taisson witnessed a charter of Margery widow of Richard Rivers to Ellingham Priory.<sup>44</sup> After this date the manor passed to the Moels family, and it seems possible that the Testa de Nevill entry, that Nicholas de Moels held one knight's fee in 'Chardeford' of the old enfeoffment of Robert de St. John, refers to Rockford.<sup>45</sup> Roger son of Nicholas de Moels was in possession of half a knight's fee in Ellingham in 1280,<sup>46</sup> and in 1286 Simon Cosyn and Cecily his wife granted him a messuage and land in Rockford which they held in right of Cecily.<sup>47</sup> Roger died in 1295 seised of land in Rockford held of the heirs of Walter Cosyn, leaving a son and heir John,<sup>48</sup> from whom the manor descended with Over Wallop Moyles (q.v.) until 1337.<sup>49</sup> In that year John de Moels died, leaving two daughters, Maud wife of Sir Thomas Courtney and Isabel wife of William Botreaux,<sup>50</sup> and Rockford, then extended at £13 9s. 4d., was assigned to the latter.<sup>51</sup> William Botreaux died seised of the manor in 1349, and, since his son and heir William was a minor,<sup>52</sup> the custody of the manor was granted to William of Wykeham,<sup>53</sup> and afterwards to Richard St. John<sup>54</sup> and Ralph Daubeney.<sup>55</sup>

In 1375 William Botreaux, then a knight, granted the manor to a certain Walter Clopton for life,<sup>56</sup> and ten years later settled the reversion on his own son William.<sup>57</sup> The latter succeeded him in 1391,<sup>58</sup> but died four years later, leaving an infant son William.<sup>59</sup> The latter died in 1462, and was succeeded by his only daughter, Margaret widow of Sir Robert Hungerford,<sup>60</sup> who sold the manor to Robert White,<sup>61</sup> probably when she was raising a ransom for her son Robert, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Castillon.<sup>62</sup> Rockford remained in the White family for some years, passing from Robert to his son John,<sup>63</sup> and afterwards in 1469 to Robert son of John.<sup>64</sup> Henry White, son of the latter,<sup>65</sup> died circa 1535, leaving a son Robert,<sup>66</sup> who was holding the manor in 1557.<sup>67</sup> He was succeeded by William White,<sup>68</sup> apparently his son, who died in 1594, leaving an only daughter, Alice wife of William Beconshaw.<sup>69</sup> From this time Rockford passed like Ellingham (q.v. supra) to the Lisle family, Moyles Court in Rockford becoming their chief residence. Thus Alice, widow of John Lisle the regicide, continued to live at Moyles Court after her husband's attainder and death until her own notorious trial and death by burning in the market-place at Winchester in 1685.<sup>70</sup> On the accession of William and Mary her attainder was reversed<sup>71</sup> and Rockford, which had been granted to Lewis Earl of Feversham,<sup>72</sup> was restored, like Ellingham, to her son John.<sup>73</sup>

In the middle of the 19th century Edward Hayles Taylor sold Rockford to Henry Baring of Somerley,<sup>74</sup> from whom it has since been purchased by John Coventry of Burgate Manor. Moyles Court, however, was sold to the Earl of Normanton with Ellingham.<sup>75</sup>

A water-mill belonged to Rockford Manor in the 13th century,<sup>76</sup> but by 1337 was in bad repair,<sup>77</sup> and in 1349 it was almost in decay.<sup>78</sup> It is mentioned in 1664,<sup>79</sup> but no trace of it exists at the present day. The right of free fishing was attached to the manor in the 18th century.<sup>80</sup>

The Moels family held land in Ellingham,<sup>81</sup> which followed the descent and became merged in the manor of Rockford Moyles (q.v.).

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Coutances, was founded by William de Soleres in 1160.<sup>82</sup>

The church of ST. MARY (formerly CHURCH ALL SAINTS) consists of a chancel measuring 35 ft. to the screen and 37 ft. to the wall angle and 14 ft. 9 in. wide, a north organ chamber, nave 52 ft. by 24 ft., a wooden bell turret over the west gable and a south porch. The whole building appears to have been built in the late 13th century, a rood-loft stair turret being added in the 15th century; the south porch and west end of the nave are of red brick and stone and were rebuilt in 1720 and 1747 respectively, and the organ bay is a modern addition.

The east window of the chancel consists of three grouped lancets with a two-centred chamfered rear arch partly restored. The eastern angles of the nave walls have pairs of 13th-century buttresses. In the north wall is a double lancet much restored. In the south wall of the chancel is a trefoiled piscina with a pair of drains, and near it a three-light window with modern tracery. The south door has a two-centred head with a stopped chamfer, and west of it is a 15th-century window of three lights. There is no chancel arch, its place being taken by a screen which by most unusual good fortune retains its contemporary plastered partition above, and the floor and part of the front of the rood loft, the latter being 2 ft. wide, and setting forward in front of the screen. On the plaster partition over the screen the position of the rood which stood against it is clear, and has on either side of it wooden brackets, on which the figures of our Lady and St. John must have stood. On either side are painted figures of angels, and there is a background of a diaper pattern of roses and lilies and a border of dark green foliage. The date of the work is c. 1460. The front of the loft has been closed by a plastered partition on which are painted the royal arms of Charles II, 1671, and a number of texts, &c., in square and oval borders. In the upper tier are the Lord's Prayer, the Commandments in two panels, and the Creed, and below are four texts, James i. 21, Galatians iii. 24, Proverbs xxiv. 21, and Malachi iv. 2, with the royal arms in the middle. The original moulded bressummer carrying the front of the loft also shows externally on the west, and the screen below is of simple 15th-century character, very well preserved, with tracery in the head and solid panels below.

On the north side of the nave is a fine late 17th-century wood canopied pew, originally belonging to the Lisle family, and lighting it a small double lancet in which a few of the stones are old. The wall is set out to make room for the pew, which is not in its original position. West of this are three double lancets, with the north door between the second and third; some old stones remaining in all the windows. The north door only shows externally and has a plain chamfer and two-centred head. At the south-east of the nave a 15th-century doorway with cambered lintel opens into the projecting turret which contained the rood stair. In the wall above is an opening from which the rood loft was entered, though it is now below the level of the actual loft. The turret was lit by two small lights and has a rough external door.

West of the turret is a three-light window with wood lintel, only a few stones being old, and the south doorway is partly restored and has a two-centred head with stopped chamfers. The porch is of red brick, dated 1720, and has a large sundial on the gable.

The west end of the church is in brick and stone, dated 1747, and has a window and west door in classical style; the latter is blocked internally by an early 18th-century carved wood reredos, having a Doric order with a broken pediment in which are a dove and lamb.

In the middle is set a very good painting of the 'Last Judgement' brought from Cadiz, and apparently late 16th-century Spanish work; above it are two cherubs' heads and below a sheaf of deeply undercut foliage.

The chancel roof is modern, barrel vaulted in wood, and that of the nave is of similar shape, but has old tie-beams and principals, probably of 16th-century date; it is divided into panels by moulded ribs with gilt rosettes at the points of junction, which appear to be all modern. The bell turret has been rebuilt and stands on trussed beams carried to the ground. There is an octagonal carved 17th-century pulpit, once forming part of a 'three decker,' and the back of a bench with carving of the same date. The altar table is of the 17th century and has carved legs, and the altar rails are of the 18th century. The font is octagonal, probably of the 15th century, but the base on which it stands is of Purbeck marble, and may have formed part of an earlier font. Attached to the rood screen is a wrought-iron hour-glass stand dated 1650, containing a modern glass. The only ancient monumental inscription is on a small brass plate to Richard Punchardon (without date), now fixed into the modern stone reredos. In the south wall of the nave is a good marble monument to Alice Beconshaw, 1622, and on the west wall of the vestry three late 16th-century stone panels carved with a scallop and two roses, with two heads, apparently the ends of mediaeval labels, above them in the wall. On the monument of Alice Beconshaw, who was daughter and heir of William White of Moyles Court, are three shields of arms, namely, Beconshaw, Sable a cross paty argent and in the chief a scallop or, with a crescent for difference; White, and the two coats impaled.

In the north-east chancel buttresses are two small crosses and part of an inscription, and a stone half hidden by the buttress appears to be part of an engraved cross-slab. Several other old coffin slabs are also preserved, and on the south-east buttress of the chancel is a mediaeval sundial.

In the nave hang three good 18th-century brass chandeliers.

The one bell is by Clement Tosier, 1712.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1652, a paten of 1897 and a flagon alms dish of 1742.

The registers are contained in five books. The first, which has been recently restored, has all entries from 1596 to 1694; the second has all entries from 1695 to 1729; the third has baptisms and burials from 1727 to 1768 and marriages from 1727 to 1753; the fourth has marriages from 1754 to 1812, and the fifth baptisms and burials from 1769 to 1817.

FORDINGBRIDGE HUNDRED FORDINGBRIDGE

The church of Ellingham, in one ADVOWSON charter described as the church of St. Mary,<sup>83</sup> and in another as the church of All Saints with the chapel of St. Mary,<sup>84</sup> formed part of the grant of William de Solers to Ellingham Priory. In 1294 it was worth £12,<sup>85</sup> and before 1298 was appropriated to the priory.<sup>86</sup> At the dissolution of the priory the advowson was granted by Henry VI to Eton College,<sup>87</sup> to which Edward IV in 1462<sup>88</sup> granted also the fruits of the church. About 1880<sup>89</sup> Eton College sold the advowson to the late Earl of Normanton, to whose son, the present earl, it now belongs.

A chapel at Rockford, subject to the church of Ellingham, was granted by Walter de St. Quintin or Taisson, with the tithe from his house, to the abbey of St. Sauveur-le-Vicomte about 1170, and mass was to be said there three times a week by the chaplain of Ellingham or a monk.<sup>90</sup> No trace of it remains, but it probably stood in the 'Chapell field' mentioned in an indenture of 1664.<sup>91</sup>

Dame Elizabeth Tipping, widow CHARITIES of Sir Thomas Tipping, knight, by deed of 30 July 1687, appointed for the use of the poor certain lands in Wide Meadow, the rents and profits to be bestowed yearly on St. Thomas's Day amongst eight poor persons with a preference to her poor kindred. The poor receive the rents of 3a. 1r., now known as the Poor's Allotment, averaging about £4 a year.

In 1828 Mary Ann Colthurst directed certain of her property to be sold, and proceeds invested for the benefit of the poor. The trust fund now consists of £333 6s. 8d. consols.

The Harding Almshouses.—Mrs. Robert Harding, who died in 1855, directed £1,000 to be applied in the purchase of land and the erection of almshouses thereon. The endowment fund consists of £406 9s. 8d. consols with the official trustees, the dividends of which are applied in keeping the almshouses in repair and in defraying the expenses of the trust.

FORDINGBRIDGE

Forde (xi and xiii cent.); Fordingeburg, Forthingeburg (xiii cent.).

Fordingbridge, a large parish on the borders of Dorset and on the banks of the River Avon, includes the hamlets of Bickton, Burgate Stuckton and Midgham with Sandle Heath. It contains 6,303 acres, of which 2,471½ acres are arable land, 2,440½ are permanent grass and 723½ are woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The soil is mixed, on a subsoil of gravel, clay and sand. The land rises generally east and west from the valley of the Avon from about 84 ft. above the ordnance datum to 181 ft. in the west and 267 ft. in the east. Sandhill Heath was inclosed in 1865.<sup>2</sup> The main road from Salisbury to Ringwood crosses the Avon at Fordingbridge, where it is joined by the main road from Southampton.

The town is on the right bank of the Avon; St. Mary's Church and the vicarage are at the extreme south of the High Street, and the Town Hall, built in 1879, is almost in the centre. About a mile west of the town is Fordingbridge Station on the London and South Western Railway.

From the 13th to the 15th century Fordingbridge was governed by a bailiff,<sup>3</sup> but after the last date he was replaced by a constable chosen yearly at the court leet of the manor of Nether Burgate.<sup>4</sup> The constable was the chief officer until 1878, when government by Local District Council was established. A fire in the town in the 18th century destroyed many of the houses, which were never rebuilt, but it does not appear that Fordingbridge was ever very important. However, its trade was more extensive before the introduction of railways, since its bridge brought much traffic through the town. The bridge was evidently built before 1252, when the bailiff and men of the town received a grant of pontage for one year<sup>5</sup> towards its repairs in consideration of the traffic, and because the bridge would 'shortly suffer ruin unless a helping hand provide a remedy.' Several similar grants followed, the last being dated in 1452.<sup>6</sup> A custom which survived until 1840<sup>7</sup> obliged the lord of Fordingbridge during one summer month known as 'fence month' to keep the bridge guarded and arrest anyone found taking venison from the Forest.<sup>8</sup>

The chief industries of the town at the present day are the manufacture of sailcloth and canvas and the making of bricks and tiles, while the various flour-mills, an iron foundry and the Neave's food works also afford employment. Cloth was made here in the 16th century,<sup>9</sup> and in the 19th century there were factories for the manufacture of sailcloth and canvas and the spinning of flax.<sup>10</sup> The lord of the manor had a market, evidently by prescription, before 1273, when the court of the market was said to be worth 20s. a year.<sup>11</sup> It was held weekly first on Saturday and then on Friday until the middle of the 19th century, when owing to its insignificance it was discontinued. A fair is still held on 9 September.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Burgate House (Mr. John Coventry) and Packham House (Mrs. Foley) are in the parish. Fordingbridge was visited by Edward I in 1285.<sup>12</sup> Roman coins have been found at Godshill, where there are also remains of an ancient encampment. Nathaniel Highmore the physician and Charles Reeve the architect were born at Fordingbridge.<sup>13</sup>

The ecclesiastical parish of Hyde, including the hamlets of Blisford, Frogham, Hungerford and North Gorley, was formed from Fordingbridge in 1855. The township of Ashley Walk, including Godshill Wood and Inclosure, Ashley Lodge, Mudmore, Ogdens, Amberwood, Eyeworth Lodge, Miller's Farm and Greenhouse Farm, formerly extra-parochial, was formed in 1868, and is for the most part in the New Forest. It contains 8,400 acres, of which 1,042 acres are woods and plantations (exclusive of the land in the New Forest), 109 acres arable land and 121 acres permanent grass.<sup>14</sup>

Woodgreen, which in 1831 was an extra-parochial district in Godshill tithing, is now a small civil parish containing 47 acres.

The overlordship of FORDING-MANORS BRIDGE belonged at the time of the Domesday Survey to Robert the son of Gerald,<sup>15</sup> who also held the Middle and South Manors of South Tidworth (q.v.),<sup>16</sup> the descent of which it continued to follow. Before the Conquest Alwi held Fordingbridge of King Edward as an alod, but by 1086 he had been succeeded by a certain Robert.<sup>17</sup> At the beginning of the 13th century it was held by Hugh de Linguire, who, dying c. 1231, left a niece and heir Alice daughter of his brother Philip de Linguire and wife of William de la Falaise.<sup>18</sup> From this date Fordingbridge has followed the descent of Rowner (q.v.).<sup>19</sup>

In 1280 William le Brune claimed a market, pillory, tumbrel and assize of bread and ale in Fordingbridge.<sup>20</sup> His right to the last-named privilege was disputed by Bevis de Clare, the parson of Fordingbridge, who took the amendment of the assize from the tenants of the church. The case was tried before the justices in eyre, and was decided in favour of William le Brune, who obtained a confirmation of the privilege from Edward I in July 1281.<sup>21</sup>

Two water-mills on the 'little water of Afford'<sup>22</sup> were parcel of the manor of Fordingbridge from the 11th to the 16th century.<sup>23</sup> In Elizabeth's reign 'two ancient water-mills and an ancient streame of water' were held of Henry Brune by William Osborne, who complained that a certain John Barter had altered the course of the stream to turn a new mill set up on his copyhold lands within the manor.<sup>24</sup>

There is still a mill, now known as the Town Mill, on the Ashford Water.

Before the Conquest a certain Chetel held BICK-TON (Bichetone, xi cent.; Bikston, xiii cent.; Byketon, xiv and xv cent.; Byckton Romsey, xvi cent.; Bickton alias Bishton, xvii cent.) of King Edward as an alod, but in 1086 it had passed to Hugh Earl of Chester, and was held of him by Hugh Maci.<sup>25</sup> The overlordship in the 13th century, when it is next mentioned, belonged to the Earl of Salisbury,<sup>26</sup> and as late as 1641 the manor was said to be held of the king as of the earldom of Salisbury.<sup>27</sup>

The 13th-century representative of Hugh Maci was Richard Fitz Aucher,<sup>28</sup> who met with a violent death in 1253, apparently at the hands of a certain Peter de St. Hilary.<sup>29</sup> Henry Fitz Aucher, probably his son,<sup>30</sup> died about 1303, leaving a son Aucher,<sup>31</sup> who in 1349 received from Sir John Rivers a release for himself and his tenants of Bickton from all amercements in court and all services due in the hundred of Fordingbridge. Aucher died before 1343, when his son John and Margery his wife were in possession. After 1346<sup>32</sup> John was succeeded by Aucher, probably a son, who is said to have left two daughters Christine and Elizabeth.<sup>33</sup> At the beginning of the 15th century the manor belonged to a certain Arthur Frank, whose only son and daughter Richard and Elizabeth both died childless during his lifetime, so that on his death about 1421 he was succeeded by Richard Romsey,<sup>34</sup> on whom he had already settled the reversion. The latter, after holding for forty years, left it to his son John,<sup>35</sup> during whose tenure an unsuccessful claim was put forward by Edward Lane and Egidia his wife, who claimed to be a descendant of Christine daughter of Aucher.<sup>36</sup> John Romsey died in 1494, and his son and heir John<sup>37</sup> in 1503. William,<sup>38</sup> son and heir of John, whose only son Richard predeceased him, left two daughters and heirs, Anne wife of Thomas Bartholomew, on whom he settled Bickton, and Radigund wife of Thomas Dix.<sup>39</sup> An annuity of £8 from the manor was settled on Henry Dix, son of Thomas and Radigund, in 1560,<sup>40</sup> and another similar annuity on Elizabeth, widow of William Romsey, and afterwards wife of Arthur Bulkeley. Owing to the non-payment of the latter annuity a dispute arose in the early 16th century, Thomas Bartholomew and Anne complaining that Arthur Bulkeley and others had entered their manor-house of Bickton, broken down their hedges and gates, driven away their cattle and taken away 'a greate bell hanging in the roffe of the said manor-howse wyche of a veri long tyme hadd hanged there and used as a warnyng bell when any daunger of enemyes fyer or theves were abought the seid howse.'<sup>41</sup> William Bartholomew, son of Thomas and Anne, succeeded them in the manor<sup>42</sup> and left it before 1596 to his son Richard.<sup>43</sup> The latter sold it in 1632 to John Davenant, Bishop of Salisbury,<sup>44</sup> who died in 1640, leaving it to Edward son of his elder brother Edward.<sup>45</sup>

Edward Davenant appears to have settled Bickton in his life-time on his eldest son John, who in 1664 mortgaged it to a certain John Mynne of Lincoln's Inn.<sup>46</sup> John Davenant, dying before his father in 1671, made a request that his father would buy back the manor and pay off his debts.<sup>47</sup> Accordingly the manor passed to John Davenant's eldest son John, who was High Sheriff of Wiltshire in 1686, and was succeeded by a son Edward.<sup>48</sup> The latter, like his grandfather, was involved in financial difficulties and left his property heavily mortgaged to his three sisters Rebecca, Catherine and Elizabeth.<sup>49</sup> Bickton seems to have become the property of Rebecca, who with her husband Thomas Hooper sold the manor in 1744 to John Castell.<sup>50</sup> It was purchased from the latter by Sir Eyre Coote in 1766,<sup>51</sup> and has passed with West Park (q.v.) to the present Sir Eyre Coote.

One or more mills always belonged to the manor of Bickton,<sup>52</sup> but only one exists at the present day.

DAVENANT. Gules three scallops ermine between eight crosslets fitchy or.

Fishing rights also belonged to the lords of the manor in the 16th and 17th centuries.<sup>53</sup>

The manor of NETHER BURGATE belonged to the king at the time of the Domesday Survey.<sup>54</sup> It was granted by Henry II to Manser Bisset,<sup>55</sup> from whom it descended with Rockbourne (q.v.) to John Bisset, on whose death in 1241 it was assigned to his eldest daughter and co-heir Margery the wife of Richard Rivers.<sup>56</sup> Margery died in 1255-6, and Henry III then granted the manor to Philip Basset in custody during the minority of her son John.<sup>57</sup> John Rivers died in 1293-4,<sup>58</sup> and in the same year the king took homage of his son and heir John Rivers.<sup>59</sup> This John alienated the manor of Burgate and the hundred of Fordingbridge to his sister Joan in 1310-11, who with her husband, Sir William Tracy, made good her right against her nephew John, son and heir of the last-named John,<sup>60</sup> at a later date,<sup>61</sup> and John Tracy, her younger son, was holding the manor in 1339. Two years later he settled the reversion on Thomas de Langley and Margaret his wife, possibly daughter of John.<sup>62</sup> The former was living in 1361,<sup>63</sup> but had apparently died before 1364, when the manor was granted in custody to Richard de Pembridge,<sup>64</sup> and two years later to Richard and his heirs.<sup>65</sup> Richard, then a knight, died in July 1375, and on the death of his only child Henry a few months later<sup>66</sup> the manor was divided between Richard de Burley and Thomas atte Barre, sons respectively of the two sisters and heirs of Sir Richard, Amice and Hawise. Thomas, reserving a yearly rent, gave up his share to Richard de Burley,<sup>67</sup> who in 1386 settled the whole manor on himself and his wife Beatrice with remainder in default of issue male to Sir Simon Burley, to whom it passed on his death a few years later.<sup>68</sup> After the execution of Sir Simon, the favourite of Richard II, in 1388 the manor again fell to the Crown,<sup>69</sup> and in 1390 was granted to William de Lekhull and Katherine his wife, who as great-granddaughter and heir of the first John Rivers and Maud his wife, claimed it after Sir Simon Burley as heirs of Richard Burley under the settlement of 1386.<sup>70</sup>

Fifteen years later Katherine and her second husband John Hall complained that Sir Richard Arundell and others had violently seized the manor and goods worth £190 11s. with £10 in money and all their title deeds and three bonds for £260, and had bound one of their servants and thrown him into the Avon.<sup>71</sup> John Hall, who survived his wife, held the manor until his death in 1433-4,<sup>72</sup> when it passed to her eldest son, John de Lekhull, who took the name of Rivers.<sup>73</sup> He is supposed to have been murdered by two of his servants.<sup>74</sup> His kinsman William Bulkeley of Eyton (co. Ches.) was returned as his heir,<sup>75</sup> but it appeared afterwards that he left a brother Thomas Lekhull alias Rivers, to whom William Bulkeley and his son Thomas surrendered the manor in 1442.<sup>76</sup> In the following year Thomas settled the reversion of the manor on Thomas Payn and Joan his wife, daughter of Sir Thomas Romsey, with further reversion if they died childless to William Bulkeley.<sup>77</sup> William Bulkeley, surviving both Thomas Rivers and Thomas and Joan Payn, came into possession of the manor.<sup>78</sup> His son Charles, who succeeded him, died in 1483, leaving a son Robert,<sup>79</sup> from whom the manor passed in 1513-14 to his son, also Robert.<sup>80</sup> The latter in 1535-6 settled it on his son William on his marriage with Joan daughter of Nicholas Luke, one of the barons of the Exchequer.<sup>81</sup> William succeeded to the manor in 1550<sup>82</sup> and died in 1581, leaving it to his eldest son John.<sup>83</sup> The latter settled it on his wife Anne in 1599,<sup>84</sup> who after his death in 1607<sup>85</sup> let the capital messuage with two mills and a fishery during her life to her four brothers—John, William, Robert and Hugh Grove.<sup>86</sup> She evidently survived her son William Bulkeley, who died in 1616-17, having in 1611 settled the reversion of Burgate on his wife Margaret daughter of John Culliford.<sup>87</sup> John Bulkeley son of William, an infant at his father's death, was still holding the manor in 1646.<sup>88</sup> His successor was another William Bulkeley, a minor.<sup>89</sup> Between 1670 and 1700 the manor passed to Sir Dewy Bulkeley, who left it to his only son, James Coventry Bulkeley.<sup>90</sup> From the latter Burgate passed to John Bulkeley Coventry, youngest son of William Earl of Coventry, who took the surname of Bulkeley.<sup>91</sup> On the death of the latter in 1801 Burgate passed according to his will to his nephew, John Coventry,<sup>92</sup> the eldest son of George William Earl of Coventry by his second wife, and now belongs to Mr. John Coventry, great-grandson of the above John.<sup>93</sup>

The court of Burgate Manor is still held twice a year in the old court-house in the north of the town.<sup>94</sup>

In the 17th century there were two mills,<sup>96</sup> one of which was in existence at the beginning of the 19th century, but was pulled down in 1818.

Fishing rights in the Kedell and in the waters of Burgate and Fordingbridge were parcel of the manor in the 17th century.<sup>97</sup>

OVER BURGATE is probably represented in the Domesday Survey by the virgate of land in Burgate which Ulvic and Colleve had held of Picot, the tenant in chief, before the Conquest.<sup>98</sup> Its overlordship seems generally to have belonged to the lord of the manor of Rockford Moyles (q.v.). Hugh de Burgate, who was holding one fee in Fordingbridge of the Earl of Hertford<sup>99</sup> in the 13th century, was probably the same Hugh who, by the name of Sir Hugh de Godshill, granted land in Over Burgate to the priory of Maiden Bradley in 1242.<sup>100</sup> After his death Over Burgate was apparently divided into four parts, each of which contained the fourth part of a mill. In 1280 William Sprake held half a fee in 'Little' Over Burgate of the Earl of Hertford,<sup>101</sup> and three-quarters of a fee in Over Burgate, which Ralph atte Beche and others had held, belonged in 1346 to Richard Reyson, John le Monck, John Sprake and Christine Bowyer.<sup>102</sup> John Reyson, probably son of Richard, died in 1353 seised of his share, which consisted of a messuage, 32 acres of land and 2 acres of moor.<sup>103</sup> Richard le Monck and Joan his wife, and John le Monck and Margaret his wife, dealt with property in Fordingbridge and Over Burgate in 1354,<sup>104</sup> and in 1378 Richard Monck and Alice his wife conveyed an estate there to John Waryn and Maud his wife.<sup>105</sup> William Frebody purchased another estate from Alice the wife of John Chapman in 1402,<sup>106</sup> and John Frebody, probably his son, was, with John Coke and John Haselber, holding one-third of a fee in Over Burgate in 1428.<sup>107</sup> John Coke dealt by fine with six messuages and 20 acres of land in Fordingbridge, Over Burgate and Nether Burgate in 1497.<sup>108</sup> At the beginning of the 16th century the 'manor' of Over Burgate was in the possession of William Coke, probably grandson or great-grandson of John, who settled it on his heirs by his wife Anastasia.<sup>109</sup> On William's death in 1527-8 the manor passed to his only daughter Margaret wife of Richard Lewis alias Johnson.<sup>110</sup> She was succeeded by an only daughter Joan, who married Christopher Fetiplace,<sup>111</sup> and with him sold the manor to Thomas Percy in 1564.<sup>112</sup> Henry<sup>113</sup> grandson of the latter mortgaged and finally sold 'the manor or capital messuage' of 'Little Over Burgate' to Robert Waterton of Newport (I.W.) in 1635.<sup>114</sup> In 1670 it was owned by Robert Blachford, who also owned a moiety of Sandhill Manor,<sup>115</sup> and in 1702 it was sold with Sandhill Manor by Robert Blachford and Anne his wife, Anthony Morgan and Katherine his wife to Thomas Warre.<sup>116</sup> Some years later the manor seems to have been purchased by William and Jeremiah Cray and descended with Ibsley (q.v.) to Percival Lewis, to whom it belonged in 1810.<sup>117</sup> Since that date it has been purchased by Mr. Coventry and has been incorporated with the manor of Nether Burgate.

A mill in Over Burgate, mentioned in the Domesday Survey<sup>118</sup> and held with the manor in the 14th century,<sup>119</sup> has long since disappeared.

In the 13th century the Prior and convent of Beaulieu acquired property in Over Burgate, afterwards described as a manor, from Margery Rivers, the holder of Nether Burgate, and her son John Rivers.<sup>120</sup> About the middle of the same century Hugh de Godshill granted them and their men of Burgate permission to keep their animals in his bailiwick free of all exactions.<sup>121</sup> At the Dissolution<sup>122</sup> it was described as the manor of FREREN COURT<sup>123</sup> and in 1543 it was granted as 'the manor of Over Burgate or Freren Court' to Robert White and Katherine his wife,<sup>124</sup> and henceforth followed the descent of Rockford Moyles (q.v.), being later merged in the manor of Nether Burgate.

The so-called manor<sup>125</sup> of CRIDLESTYLE or EAST MILL (Cridelestrowe, Credelstowe, Estmylne, xiv cent.), held of the lord of the manor of Nether Burgate,<sup>126</sup> belonged in the 14th century to John de Breamore,<sup>127</sup> who settled it on himself and his wife Geva, with reversion to his son John and Joan his wife and their heirs.<sup>128</sup> Eventually in 1377 the manor passed to Joan daughter of the younger John by his second wife Margaret<sup>129</sup> and wife of William Bayford or Byford. She settled her property on her second husband Thomas Chapeleyn in 1401,<sup>130</sup> and on his death in 1415 it passed to her daughters by her first husband: Joan wife of Thomas Ringwood and Amelia Clemence wife of Richard Devereux.<sup>131</sup> The latter, however, either died childless or gave up her claim, since Thomas Ringwood, apparently son of the above Thomas, died seised of Cridlestyle in 1474-5, leaving a son of the same name,<sup>132</sup> who was succeeded in the following year by his son Charles.<sup>133</sup> The latter was succeeded in turn by his son John,<sup>134</sup> his grandson Charles<sup>135</sup> and his great-grandson Henry,<sup>136</sup> who, after holding Cridlestyle for over forty years,<sup>137</sup> sold it about 1592 to William Dodington.<sup>138</sup> From that date Cridlestyle descended with South Charford<sup>139</sup> (q.v.) until about 1748, when it was apparently sold to Sir Edward Hulse, bart.,<sup>140</sup> and passed with Breamore (q.v.) to his descendant, Sir Edward Hamilton Westrow Hulse, bart.

The site is now marked by a farm and mill.

One mill, it seems, belonged to Cridlestyle in 1376,<sup>141</sup> but from the 15th to the 18th century two corn-mills and a fulling-mill<sup>142</sup> were attached to the 'manor.' Since the beginning of the 19th century they have been used for the manufacture of sailcloth and sacking.<sup>143</sup>

The manor of FOLD (Folle, Folds, La Folde, xiv cent.; Foldes, xvi cent.; Fowles or Folles or Folds, xviii and xix cent.) was held in chief of the royal manor of Lyndhurst.<sup>144</sup> In 1332 Nicholas de Venuz, a felon, was found to have held a messuage, 188 acres of land, a fishpond and two free tenants in

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Fold,<sup>145</sup> possibly the later manor of Fold which before 1340 was granted to John de Breamore.<sup>146</sup> He left it to his daughter Roycia,<sup>147</sup> who was evidently succeeded by another John de Breamore, and since that date Fold has followed the descent of Cridlestytle<sup>148</sup> (q.v.). It was first described as a manor in 1392.<sup>149</sup> The site is now marked by a farm.

In 1571 the so-called manor of GODSHILL was sold by Henry Earl of Arundel, John Lord Lumley and Joan his wife, eldest daughter of the earl, to a certain Reginald Howse.<sup>150</sup> Some years later Robert Howse, who seems to have been son of Reginald, sold it to William Dodington,<sup>151</sup> from which date it descended with Breamore<sup>152</sup> (q.v.).

In the 14th century the Breamores held under Lyndhurst Manor<sup>153</sup> land in Godshill which followed the descent of Cridlestytle.<sup>154</sup> It was evidently sold to William Dodington and became part of the so-called manor of Godshill.

Land in Godshill described in 1403 as a manor<sup>155</sup> followed from that date the descent of Fordingbridge<sup>156</sup> (q.v.).

In the 16th and 17th centuries a royal manor of Godshill probably formed part of the New Forest.<sup>157</sup>

In 1086 Osbern the Falconer held in chief the manor of GORLEY (Gerlei, xi cent.; Gertley, xiii cent.) which Wistric had held of Edward the Confessor as an alod.<sup>158</sup> At present this entry cannot be connected with either of the two manors of North Gorley existing in the 16th century. One was in the possession of John Bulkeley, who in 1532 dealt with it by fine with Nicholas Tichborne the elder.<sup>159</sup> Having apparently passed to the Keilways of Rockbourne before 1576<sup>160</sup> it was purchased by Sir John Cooper in 1608,<sup>161</sup> and evidently merged in Rockbourne. The other manor was acquired by the Abbot and convent of Beaulieu from Margery Rivers, John Rivers and others,<sup>162</sup> and was probably granted, after the suppression, with Freren Court to Robert White,<sup>163</sup> to whom it belonged in 1564,<sup>164</sup> from which date it followed the descent of Rockford in Ellingham (q.v.),<sup>165</sup> being merged in that manor after 1634-5.<sup>166</sup>

Of the two manors in MIDGHAM (Mingeham, xi cent.; Migham, xii cent.; Mightam, xiv cent.; Miggeham, xvi cent.) that held of Edward the Confessor by two freemen, and afterwards known as North Midgham, belonged in 1086 to Eddeva,<sup>167</sup> while the other, afterwards known as South Midgham, which Ulviet had held in chief belonged to Alwi son of Torber.<sup>168</sup>

The overlordship of North Midgham descended like that of Fordingbridge<sup>169</sup> (q.v.). By the beginning of the 13th century the manor was in the possession of four heiresses, Hawise de Midgham, Margery wife of Alan de Woodford, Clemencia wife of Walter de Breamore and Avice de Midgham.<sup>170</sup> In 1243 the manor belonged to Ralph de la Falaise and Christine his wife,<sup>171</sup> from whom it was inherited by Elias de la Falaise<sup>172</sup> son of William. It escheated like Rowner (q.v.) to the Crown before 1277, and was at first granted to Aumary de St. Amand, to whom it belonged in 1280,<sup>173</sup> but before 1283 passed to William le Brune<sup>174</sup> and followed the descent of Fordingbridge and Rowner (q.v.) until the end of the 15th century,<sup>175</sup> when it was held by John Parker, the lord of South Midgham, who died seised in 1473.<sup>176</sup> His son Thomas inherited the manor, but dying childless in 1477 left the manor to his sister and heir Isabel wife of Richard North.<sup>177</sup>

Richard North, who was still living in 1508,<sup>178</sup> is said to have had a son John,<sup>179</sup> who was succeeded by a son Richard, from whom the manor passed to his eldest son by his second wife Anne.<sup>180</sup> This William sold it in 1608 to John Webb of Odstock<sup>181</sup> (co. Wilts.), who being a recusant forfeited his property a few years later. However, in 1634-5 his lands were restored and his debts pardoned,<sup>182</sup> while ten years later he was created a baronet for the loyalty of his family,<sup>183</sup> and, though this creation was disallowed as being subsequent to 1642 and his estates were sequestered in 1646, they were restored in 1660 and his son John succeeded to both on his death in 1680. The manor remained in the Webb family<sup>184</sup> until the end of the 18th century, when it was purchased by Eyre Coote of West Park,<sup>185</sup> in whose family it has since remained.

South Midgham passed with Hale and West Tytherley (q.v.) to the Cardvilles and was held of them by a family called Aygnel, apparently by the service of attending the Fordingbridge hundred court as tithingmen of Hale and by the annual rent of 2s. 1d.<sup>186</sup> Laurence Aygnel was probably holding it in 1242<sup>187</sup> and John Aygnel in 1316,<sup>188</sup> but after the last date there is no trace of it until 1473, when it belonged with North Midgham to John Parker.<sup>189</sup> The two manors have since followed the same descent.

In 1274 land in SANDHILL belonged to Thomas Baldwin and Maud his wife.<sup>190</sup> Nearly a century later, in 1340, Roger Bubbe granted the manor, probably for a term of years, to Elias de Godele and Ela his wife,<sup>191</sup> and in 1366 Roger Bubbe, or a son of the same name, settled the manor on himself and Alice his wife, with reversion if they died childless to John son of John Crosse and his heirs, and further contingent remainders to Clementia and Alice sisters of John, and to William Coker.<sup>192</sup> No further mention can be found of Sandhill until 1507, when Richard Moleyns died seised of the manor held of Robert Bulkeley, and left a son and heir William.<sup>193</sup> The latter was succeeded by a son Henry, who was holding Sandhill in 1562,<sup>194</sup> and apparently left it to two daughters or granddaughters, Anne wife of John Somers and Joan wife of Robert Waterton, to whom it belonged in 1612.<sup>195</sup> The latter, who succeeded to the whole of the manor, left two daughters and co-heirs; one became the wife of Thomas Urrey, the other married one of the Blachfords and left a son Robert. Katherine, only daughter of Thomas Urrey, married Anthony Morgan, and they, with Robert Blachford, conveyed the manor to Thomas Warre in 1702.<sup>196</sup> Charles and Thomas Taw were holding it in 1722,<sup>197</sup> but before 1751 it had been purchased by the Bulkeleys<sup>198</sup> of Burgate, to whom it still belongs.

A reputed manor called ARNEYS or IRISH-LAND (Hony's or Erny's Court,<sup>199</sup> xvii cent.), now Arniss Farm, possibly deriving its name from a family called Erny's, who held land in Fordingbridge in the 13th<sup>200</sup> and 14th<sup>201</sup> centuries, belonged to the lords of the manor of Nether Burgate from the end of the 15th century.<sup>202</sup> In 1802 the lord of the manor claimed a place in the New Forest, known as Bulkeley's purlieu, as part of the manor.<sup>203</sup>

EYEWORTH (Jvare, xiii cent.; Ivory Lodge, xviii cent.), now in the parish of Ashley Walk, was held as an alod by two freemen of Edward the Confessor, belonged to the king<sup>204</sup> in 1086, and has remained with the Crown as part of the New Forest.

The rectory manor of WOODFIDLEY was granted by Henry VI to the college of St. Mary and St. Nicholas, Cambridge, afterwards known as King's College,<sup>205</sup> to which it still belongs. In 1670 the provost and scholars claimed, under the charter of Henry VI, hunting rights in this manor, common of pasture in the New Forest, and the hearing of all pleas of trespasses done by them and their men in the forest before the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.<sup>206</sup>

The church of ST. MARY THE CHURCHES VIRGIN consists of chancel 42 ft. 9 in. by 18 ft., with north chapel 43 ft. 9 in. by 18 ft., and south vestries, nave 63 ft. 6 in. by 21 ft. 6 in. with north and south aisles, tower at the east end of the north aisle 14 ft. square, north aisle 7 ft. 7 in. wide, south aisle 14 ft. wide, north porch with a parvise above, and south porch.

The church has been a large and important building from an early date, and in the 12th century had an aisleless nave of the same size as the present one, with a chancel shorter than that now standing, but of equal width. Of this church the west wall of the nave and part of the south wall of the chancel, with the jambs of a doorway in ironstone, yet remain, and a number of details found and now preserved at the rectory show that the date of the work was c. 1160-70. About 1220-40 the church was greatly enlarged and practically rebuilt, the present chancel being built with a vestry on the south and a chapel of two bays on the north-west, while north and south aisles were added to the nave, opening from it by the existing arcades of four bays. Later in the 13th century, c. 1270, the north chapel was enlarged eastwards, being made equal in length to the chancel, and a third bay added to the arcade between chancel and chapel. Nothing of importance seems to have been done in the 14th century, except a little work which has been attributed to Bishop Edington, but in the 15th the tower was added, the nave clearstory and north porch built, and the south aisle, except its west wall, rebuilt, with a south porch. In modern times the south vestry has been rebuilt and enlarged, and a second vestry added between it and the east end of the south aisle. There has also been a great deal of careful repair to the south arcade of the nave and elsewhere, with a general improvement of the fittings and decoration.

The church is built of ironstone and flint, and the tower is ashlar faced, all the walls being finished with plain parapets, and the roofs covered with lead. The facing work of small flints in the 13th-century work of the chancel and part of the north aisle is interesting and unusual. The tower is in three stages with an embattled parapet and a projecting stair turret near the north-east corner, rising a little above the tower parapet and also embattled on the string; at its base are large grotesque heads at the corners and in the centres.

In the east wall of the chancel are three tall and very wide lancets, with richly moulded drop arches supported both inside and out upon detached banded shafts with moulded capitals and bases; two of the shafts on the outside have been replaced, but otherwise the windows are in good condition, except for a decided lean to the south. Their unusual width suggests that they have been enlarged by cutting back the splays, but the masonry gives no proof of this.

In the north wall may be seen the east jamb and part of the arch of another lancet, blocked at the lengthening of the north chapel, and below and to the west of it is a segmental headed locker 2 ft. 8 in. wide and 1 ft. 9 in. high, rebated for a door. The arcade on the north is of three bays with two-centred arches of two chamfered orders and labels on both faces with foliate stops; the piers are of four engaged

The south-west vestry is entered from the chancel by the 13th-century priest's door, formerly external, and to the west of it may be seen the lower part of the jambs of a late 12th-century doorway in ironstone, which is all that remains of the former chancel.

The two-centred chancel arch, of two splayed orders, has half-round responds with moulded capitals and splayed angles, and is of 13th-century date, but the capitals have been renewed and the shafts have lost their bases. The king post roof over the chancel dates from 1903.

The east window of the north chapel, of five trefoiled lights with geometrical tracery in the head, is modern, but is perhaps a copy of the original work. The three windows in the north wall, of two trefoiled lights with a trefoil in the head under a two-centred arch, probably date from c. 1270, but have all been repaired; the jambs and springers of three earlier 13th-century windows which they replaced are yet to be seen, the middle one retaining traces of a round shafts and half-round responds, and plainly moulded capitals and bases following the contour of the piers. The two western arches and the west respond and pier are of the date of the chancel, but the eastern arch is a later copy of them, made with the east pier when the chapel was lengthened; the east respond is the old one moved eastward at the same time. At the south-east of the chancel is a trefoiled piscina recess moulded and having two plain round drains in the sill, the projection of which has been cut away; at the back there is a narrow moulded shelf. There are four tall lancets in the south wall with labels both inside and out with foliated stops, the south-west lancet having on a line with the sills of the first three a transom, and a low side window beneath rebated for a shutter; it seems to be a 14th-century addition. In the south-east vestry two old recesses for cupboards have been preserved, in one of which there is part of an altar stone built in a recess in the wall, two of the incised crosses being visible.

Painted masonry pattern, which can fortunately be pretty closely dated on this account. The break in the wall between the two easternmost windows on the north shows the junction of the older work with the east bay of the chapel. This chapel was not parochial, but belonged in turn to the Templars and Hospitallers, passing finally to St. Cross's Hospital, which still has rights over it.

On the outer face of the east bay of the north wall there is a four-centred recess with a double ogee edge moulding, and within it an altar tomb with a moulded slab and plinth and the remains of originally three square traceried panels set diagonally and containing shields. The end of the 15th century or beginning of the 16th is the date of the work, and at the back there is a large rectangular stone with remains of a black letter inscription at the top, the rest being defaced by a number of deeply scraped oval grooves, as if for the sharpening of knives. It is locally known as the miracle stone, and said to have been scraped away for its curative powers, a custom which obtains in Egypt with regard to the ancient temples at the present day, but no satisfactory proof seems now obtainable.

At the south-east of the chapel is a trefoiled piscina recess of 13th-century date with a filleted roll stopped on the sill, which is moulded and slightly projects, and seems to have formed part of a string-course.

The open timber roof over this chapel is a particularly beautiful one of early 15th-century date, in four bays, with arched braces below the tie-beams, tied to the wall about midway by hammer-beams, and cusped on the under side. The spandrels between them and the tie-beams are filled with pierced tracery, and between the tie-beams and the principal rafters the space is filled with tall cinquefoiled tracery. On the ends of the hammer-beams are figures holding shields and other devices, such as a crown and a mitre, and at the crown of the arches formed by the braces large carved bosses, one being a bearded head, are fixed to the soffits of the tie-beams; the effect of the whole, with the carved bosses at the intersections of the principal timbers and the traceried trusses, is very satisfactory, and it is a great pity that the western bay should be nearly blocked by a huge and unsightly organ.

The nave is of four bays with arcades of 13th-century date, having arches of two chamfered orders, and round pillars with plainly moulded capitals and bases with a simple low plinth and an upper splay. The section of the capitals seems rather of 15th-century than 13th-century character, and may point to a rebuilding of the arcades with old materials when the clearstory was added. The wall space at the east of the south arcade is cut through by a low arch looking like a tomb recess, but much repaired and of uncertain date.

There are four clearstory windows on each side, all of two trefoiled lights under a square head, except the east one on the north, which is a blank arch and has probably always been so, on account of the contemporary tower against which it is set. At the west of the nave is a doorway with a four-centred arch and label with returned stops, on either side of which are external recesses, that on the north cinquefoiled, 9 in. wide and 2 ft. 9 in. from the sill to the springing of its arch; the other is square-headed, 1 ft. 7 in. wide by 2 ft. 1 in. high, and rebated on its edge. The former probably held a figure and the latter a light. Above the doorway there is a large window of five cinquefoiled lights, with a transom and rectilinear tracery under a two-centred head; and above this window on the outside there is a low-pitched gable set back to allow for a passage way in front of it over the window. The work seems to be of late 14th-century date, and has been attributed, but without much evidence, to Bishop Edington.

The queen post roof over the nave with four-centred struts below the tie-beam is probably of 15th-century date, the east truss retaining traces of colour decoration; what was possibly a doorway to the rood loft may be seen on the south wall from the outside.

The tower, containing eight bells, is built at the east of the north aisle, to which it opens by a two-centred arch of two chamfered orders, part of which, being wider than the aisle, extends north beyond the wall, which is returned northwards to inclose it. There are a similar arch between the tower and north chapel and one of a single splayed order built against the first bay of the north nave arcade; the window in the north wall is of three cinquefoiled lights with rectilinear tracery under a two-centred arch, and a doorway in the north-east corner admits to the turret stair. In the second stage there is a two-light cinquefoiled window under a square head on the north side, and each face of the belfry has a two-light window under a square head, that on the south side having a large sundial above it, while there is another smaller one on one of the north-east buttresses.

The two windows in the north wall of the aisle, of two cinquefoiled lights with a quatrefoil over, date from the 15th century, while that in the west wall belongs to the 14th.

The north doorway has a low three-centred arch with a single chamfer, and the entrance arch to the porch has a similar arch of two splayed orders. West of this doorway on the outside there is a recess 2 ft. 10 in. from the ground, 1 ft. 8 in. wide, and 2 ft. from the sill to the apex of its pointed arch, with a projecting hood which is supported upon corbels; this from its position was probably intended to hold a lantern and is not for holy water. There is a parvise above the porch, reached from a stairway at the south-east which formerly opened to the aisle but is now turned by winding steps so as to be entered from the porch. In the north and west walls of the parvise are two-light cinquefoiled windows with square heads.

In the east wall of the south aisle is a modern doorway to the vestry and on the south side of it a 14th-century trefoiled piscina recess; above the doorway there is a square-headed three-light window of 15th-century date. There are three windows in the south wall and one in the west, each of two cinquefoiled lights with a quatrefoil over, like those in the north aisle, and the low-pitched roof is modern. The south porch and doorway are plain work, of the date of the rebuilding of the aisle, and there is a holy water stone in the north-east angle of the porch, below which a late 12th-century capital is built into the wall.

The octagonal font at the west end of the south aisle has a Purbeck marble bowl much damaged by exposure to the weather, with two trefoiled panels on each face. The stem is circular and the base octagonal; it probably dates from the early part of the 14th century. All the other fittings are modern.

On the east wall of the nave north of the chancel arch there is a brass plate mounted upon an ornamental wood framework with figures of a man and his wife kneeling at prayer desks with their three sons and five daughters. There is a shield of Bulkeley with three quarterings, and below is the following inscription: 'Here under lyeth buried ye bodies of Wifm Bulkeley Esquier and Jane his wiffe daughter of Baron luke of ye Quenes highnes exchequer who had between them iii sons Charles, Wifm whose bodies lyeth here buried & John, and v daughters. An, Jane, Judyth, Susan & Cilcelei, whom Jesus Christ have mercy and grant them eternal joy.' Above is the date 1568, and over each of the children is the initial letter of their Christian names.

In the churchyard wall near the north gate is set the socket of a large 15th-century churchyard cross, the stump of which was standing early in the last century, but is now entirely removed.

The plate consists of two silver chalices and a paten of 1843 and a silver flagon of 1837.

There are ten books of registers. The first contains baptisms and marriages from 1642 to 1698 (incomplete between 1650 and 1660) and burials 1642 to 1679 and 1695 to 1698. The second contains burials only from 1678 to 1709 and some briefs. The third has all entries from 1698 to 1714, and the fourth the same from 1714 to 1739. The fifth has baptisms and marriages from 1739 to 1754 (some years missing) and burials 1739 to 1801. The sixth has marriages only from 1754 to 1789; and the seventh baptisms and marriages from 1790 to 1804 and burials 1790 to 1803. The eighth has marriages only from 1790 to 1795; the ninth, baptisms 1794 to 1812 and burials 1802 to 1812, while the tenth contains marriages 1795 to 1812. There are also three volumes of sextons' books.

The church of the HOLY ASCENSION, HYDE, built in 1855, is of red brick with stone dressings in 14th-century style and consists of chancel, nave, north vestry, south porch and western turret containing two bells. There is a fine stone reredos. The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten of 1852 and a flagon of 1851, and a silver chalice and paten of 1855 given by the Rev. R. P. Warren, perpetual curate of Hyde at that date. The registers date from 1856.

The church of Fordingbridge ADVOWSONS existed in 1086<sup>207</sup> and evidently belonged to the lord of the manor until about 1256, when Elias de la Falaise granted it without licence for the yearly rent of a rose to Richard de Clare Earl of Gloucester and Hertford.<sup>208</sup> In 1274 Gilbert son of Richard de Clare being summoned to show by what right he held the advowson acknowledged that the grant of 1256 was made without licence, but successfully pleaded that as this was done a long time ago he ought not to be hindered from presenting.<sup>209</sup>

On the death of Gilbert in 1295 the advowson descended to his son and heir Gilbert, who held it until his death at Bannockburn in 1314,<sup>210</sup> when it passed to his second sister and co-heir Margaret,<sup>211</sup> who in 1317 became the wife of Hugh Audley, created Earl of Gloucester in 1337.<sup>212</sup> Their only daughter and heir Margaret brought the advowson by marriage to Ralph Lord Stafford, created Earl of Stafford in 1350,<sup>213</sup> and remained in his family until the attainder and execution of Henry Stafford Duke of Buckingham and Earl of Stafford in 1483.<sup>214</sup> It was then granted to the College of St. Mary and

St. Nicholas, Cambridge,<sup>215</sup> afterwards King's College, to which it still belongs.<sup>216</sup>

A vicarage was ordained before 1291, in which year its annual value was £5 6s. 8d.<sup>217</sup>

Gilbert Kymer, Dean of Salisbury, was rector of Fordingbridge in the 15th century, and William Barford, the scholar and divine, held the living from 1768 to 1773.<sup>218</sup>

The advowson of the church of Holy Ascension, Hyde, was transferred to the vicar in 1875,<sup>219</sup> and granted by him to Keble College, Oxford, to which it still belongs.<sup>220</sup> It is a vicarage, net yearly value £216, including 5 acres of glebe, with residence.

The Hospital of St. John in Fordingbridge was apparently founded by one of the lords of the manor of Nether Burgate before 1272, when John Rivers unsuccessfully claimed the advowson against Nicholas Bishop of Winchester.<sup>221</sup> The hospital belonged to the bishopric until granted by Cardinal Beaufort about 1445 to the Master and brethren of St. Cross,<sup>222</sup> to whom the land attached still belongs.<sup>223</sup> The ruins of the hospital are in the south of the town and on the left bank of the Avon.

There is a Roman Catholic church in the town dedicated in honour of Our Lady of the Seven Dolours and also a Friends' Meeting House, and chapels belonging to the Plymouth Brethren, the Congregationalists and Wesleyans.<sup>224</sup> The Congregationalists have another chapel at Stuckton, and there is a Primitive Methodist chapel at Sandle Heath.

Church Lands.—The parish has CHARITIES from time immemorial been possessed of parcels of land containing together about 5 acres, the rents of which, amounting to £9 a year or thereabouts, are carried to the churchwardens' accounts.

Charity of John Dodington, founded by deed dated 16 January 1638 (see under Breamore).—This parish receives £5 every fourth year, issuing out of lands called Sandy Balls, which is applicable in apprenticing a poor boy.

In 1710 Caleb Gifford by his will charged his lands in Wimborne with 30s. a year, whereof 8s. was directed to be paid to the minister of the Independent Meeting House for preaching a sermon on 30 March (the anniversary of the testator's death), and the residue in the distribution of bread.

<sup>224</sup> The Wesleyan chapel was registered for marriages on 8 May 1874 (Lon. Gaz., 2487).

The Sunday School.—In 1801 Catherine Eycott Bulkeley by deed gave to the minister and churchwardens £200 consols, the dividends to be applied towards the support of a Sunday School.

In 1865, by an award dated 17 May, a piece of land of about 1 acre, part of Sandle Heath, was allotted to the churchwardens and overseers as an allotment for the labouring poor, subject to a clear rent-charge of £1.

In 1883 Edward Sheridan, by will dated 9 August, bequeathed a legacy, now represented by £213 12s. 9d. 2½ per cent. annuities with the official trustees, the annual dividends, amounting to £5 6s. 8d., to be applied in the distribution of clothes and fuel to the poor of Roman Catholic congregations.

The cottage hospital, or nursing home, originally established in 1871, was permanently settled in 1897 with sums raised for the purpose. In 1898 a sum of £50 India 3 per cent. Stock was transferred to the official trustees to be accumulated until the expiration of the lease of the existing premises.

In 1897 Harry Frederick Withers by his will, proved at London 21 August, left £100, the interest to be applied in augmenting the salary of the minister of the Independent chapel. The legacy was invested in £101 1s. consols, producing £2 10s. 4d. yearly.

HALE

La Hale, Hales (xiii and xiv cent.); Hale near Brummore (xiv cent.); Hall (xvi cent.).

The parish of Hale contains 1,377½ acres of land, of which about 400 acres are forest land, 326 acres are pasture and 294 acres are arable land.<sup>1</sup> The soil is mixed on a subsoil of gravel, sand and clay. The small village in the north-west of the parish consists only of the rectory, Hale Farm, a few cottages and the school, built in 1873 at the expense of the late Joseph Goff, and enlarged in 1897. To the west is Hale Park, the property and residence of Lady Adelaide Henrietta Goff. It is a rectangular building of the latter part of the 18th century. The parish church is in the park to the north-west of the house. From the low banks of the River Avon, in the west of the parish, the land rises to the north-east from 108 ft. to 361 ft. above the ordnance datum.

The manor of HALE is probably represented in Domesday Book by the hide of land in Charford held of the king by Alwi son of Torber, as Ulviet had held it before the Conquest.<sup>2</sup> Alwi, who was also holding West Tytherley at the time of the Domesday Survey,<sup>3</sup> was possibly the ancestor of Richard de Cardenvill, who, at the beginning of the 13th century, was holding Hale and West Tytherley (q.v.) of the king in chief.<sup>4</sup> Richard was succeeded about 1247<sup>5</sup> by his son, Sir William Cardenvill, who died in 1254.<sup>6</sup>

A curious matrimonial question arose at the death of this William. It appears that he had lived for a year with, but was never ecclesiastically married to, a certain Joan, and had by her a son Richard, then aged twenty-four. He was afterwards 'married at the church door,' that is ecclesiastically married, to a certain Alice, and had by her several sons and daughters, of whom the eldest son, also named Richard, was then aged four years. Joan procured a judgement in the Court Christian, upholding her marriage or pre-contract, and Alice was divorced.<sup>7</sup> There was, therefore, a doubt which of the two sons or whether either of them was heir. Joan's son, however, eventually succeeded to the property,<sup>8</sup> and afterwards granted Hale to Henry Daubeney, reserving to himself and his heirs a rent of 100s.<sup>9</sup>

Henry Daubeney died seised of the manor of Hale in 1278, leaving as his heirs his sister Clarice Daubeney and Maurice de Bonham, grandson of Julia, another sister.<sup>10</sup> Hale passed before 1316 to Adam de la Forde<sup>11</sup> and Christine his wife, who in 1328 obtained licence from the king to retain the manor,<sup>12</sup> which they settled by fine on themselves.<sup>13</sup>

Adam died in 1325, leaving a son Adam,<sup>14</sup> who settled Hale on his wife Katherine in 1337.<sup>15</sup> Their only daughter, Clarice, married Sir Robert Brent of Cossington (co. Somers.), in whose family the manor remained for about two centuries. Robert and Clarice were evidently succeeded here, as in Cossington, by a son Robert and grandson John.<sup>16</sup> John, son of the latter, had a son Robert and a daughter Joan by his first wife, Ida daughter of Sir John Beauchamp, and a son John by his second wife Joan (Latimer). He was succeeded by his son Robert, on whose death without heirs in 1421 the manor passed to his sister Joan, then the wife of John Trethek.<sup>17</sup> However, it was afterwards successfully claimed against her by her step-brother John, since it had been entailed in the 14th century.<sup>18</sup> From John it passed to his son Robert, who died in 1508, leaving Ten years later Sir William Talemach and Julia his wife sold a knight's fee in Hale with the 100s. rent and the homage and services of Adam de la Forde to Thomas West (Feet of F. Hants, East. 16 Edw. III). These rights remained in the West family (ibid. East. 20 Edw. III; Inq.

a son and heir John.<sup>19</sup> The latter was succeeded in 1524 by his son William,<sup>20</sup> who died ten years later, leaving a son and heir Richard.<sup>21</sup> In 1564 Ann the only daughter of Richard,<sup>22</sup> at the age of fifteen, married Thomas Lord Paulet, second son of John Lord St. John and grandson of the Marquess of Winchester.<sup>23</sup> On the death of Thomas, who had survived his wife, in 1586-7, the manor passed<sup>24</sup> to their only child Elizabeth wife of Giles Hoby,<sup>25</sup> who, with her mother, is said to have 'sold and squandered away all the patrimony of this ancient family.'<sup>26</sup> Hale was probably sold to one of the Penruddocks, descendants of the family seated at Arkleby (co. Cumb.). Thus Robert Penruddock, who died childless in 1583, evidently had a lease of the manor and was the first of the family to settle at Hale.<sup>27</sup> It was probably purchased by his nephew, Sir John Penruddock, who died in 1600-1, leaving a son Thomas,<sup>28</sup> on whose death in 1637 the manor passed to his son John.<sup>29</sup> The latter was followed by three sons

Charles, Edward, and lastly George, whose daughter and heir Elizabeth wife of Joseph Gage of Firle (co. Suss.)<sup>30</sup> succeeded to the manor. Thomas son and heir of Joseph Gage, afterwards Lord Gage of Castlebar in Ireland,<sup>31</sup> apparently sold the manor between 1713<sup>32</sup> and 1720 to Thomas Archer, Groom Porter to Queen Anne, who at the latter date was licensed to inclose two roads in Hale between South Charford and Wood Green.<sup>33</sup> After the death of Anne, his wife, the manor passed to his nephew, Henry Archer,<sup>34</sup> second son of Andrew Archer of Umberslade (co. Warw.), who dealt with it by recovery in 1756.<sup>35</sup> By his will, proved in 1768, he left the manor to his wife, Lady Elizabeth Archer, for her life, with reversion to the younger sons of his nephew Andrew son of Thomas Lord Archer, in tail-male successively, or to the right heirs of Thomas.<sup>36</sup> Andrew, who became Lord Archer in 1768, died in 1778 without issue male,<sup>37</sup> his heirs being his three daughters Sarah, Maria and Elizabeth Anne.<sup>38</sup> His affairs seem to have been somewhat involved at the time of his death,<sup>39</sup> and it is uncertain whether Hale passed to his daughters or had been previously sold. It belonged to Joseph May in 1831,<sup>40</sup> but shortly afterwards was sold to the late Joseph Goff,<sup>41</sup> and now belongs to Lady Adelaide Henrietta Goff, the widow of his son Joseph.

Free fishing was parcel of the manor in the 17th century.<sup>43</sup>

The church of ST. MARY is small CHURCH and of cruciform plan, consisting of chancel, nave, and north and south transepts with pedimental gable ends and square-headed windows, some of which in more recent years have been divided into two segmental lights by the insertion of stone tracery. The chancel and transepts were built in 1715 by William Archer, but the nave, which was refaced at the same time, is mediæval, and has old stone benches round the north, south and west walls. The roofs are covered with tiles and on the apex of that on the north transept there is a square wooden bell-cot with a pyramidal lead roof which contains one bell. This was formerly on the west end of the nave.

The church is plastered within and roofed with panelled matchboarding. Near the west doorway stands a circular font on a square base, which is probably of ancient date, with an added band of early 17th-century ornament.

A brass on the nave floor to Sir John Penruddock, who died 8 March 1600, is engraved with a crest and four shields, his name and date of death, and the inscription 'Fui quod es quod sum eris.'

On the south wall of the south transept there is a large monument in black and white marble to Sir Thomas Archer, who died 22 March 1743, with an effigy reclining upon a sarcophagus, which is mounted upon a high pedestal with life-sized female figures on either side, one holding a skull and the other a book. On the west wall of the same transept there is a mural monument to Henry Archer, 16 March 1762.

There is one modern bell.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1583, another of 1718, a pair of patens of 1695, a flagon of 1702 and a loose flagon cover of 1725, all but the early chalice being a gift of Thomas Archer, lord of the manor.

The second, beginning in 1709, has baptisms and burials to 1777 and marriages to 1754. The third has marriages 1755 to 1799, and the fourth baptisms and burials 1777 to 1809. The fifth has marriages 1799 to 1813, and the sixth baptisms and burials 1810 to 1813.

Hale Chapel belonged to the ADVOWSON priory of Breamore from an early date, and followed the descent of Breamore Church (q.v.) until 1777,<sup>44</sup> when it was sold with South Charford Chapel to Lady Elizabeth Archer.<sup>45</sup> She left it by her will, proved 16 January 1789, to her niece Charlotte, Lady Burgoyne, widow of Major-General Sir John Burgoyne, but before 1848 it was sold to Joseph Goff,<sup>46</sup> and has followed the descent of the manor of Hale.

After the dissolution of chantries it was found that money had been left by persons unknown for the maintenance of three lamps in the chapel of Hale.<sup>47</sup>

A manorial chapel evidently existed at Hale in the early 14th century, when Adam de la Forde obtained licence to hear divine service in his manor.<sup>48</sup>

There are no endowed charities in this parish.

IBSLEY

Tibeslei (xi cent.); Ibbesleg (xiii cent.); Nibeslei, Ipsleye (xiv cent.); Hybesle (xv cent.).

The parish of Ibsley, including the hamlets of South Gorley and Furze Hill in the north and Mockbeggar and New Town in the south, contains 1,793½ acres, of which 379½ are arable land and 329 acres are permanent grass.<sup>1</sup> The high road from Fordingbridge to Ringwood forms the main street of the village, which consists of a few deeply thatched cottages picturesquely grouped near the River Avon. From the village, which is only 79 ft. above the ordnance datum, the land rises to the east, in parts of Ibsley Common reaching sometimes a height of 256 ft.

Huckles Brook and Linwood Bog, tributaries of the Avon, run through the parish. The soil is chiefly sand and gravel. The village school, built in 1874 by the late Earl of Normanton, is at South Gorley.

Ibsley House originally stood on the banks of the Avon, but was pulled down when the estate was annexed to Somerley.<sup>2</sup>

In 1086 a certain Ralph, the successor MANORS of the Saxon tenant Algar, held the manor of IBSLEY of Hugh de Port.<sup>3</sup> The overlordship descended with Basing (q.v.), being annexed to the barony of St. John.<sup>4</sup>

In 1166 Richard de 'Avene et Tibesleia' was holding two knights' fees of John de Port.<sup>5</sup> These fees were apparently divided among co-heirs, and at the beginning of the 13th century Hugh de Godshill and Giles de Hattingley were returned as holding the third part of a fee in Ibsley of Robert de St. John.<sup>6</sup> The other third was probably included in the three-quarters of a knight's fee in Avon which Alexander Huscarse then held of Robert de St. John,<sup>7</sup> since in 1280 the heir of Roger Huscarse<sup>8</sup> was holding one fee and the eighth part of a fee in Ibsley and Avon of John de St. John.<sup>9</sup> The third that had belonged to Giles de Hattingley passed by 1280 to Henry de Hach,<sup>10</sup> while that of Hugh de Godshill was held by Adam son of John atte Bere, or Abarowe, the owner also of Malshanger.<sup>11</sup> This Adam had in 1271 obtained confirmation of a grant made to him and his clerk William Rus by Peter de Linwood<sup>12</sup> of all the lands belonging to Peter and to John de Newtown in Linwood (q.v.),<sup>13</sup> with quittance of the lawing of dogs and pannage, and with herbage for their swine and beasts in the New Forest.<sup>14</sup> A further inspeximus and confirmation given in 1440<sup>15</sup> of obviously the same land and liberties substitutes Ibsley for Linwood. This is undoubtedly right, and thus the first grant also refers to Ibsley.

In 1316 the vill of Ibsley was divided among John atte Bere, who had succeeded his father Adam in 1287, Roger de Melbury, possibly a descendant of Roger Huscarse, and John de Nuthaven, probably representing Henry de Hach. The third holding had before 1346 passed to John atte Bere and William de Melbury,<sup>16</sup> so that the fee was henceforward held in two moieties. John atte Bere died in 1360, leaving as heir his son Thomas, who died childless in 1362.<sup>17</sup> His heirs were his great-nieces Maud daughter of John Punchardon, son and heir of his sister Sybil, and Joan and Christine daughters of John Ernys, son and heir of his sister Katherine.<sup>18</sup> In 1381 Maud, then the wife of John atte Pole, Joan, then the wife of Thomas Snell, and Christine, then the wife of Nicholas de Seintlowe, conveyed their manor under fine to William Earl of Salisbury and Thomas Street<sup>19</sup> for the use of the latter, who afterwards conveyed his property in Ibsley and Gorley to William Stourton of Stourton (co. Wilts.).<sup>20</sup> The latter died in 1414, and the manor passed to his son John,<sup>21</sup> who for his services in France under Henry V and Henry VI was created Lord Stourton in

STOURTON. Sable a bend or between six fountains.

The second estate in Ibsley passed on the death of Roger de Melbury in 1330 to his son William,<sup>28</sup> who in 1348 settled it on his son and heir John and Joan his wife,<sup>29</sup> from whom it passed to Sir John Berkley and Elizabeth his wife. They settled it in 1415–16 on John Haregrove and Elizabeth his wife and their heirs.<sup>30</sup> In 1428 it belonged to a certain Thomas Tame,<sup>31</sup> but by the beginning of the 16th century it had reverted to another branch of the Berkley family.<sup>32</sup> Thus in 1506 Alice widow of Edward Berkeley settled it on her son Maurice and Maud his wife.<sup>33</sup> Maurice died childless in 1513, and Ibsley passed to his nephew John son of Thomas Berkeley,<sup>34</sup> whose son, Sir William Berkeley, died in 1551, leaving a son John.<sup>35</sup> The latter in 1556 sold the manor to William Batten,<sup>36</sup> who in the following year settled it on his wife Anne.<sup>37</sup> He died in 1606, leaving a son and heir Anthony, who with his brother William was dealing with the manor in 1609.<sup>38</sup> William Batten,<sup>39</sup> possibly son of William, sold it to Jeremiah Cray in 1697.<sup>40</sup> The latter by his will dated 5 February 1709 left most of his property to his nephew John, one of the younger sons of Alexander Cray. From him it passed in 1725 to his son Jeremiah Cray,<sup>41</sup> whose son and heir, also Jeremiah, died in 1786, leaving two daughters, Sarah wife of Alexander Grant and Margaret wife of Percival Lewis.<sup>42</sup> Ibsley passed to Margaret, who after 1810<sup>43</sup> apparently sold it to Henry Combe Compton, and it thus became annexed to the other manor.

A mill, no trace of which survives, worth 10s., belonged in 1086<sup>44</sup> to the manor.

Free fishing was attached to Ibsley in the 18th century.<sup>45</sup>

The hamlet of SOUTH GORLEY<sup>46</sup> was included in and followed the descent of the de la Bere, atte Bere or Abarowe fee in Ibsley.

The church of ST. MARTIN is a CHURCH small 19th-century building of red brick throughout, and consists of continuous chancel and nave, a west gallery, an inclosed bell above the west gable and a south porch. The building is of little architectural interest. On the south internal wall is a large monument with side shafts carrying an order and broken pediment.

Under an arch are the kneeling figures of Sir John Constable, kt., 1627, and his wife. Between the figures is a carved helmet and on the wall behind is a vine-tree, from which rise the busts of their three sons and two daughters. In the spandrels of the arch are two shields, which have been repainted and are uncertain in tincture. On the top of the monument is a carved achievement. A considerable amount of colouring remains on the monument and figures and the faces are particularly good work.

There is one bell in the turret. The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten undated, but probably of late 16th-century date.

There are four books of registers. The first contains all entries from 1654 to 1676; the second has baptisms and burials from 1678 to 1791 and marriages from 1678 to 1755, with numerous briefs; the third has marriages only from 1756 to 1812, and the fourth baptisms and burials from 1784 to 1812. There are also churchwardens' accounts from 1689.

Ibsley, formerly a chapelry,<sup>47</sup> is ADVOWSON now a rectory dependent on the church and served by the vicar of Fordingbridge. There is a Congregational chapel near Mockbeggar.

In 1682 Giles Rooke by will, CHARITIES proved in the P.C.C., charged his lands and tenements with an annuity of 6s. to be distributed to 12 poor men or women about New Year's Day. The distribution is made by the overseers.

In 1828 Mrs. Mary Ann Colthurst by will bequeathed £10 a year for the poor. The legacy is represented by £333 6s. 8d. consols, now producing £8 6s. 8d. a year, which is duly applied.

ROCKBOURNE

Rochesburna (xi cent.); Rechesburna, Rochesburna (xii cent.); Rokeburn (xiii cent.); Rogborne (xvii cent.). Rockbourne contains about 3,923½ acres, of which 2,029 acres are arable land, 1,039½ acres permanent grass and 302¼ acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup>

The lowest part of the parish is along the banks of the little stream known as Sweatfords Water, which rises in Rockbourne Down and flows straight through the village by the side of the main street. The soil is sand, clay, gravel and chalk on a subsoil of chalk.

PLAN OF MANORIAL BUILDINGS AT ROCKBOURNE

Rockbourne Down, in the north-west of the parish, and Knoll Down, which extends over the borders of Damerham, are in some places over 300 ft. high.

The village consists chiefly of one street almost half a mile long. The church is in the north-east of the main street. Close to the church, adjoining the north side of the churchyard, is a very interesting group of buildings, consisting of a small L-shaped 14th-century house, now used as part of a modern farm-house, the remains of a large Elizabethan or Jacobean house a short distance to the east, a 13th-century chapel near its south-east angle, and a large 15th-century barn running northward from the chapel. The barn has two large waggon-porches, and at the north end has been divided into two stories for use as living rooms; the chapel is now used as a barn, and its most interesting feature is a north doorway with a cinquefoiled head. The buildings are doubtless manorial, the story of the existence of a leper hospital on the site being quite unfounded.<sup>2</sup> South of the village is West Park, the property of Sir Eyre Coote, which extends into South Damerham parish.

The commons in the parish were inclosed in 1802.<sup>3</sup>

He was succeeded before 1177<sup>10</sup> by a son Henry, who was living in 1189,<sup>11</sup> and whose widow Iseuld<sup>12</sup> was holding Rockbourne early in the next century.<sup>13</sup> His eldest son William died without issue c. 1220, and was succeeded by his brother John,<sup>14</sup> who died in 1241,<sup>15</sup> leaving three daughters—Margery wife of Richard de Rivers,<sup>16</sup> Ela and Isabel. Rockbourne passed to Ela, who became the wife of John de Wotton. Their son John assumed his mother's surname and succeeded his father in the manor in Crucheston and seizing his property.<sup>29</sup> Some years later he took Crucheston prisoner, torturing him 'with cords tied round his head and other torments,'<sup>29</sup> and extorting £1,150 from his friends for his release.<sup>24</sup> Robert Martin<sup>25</sup> died in 1355,<sup>26</sup> his wife surviving him until 1373, when the manor passed to her eldest son by her first husband, Sir Walter de Romsey,<sup>27</sup> who in March 1401-2 settled it<sup>28</sup> on himself and his wife Alice for life, with reversion in tail-male to their grandson Thomas son of Thomas de Romsey, and, if he died without issue male, to his brother Walter.<sup>29</sup> Sir Walter died in 1403<sup>30</sup> and Alice his widow in 1404. Thomas, their grandson and heir,<sup>31</sup> died in 1420-1, leaving an infant daughter Joan.<sup>32</sup> Rockbourne passed according to the above settlement to her uncle Walter, brother of Thomas,<sup>33</sup> but on the death of Walter son of Walter, in 1430, she inherited the manor and held it with her husband, Thomas Paync.<sup>34</sup> Her second cousin and one of her two heirs, Joan, formerly wife of Thomas Keilway<sup>35</sup> and then of Roger Wyke, daughter of Mary Bynggham, daughter of the first Sir Walter Romsey,<sup>36</sup> inherited Rockbourne, which ultimately reverted to her descendants by her first husband. However, in the meanwhile it was claimed by Joan wife of Thomas Swete as next heir of Joan Payne, being, she stated, great-granddaughter of Margaret daughter of Sir Walter Romsey. Roger Wyke and his son John on behalf of the heirs of Joan his wife successfully denied the existence of Margaret and recovered the manor in 1462,<sup>37</sup> and although five years later Edward IV granted the manor in dower to Joan Swete, then a widow,<sup>38</sup> it was held by John Keilway, descendant of Joan Wyke, on his death in 1547.<sup>39</sup> His son William succeeded him, but after this date the history of the manor is uncertain. Some documents state that William Keilway during his lifetime gave the manor to his grandson Thomas, child of his son Francis,<sup>40</sup> and in 1577 a certain Richard Hunt declared he had seen the enrolment of this conveyance.<sup>41</sup> Certainly in 1580 and 1581 Thomas was dealing with the manor as his own,<sup>42</sup> but in 1570 Francis asserted that his father had in May 1565 settled the reversion on him in tail-male,<sup>43</sup> and he died seised of the manor in 1601-2.<sup>44</sup> This discrepancy may be accounted for by the relations between Francis Keilway and his son,<sup>45</sup> who in 1591 was imprisoned in the Fleet 'for procuring and suborning certain persons to exhibit grevous complaints' against Anthony Ashley, clerk of the Privy Council,<sup>46</sup> and on obtaining his release in 1592 was found to have no money to pay the prison fees.<sup>47</sup> His father, with whom he had quarrelled, was ordered to provide for him as a 'gentleman pencioner,'<sup>48</sup> but in 1598 Thomas being 'utterlie lame and a creeple' complained that since his father had again cut off his allowance he was 'inforced to use very hard and base shiftes even for his foode and sustenance in such sorte as it is pitifull to make mencion.'<sup>49</sup> The Privy Council took the case in hand and ordered Francis to allow his son £3 weekly.<sup>50</sup> Refusing to obey, Francis for a long while ignored their letters,<sup>51</sup> but finally agreed to pay his son's debts and to allow him to 'lyve in house' with him.<sup>52</sup> Francis died in 1601-2 and Thomas succeeded<sup>53</sup> to Rockbourne, which, already heavily mortgaged to Sir Anthony Ashley,<sup>54</sup> he sold in 1608 to Sir Anthony's son-in-law, Sir John Cooper.<sup>55</sup> No sooner had this sale been effected than it was found that Francis had in 1574 settled the contingent remainder of the manor after himself and his heirs male on his brothers Ambrose and Edward, and that the latter 'of an ill intent' to prevent the sale of the manor had granted his interest in it to Queen Elizabeth in 1594.<sup>56</sup> James I, however, 'not myndinge to favour such fraudulent conveyances,' gave up all 'remainder and interest' in the same in 1608.<sup>57</sup> Sir John Cooper was succeeded by his eldest son Anthony Ashley Cooper, created Earl of Shaftesbury in 1672,<sup>58</sup> and the manor has descended with the title to Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, the ninth and present Earl of Shaftesbury.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

There were two parks in Rockbourne in PARKS 1307 containing 100 acres of large oaks and underwood worth 13s. 4d. yearly.<sup>59</sup>

In the early 14th century, when, during the minority of John Bisset, the Bishop of Bath and Wells had the manor in custody, he complained that his park had been broken into, his deer hunted and his rabbits taken with 'ferrets' nets and other engines.<sup>60</sup> In the reign of Edward VI East Park still belonged to the lord of the manor, who brought two suits for poaching against his tenants of Rockbourne.<sup>61</sup> In 1628 the other—West Park—belonged to Sir George Marshall and others, who in that year were paid £250 for keeping the king's race-horses in West Park and Cole Park.<sup>62</sup> It was purchased in 1762 by Sir Eyre Coote, the famous Indian General, and passed like South Damerham (q.v.) to the present Sir Eyre Coote.<sup>63</sup>

ROCKSTEAD (Rochesire, xi cent.; Rokkeseye, xiv cent.; Rocksted or Rocksythe, xvi cent.), which Aldwin held before the Conquest, belonged to Hugh de Port in 1086,<sup>64</sup> and to the St. John barony as late as 1349.<sup>65</sup> Probably the Testa de Nevill

After this date it followed the descent of Rockbourne<sup>77</sup> (q.v.) and became merged in that manor, its name only surviving in Rockstead Farm.

The church of ST. ANDREW con-
CHURCH sists of a chancel with south-west chapel, nave, north transept, south aisle, bellturret over west end of the aisle and south porch.

The earliest building for which architectural evidence exists consisted of an aisleless cruciform 12th-century church, the nave being of the same plan as at present, but with a smaller chancel. In the 13th century the south aisle was added and in the 15th century the chancel was rebuilt and enlarged, the chancel arch inserted, the south transept thrown into the south aisle, and a small chapel added to the east of it with an arch opening into the chancel. The south porch dates from 1893, the church having been restored in that year. The site falls steeply west-wards, and the interior of the church is very picturesque from the number of steps to the chancel and altar. The wood fittings are also very well arranged, with low screens at the top of the steps to the chancel, south chapel, and the quire, which takes 'Fokeseya,' held by William de la Falaise of Robert de St. John,<sup>66</sup> is a mistake for Rokeseya, which was thus apparently granted to the priory of Breamore by some member of the Falaise family. Whoever the donor, Rockstead had passed to Breamore Priory before 1291.<sup>67</sup> It belonged to the priory at the Dissolution and was granted with its other possessions to Henry Marquess of Exeter and Gertrude his wife in November 1536.<sup>68</sup> Escheating to the Crown on the attainder of the marquess in 1539, it was granted to Anne of Cleves,<sup>69</sup> but in 1548 passed to Sir Thomas Henneage and William Lord Willoughby,<sup>70</sup> who in the following year sold it to William Keilway.<sup>71</sup> up the east bay of the nave.

Parts of the woodwork are of 18th-century date, of good and simple patterns, and the rest is copied from them. At the west end of the south aisle is a painted board of the royal arms, dated 1678.

The east window of the chancel is modern, of five lights, with tracery of 15th-century style. In the south wall is a modern three-light window of the same character, but the north wall has no openings and is covered with white marble monuments of the Coote family.
A four-centred arch of two continuous chamfered orders opens to the south chapel. The chancel arch is also four-centred with two chamfered orders dying into the jambs. The only remaining piece of 12th-century detail is the narrow, round-headed arch of one square order, with chamfered abaci, which leads into the north transept, its voussoirs being alternately of green and white stone. The transept has evidently been a good deal patched, but seems to preserve its original plan. The east window is of two trefoiled lights under a square head, probably late 14th-century work, and the wall over it has been patched with red tiles set in herring-bone pattern.

In the north wall is a wide splayed lancet with external rebate, much modernized, but probably of 14th-century date originally, and in the west wall is a similar window which appears to be modern.

West of the transept a wide 15th-century window of three trefoiled lights has been inserted, the transept wall being cut away to allow the window to be set as far to the east as possible. A second window of the same type occurs to the west of the north door, which has a cinquefoiled head of 13th-century date corresponding to one in the farm buildings below the church. The south arcade is of four bays, the eastern bay being of 15th-century date, distinct from the others, and with a wide four-centred arch and plainly moulded capitals. The three western bays are 13th-century work, probably c. 1230, and have octagonal piers, moulded capitals and bases, and arches of two chamfered orders, built in green sandstone. One of the capitals is, however, cut from a block of ironstone. In the west wall of the nave are the work, reset at a considerably later date. In the south aisle are 13th-century lancets at the west and south-west, the latter modern externally, and two 15th-century windows, the earlier of which is of three trefoiled lights under a square head, retaining three fragments of original glass, one bearing the Maria monogram in gold and white glass.

In the other window, which has two cinquefoiled lights with a quatrefoil in the head, is the head of our Lord in similar glass. The south doorway is plain 13th-century work with two continuous chamfered orders and pointed head, the outer vertical boarding of an old door being fixed to a modern frame. Inside the door to the east is the head of a holy water recess. The chancel roof is modern, of the same type as that of the nave, which is probably of 16th-century date, though much repaired. It has a plastered wagon-headed ceiling panelled with moulded ribs lower courses of the jambs of a late 12th-century doorway, from which a flight of steps led up to the level of the nave floor. Its head has been destroyed by the insertion of a window above, which in its turn has been much altered and raised and now has modern three-light tracery in the jambs and an arch of re-used 13th-century detail. Below its present sill are three blocked lights continuing the lines of the window, and the font is now set at the west end of the nave in the space formerly occupied by the steps leading up from the old west door.

The south chapel has a 15th-century east window of two trefoiled lights with a quatrefoil in the head. In the south wall is a pointed piscina recess with hollow-chamfered jambs and head, apparently 14th-century work re-used. It has a stone shelf. West of it is a window of two trefoiled lights under a rounded head, the tracery being probably also 14th-century having carved bosses at the intersections. The plates are moulded, with an embattled cresting which is nearly all modern, and two modern tie-beams have been inserted.

The aisle roof is nearly flat and has moulded principals and rafters. The transept roof is old with trussed rafters, and in the transept, which is used as a vestry, is a good 17th-century altar table. The upper entrance to the rood-loft remains at the south-west of the nave, and the east splay of the north-east nave window is cut back for the fitting of a parclose screen. The font is octagonal, probably dating from the 15th century, and has a modern base.

The tower contains three bells and a 'ting-tang.' The last is inscribed in Roman capitals:

'WARD SEYMOVR SQ OF WOODLED'
'IN THE COVNTY OF DORS 1718 WT.'

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The treble is inscribed 'In God Triomp I W 1617,' and the second 'O prays the Lord I W 1617.' The third was recast by Mears & Stainbank in 1893. The treble and second are by John Wallis of Salisbury.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1692 and a paten of 1861.

The registers are contained in six books. The first, which is a parchment transcript of 1601, contains baptisms and burials from 1561 to 1652 and marriages from 1561 to 1647. The second and third have all entries from 1653 to 1672, and from 1673 to 1713 respectively. The fourth has all entries from 1714 to 1778, with a gap between 1747 and 1770 and only a few entries from 1771 to 1778. The fifth has marriages only from 1778 to 1812, and the sixth baptisms and burials from 1779 to 1812. There are also churchwardens' and overseers' accounts.

In the 12th century Manser ADVOWSON Bisset granted the church of Rockbourne to the Prior of Maiden Bradley<sup>73</sup> (co. Wilts.), who made an agreement with the Prior and canons of Breamore, by which the latter were to hold the advowson of Rockbourne for the yearly payment of 100s. to Maiden Bradley.<sup>74</sup>

Henry de Blois, Bishop of Winchester (1129-71), with the assent of Manser Bisset, confirmed the appropriation of the church to Breamore, and assigned a pension of 2s. to Crispin the priest.<sup>75</sup> The church belonged to Breamore at the time of the Dissolution, and followed practically the same descent as the advowson of Breamore<sup>76</sup> (q.v.) until both were sold to Henry Longden in 1777.<sup>77</sup> Rockbourne was purchased in 1822<sup>78</sup> by the trustees of Rev. W. J. Yonge, who three years later sold it to Sir (then Mr.) Eyre Coote of West Park.<sup>79</sup> It continued in his family until 29 September 1881, when it was sold to the present owner, Mr. A. N. Radcliffe, and Mr. Robert Vernon Somers-Smith.<sup>80</sup>

The rectorial tithe followed the same descent as the advowson until 1685, in which year Anne Lady Brooke settled it in trust for the rectors of the parish.<sup>81</sup>

In 1824 the Rev. Henry Longden, CHARITIES by his will proved in the P.C.C., devised land for the instruction of six poor girls in singing the psalms in church, such donation to be inscribed on a tablet in the church. The devise was inoperative as being void in mortmain.

The Yonge Charity, founded by the Misses Yonge by deed of 25 March 1899, is regulated by a scheme of the Charity Commissioners of 9 June 1903. The endowment consists of £166 13s. 4d. Natal 3 per cent. Stock with the official trustees, the dividends to be applied for the benefit of poor deserving persons in money gifts and in coals.

SOUTH DAMERHAM

Domraham (ix cent.); Domerham, Domarhame (x cent.); Dobreham (xi cent.); Dumbreham, Dumerham (xii cent.); Damerham, Damerham South (xvii cent.).

The parish of South Damerham was transferred in 1895 from Wiltshire to Hampshire,<sup>1</sup> and is locally situated in the hundred of Fordingbridge. It contains 3 acres of land covered with water and 4,680 acres of land, of which 2,102 acres are arable, 1,346½ are permanent grass and 904¾ are woodland.<sup>2</sup> The land rises generally east and west from the valley of the Allen River from 100 ft. to 200 ft. in the east and from 100 ft. to 300 ft., even 400 ft. in the west, above the ordnance datum.

The village, set in the valley of the Allen River, is divided into five districts: North End, East End, Damerham Parva, South End, and the Marsh. The church of St. George is on the left bank of the Allen River, and near it are the remains of the Manor Court and an old tithe barn. About a fourth of the village was burnt down in 1863, but the damage was soon repaired owing to the exertions of the Rev. W. Owen, then vicar.

The soil and subsoil are gravel, clay and chalk, and the chief crops are cereals. The parish, except for Lopshill Common in the south, was inclosed in 1817-18.<sup>3</sup>

Place-names which occur in connexion with South Damerham are:—Penningford, Butelesheite, Shirefunte, Crofta Dieu (xiii cent.),<sup>4</sup> Eyresmede next Elingforde<sup>5</sup> (xiv cent.), Kyngesbarghe, Grenewayes-crosse, Stony Crosse, Crokydeaysshe, Lyffordes Crosse, Mynstrelstrete, Caningmersshe, Merlynputtes and Meershegge<sup>6</sup> (xvi cent.).

Adam de Domerham, the author of Historia de Rebus gestis Glastoniensibus, was a native of South Damerham. It is believed that he became a monk at Glastonbury in the time of Abbot Michael (1235-52).<sup>7</sup>

The manor of SOUTH DAMERMANORS HAM (the capital manor of South Damerham Hundred<sup>8</sup>) was originally an ancient demesne of the Saxon kings and was mentioned in the will of King Alfred of Wessex (880-5), who desired that his men of Damerham should in future be free.<sup>9</sup> In 940-6 King Edmund made a life grant of a hundred mansae at Damerham with Martin and Pentridge (co. Dors.) to his queen, Athelfleda, daughter of the alderman Alfgar, on condition that she should demise the same to the church of Glastonbury.<sup>10</sup> Accordingly Athelfleda in her will bequeathed Damerham to Glastonbury Abbey for the health of the soul of King Edmund, who had died in 946,<sup>11</sup> and of her own.<sup>12</sup> In 1086 the church of Glastonbury held the manor, which in the time of Edward the Confessor had been assessed at 52 hides. Of these Serlo held 5 hides,<sup>13</sup> the wife of Hugh held 3 hides and Roger held 1 hide and 8 acres, which could not be separated from the church.<sup>14</sup> With the exception of certain usual alienations of parts of the manor made by one abbot only to be recovered by another,<sup>15</sup> the manor, free warren in which was granted in 1330,<sup>16</sup> remained with the abbey until the Dissolution.<sup>17</sup> It then passed to the Crown, and in 1540 the king leased part of the demesne land and certain farms belonging to the manor for twenty-one years to Richard Snell, on his surrender of another lease of the same held from the abbot.<sup>18</sup> These premises were in 1608 granted to Robert Earl of Salisbury and remained with his descendants.<sup>19</sup>

<sup>8</sup> In 1266 the Bishop of Bath and Wells agreed to return royal writs concerning the liberties of the abbey in lands which he held of the abbey in Damerham (Cal. Wells D. and C. MSS. [Hist. MSS. Com.], i, 312).

In 1544 Henry VIII<sup>20</sup> granted the manor of South Damerham to his sixth wife, Katherine Parr, but, passing back to the Crown on her death in 1548, it was granted in 1551-2<sup>21</sup> to John Duke of Northumberland and Earl of Warwick, who held it until his execution in 1553,<sup>22</sup> when it once more escheated to the Crown.<sup>23</sup> In 1575 Elizabeth granted it to Edward Bishop of Salisbury, and, except for the temporary sale by the Parliamentary trustees to Sir William Litton in 1649,<sup>24</sup> it remained in the possession of successive bishops till 1863. It was then sold to the Coote family, who had held it by lease from the Bishops of Salisbury from 1810,<sup>25</sup> and now belongs to Sir Eyre Coote of West Park.

In 1830 the manor-house of South Damerham (West Park House) was attacked by the rioters against the introduction of machinery and several prisoners were secured and sent to Winchester.<sup>26</sup>

Damerham Park is mentioned in 1226-7<sup>27</sup> and in 1283, and at the latter date it contained deer.<sup>28</sup> Various quitclaims to rights of pasture made in the earlier part of the 13th century by several of the abbot's tenants probably indicate extensions of the park.<sup>29</sup> Thus in 1324 and 1329 respectively William de Buttlesgate and William Gerberd surrendered pasture in Haywood which the abbot was about to impark.<sup>30</sup> In 1518 the park, which contained 125 acres of wood, was divided into three coppices, Edmundshay, Middle Coppis, and Drakenorth Coppis.<sup>31</sup> It was apparently disbarked before 1540.

In 1246 the boundaries between the manor of Damerham and the Abbot of Tewkesbury's manor of Boworth in Dorset were inspected. They began at Butelesheite, passed in a straight line along old ditch,

The survey is still in excellent preservation in the muniment room at Wilton House (Wilts. Arch. Mag. xxxii, 292). Henry Earl of Pembroke, son and successor of William, died in 1601 seized of lands at Damerham, Bousbury and Martin, which were said to have been purchased of the Duke of Northumberland (Chan. Inq. p.m. [Ser. 2], cclxiv, 181), and in 1606-7 'the manors' of Damerham and Martin were conveyed by William Earl of Pembroke to Laurence Hyde and others (Feet of F. Div. Co. Trin. 4 Jas. I).

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

in Boworth, as far as a tree called 'le hiis,' through the middle of Kenteliscombe to the croft of William Schortefrende of Overton, from the corner of that croft to the great highway and along it to the great ditch called Blakedounes diche.<sup>32</sup>

The 3 hides of land in the manor of Damerham held in 1086 by the wife of Hugh<sup>33</sup> probably represented the manor of LITTLE DAMERHAM, held in the middle of the 13th century for the service of one knight's fee under the Abbot of Glastonbury by Alvred de Lincoln or de Nichole.<sup>34</sup> Alvred died in 1264, leaving three co-heirs,<sup>35</sup> to one of whom, his nephew Robert Fitz Pain, Little Damerham passed. A son and in 1335-6 a grandson of the same name held the manor,<sup>36</sup> but on the death of the latter in 1354-5<sup>37</sup> it evidently reverted to the Abbot of Glastonbury.

About 1240 the fee was held by John de St. Quintin under Alured,<sup>38</sup> but before the end of the century this intermediate lordship had passed to the St. Martin family and it was held by knight service by Reginald de St. Martin in 1297<sup>39</sup> and in 1300.<sup>40</sup> It passed from him to Lawrence de St. Martin, who died about 1385-6, leaving co-heirs, Thomas Calstone grandson of his sister Joan, and Henry Popham son of Sibil, a second sister of Lawrence.<sup>41</sup> The fee was apparently divided between them, for the portion held by the Servingtons (see infra) was held of the Pophams till 1456,<sup>42</sup> while the part held by the Horseys (see infra) was held of the Darells, descendants of the Calstones, till about the same date,<sup>43</sup> when both mesne lordships, like that of the Fitz Pains, lapsed to the Abbots of Glastonbury,<sup>44</sup> and the manor was held of the abbey until 1521.<sup>45</sup>

Under these lords the manor was held in the middle of the 13th century by Peter de la Mare.<sup>46</sup> It passed from him through a certain Margery, possibly his daughter, to Hugh Peverel, after whose death, about 1296,<sup>47</sup> the manor remained with Margery. However, she evidently died soon, since Thomas Peverel of Sampford Peverell, probably her son, died seised of the manor in 1300, leaving three sisters, Margery, Joan and Dionisia, his co-heirs.<sup>48</sup> Joan, to whom the manor fell, married Sir John de Wroxhale, who alienated half the manor to the Bissets of Combe Bisset.<sup>49</sup> The other half, as part of the inheritance of Joan, who had died before her husband, passed to Maud, her only daughter and heir.<sup>50</sup>

died in 1374-5, and her half of the manor passed to her daughter Edith wife of Oliver Servington.<sup>51</sup> The latter died in 1419 seised of a messuage and a carucate of land in Little Damerham, which passed to his son and heir Oliver,<sup>52</sup> who on his death without issue in 1420-1 was succeeded by his brother David.<sup>53</sup> David was followed in 1456<sup>54</sup> by a son Edward and Edward in 1486 by a son Walter,<sup>55</sup> who died in 1510, leaving a son William.<sup>56</sup> Eleven years later William died, leaving a son Nicholas, then a minor,<sup>57</sup> who in turn was succeeded in 1554 by a son John,<sup>58</sup> by whom the manor was conveyed in 1564 to John Hawles.<sup>59</sup> The manor was subsequently bought by the trustees of Sir John Cooper.<sup>60</sup>

Meanwhile the half of the manor held by the Bissets, namely, a messuage and land at Stapleham, passed on the death of John Bisset in 1306-7 to his infant son John,<sup>61</sup> who died in 1334-5, leaving a sister and heir Margaret, formerly wife of Walter Romsey and then wife of Robert Martin.<sup>62</sup> She and her husband granted the reversion of a messuage, land and rent in Damerham, then held by Emma wife of John Bisset in dower, to John de Hymerford for life in 1341-2.<sup>63</sup> However, before her death Margaret apparently settled the estate on her son by her first husband, Sir Walter Romsey,<sup>64</sup> who in 1350-1 settled it upon himself and his wife Joan, with remainder to her children by a former husband, Thomas, Cecily and Maud Northlode, in tail.<sup>65</sup> Accordingly a moiety of the estate passed to Thomas and from him to his son John Northlode, but since both he and his aunts Cecily and Maud died without issue it reverted to Joan wife of Thomas Payne, great-granddaughter of Sir Walter Romsey by his second wife Alice Fylloll.<sup>66</sup>

The moiety which Sir Walter Romsey had retained he released to his son Thomas in 1393, and it descended, like Romsey Horseys and Rockbourne (q.v.), to the above Joan wife of Thomas Payne,<sup>67</sup> who thus held the whole estate. She died without issue before 1447-8, leaving as heirs her two second cousins, to one of whom, William Horsey son of Eleanor, daughter of Mary Byngham, sister of Sir Walter Romsey,<sup>68</sup> the estate in Little Damerham was assigned. He died in 1448, leaving a son Thomas, a minor,<sup>69</sup> who came of age in 1462-3<sup>70</sup> and died in 1477, leaving John his brother and heir.<sup>71</sup> A John Horsey, possibly a son of the latter, died in 1546, when the manor passed to his son William.<sup>72</sup> Bartholomew,<sup>73</sup> who succeeded his father William, settled the manor in 1590 on his son Thomas and Dorothy his wife,<sup>74</sup> who conveyed the manor in 1624-5 to Richard Yardley and William Smith.<sup>75</sup> This estate was apparently bought, like the Servington moiety (q.v. supra), by the trustees of Sir John Cooper, and the whole manor of Little Damerham passed to his son Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, created Earl of Shaftesbury in 1672.<sup>76</sup> From that time the manor descended with the title of Earl of Shaftesbury<sup>77</sup> until 1860, when it was bought by John Silley,<sup>78</sup> who changed his name in 1867 to Egremont.<sup>79</sup> He died in 1883, leaving the property in Damerham to his son James Egremont Egremont, on whose death in 1888 the estate passed to his widow, the present owner, now the wife of Mr. W. Wallis.<sup>80</sup>

The manor of HYDE belonged to the Abbot of Glastonbury,<sup>81</sup> and was possibly the hide and 8 acres of land held of the abbey by Roger in 1086.<sup>82</sup> William Fitz John did homage for the manor, holding it as a quarter of a knight's fee<sup>83</sup> in 1189,<sup>84</sup> and on his death in 1232 he was succeeded by his grandson Robert de Gurnay,<sup>85</sup> whose grandson John died in 1290-1, leaving an heir Elizabeth wife of John ap Adam.<sup>86</sup> Thomas, son of the latter, succeeded after 1305,<sup>87</sup> but, as he died without issue,<sup>88</sup> the lordship lapsed to the Abbot of Glastonbury.

The history of the sub-tenants is not very clear. Elias de la Hyde held the manor in the middle of the 13th century,<sup>89</sup> and in 1274-5 John de la Hyde was said by right to hold a tenement at La Hyde by escheat of a certain Adam Barringe, who, having held it of him, had died without heirs. The tenement had, however, been seized in 1272-3 by the Earl of Gloucester's foresters of Cranborne (co. Dors.), and given to a certain Nicholas de Scordich, who sold it to the Prior of Cranborne.<sup>90</sup> This was probably due to some rights of overlordship claimed as owners of Cranborne Chase by the Earls of Gloucester<sup>91</sup> in the estate which the Prior of Cranborne already held in Hyde, assessed at 1 hide in 1086,<sup>92</sup> and probably identical with the land called Maloxdene.<sup>93</sup>

Probably John de la Hyde did not recover his tenement, for in 1428 the Prior of Cranborne held not only an eighth of a fee in La Hyde, but also another eighth of a fee jointly with the heirs of Isabel de Merton, Roger de Bradoneston and William de Butlesgate,<sup>94</sup> William Blundell and John Hannerford.<sup>95</sup> This, known as the manor of Hyde, from which a payment was due to Glastonbury,<sup>96</sup> remained to the Priory of Cranborne till the Dissolution. The farm of Hyde was granted in 1559-60, as a late possession of the monastery of Tewkesbury, to which Cranborne was a cell, to Robert Freke,<sup>97</sup> and it afterwards passed to Robert Earl of Salisbury, who held it at the time of his death in 1612.<sup>98</sup> It was demised by the Earl of Salisbury in 1642 to Sir William Litton and Roger Hill for three lives.<sup>99</sup> From this date it was merged in the manor of South Damerham. Hyde Farm and Hyde Cross still exist near Lopshill.

A hide of land at STAPLEHAM was held by knight service of the Abbot of Tewkesbury as lord of the manor of Up Wimborne in Dorset and in 1430 this hide was held of the abbot by John Northlode of Martin.<sup>100</sup> In 1518 the heirs of William de Merton held of the Abbot of Tewkesbury part of the abbot's 5 virgates at La Hyde and Stapleham.<sup>101</sup> At the Dissolution this was returned as a rent of assize of 15s. due to the abbey from John Horsley for a tenement at Stapleham.<sup>102</sup>

The Abbot of Glastonbury also had tenants at Stapleham and Bousbury, and in 1297 William Knight of Lovecote granted the abbot's tenants at Stapleham and Bousbury common of pasture in a moor called Le Howe, west of his tenement at Lovecote, in exchange for licence to inclose the moor called La Oldelond.<sup>103</sup> Certain tithes and demesne land in Stapleham were granted with the manor of Damerham to the Bishop of Salisbury in 1575,<sup>104</sup> and the farm of Bousbury was leased with the site of the manor of South Damerham in 1540 for twenty-one years to Richard Snell.<sup>105</sup> This farm was granted in 1608 to Robert Earl of Salisbury,<sup>106</sup> and was leased by his son and successor William in 1642 to Sir William Litton and Roger Hill for three lives,<sup>107</sup> and from that time was merged in the manor of South Damerham (q.v.). It still exists as Bousbury Farm.

The hide at LOPSHILL (Lopushale, x cent.; Logeshale, xiii cent.; Loppeshale, xiv and xv cent.; Lopsale, xvi cent.) occurs in the boundaries of the manor of South Damerham in 940-6,<sup>108</sup> and was probably identical with the hide in the manor of Damerham which was given by Herlwin Abbot of Glastonbury (1102) with the manor of Ower in Eling to Sir Robert Cotel.<sup>109</sup> The overlordship passed in the same way as that of Ower (q.v.) to the Bishops of Bath.<sup>110</sup> The manor apparently passed in the family of Cotel in the same way as Ower, and was held in 1274-5 by Elias Cotel.<sup>111</sup> Its descent is then lost until 1428, when the heir of Richard de la Rivere, the Prior of Cranborne, and the heir of Henry atte Solere held a fourth of a knight's fee at

Lopshill.<sup>112</sup> The Earls of Gloucester also claimed rent from tenants at Lopshill.<sup>113</sup>

In 1518 Thomas son and heir of Hugh Moleux held 2 virgates at Lopshill which had belonged to William Solar and William Cowle, and before that to Richard de Pytteney and John Hoke.<sup>114</sup> Lopshill Farm, in the south of the parish, was purchased by the Cootes about 1810, and is now in the possession of Sir Eyre Coote, lord of South Damerham.<sup>115</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey there were four mills at Damerham.<sup>116</sup> One formerly held by Richard Fitz Martin was given to Geoffrey Fitz Ellis by John Abbot of Glastonbury (1274-90),<sup>117</sup> and passed to Richard son of Robert de Horstede, who sold it to Robert de Newburgh.<sup>118</sup> In 1330 the latter undertook to pay the abbot all rents and other dues which Richard had undertaken to pay,<sup>119</sup> and in 1330-1 he and his wife Margaret granted a messuage, some land and a mill in Damerham to Richard de Horsithe for life, with reversion to Robert and Margaret.<sup>120</sup>

In 1326 Henry Dotenel released to the Abbot of Glastonbury all his claim in a water-mill called Weremulle in Damerham.<sup>121</sup> In the survey of the manor taken in 1518 a water-mill called 'Lytellmyle' is mentioned.<sup>121</sup> This mill probably stood near Littlemill Bridge at North End, but it has now disappeared. In 1540 a water-mill was leased with the manor to Richard Snell,<sup>123</sup> and 'all the water-mills of Damerham' were granted in 1608 to Robert Earl of Salisbury.<sup>124</sup> Half a mill was annexed at the end of the 13th century to the manor of Little Damerham,<sup>125</sup> but it is not mentioned after 1300. The only mill now in existence in the parish is Damerham Mill in the village on the Allen River.

The church of ST. GEORGE is a CHURCH very interesting but ill-kept building, so smothered in ivy that much of its detail is hidden. It consists of a chancel, to which was formerly attached a north chapel of two bays, a nave with north and south aisles, a large, unfinished tower at the south-east of the nave, and a south porch.

The lower part of the tower seems to be the oldest part of the church and dates from c. 1130, and there was probably an aisleless nave of this date equal in width to the present nave. A north transept balancing the tower may also have existed. A north aisle was added later in the 12th century, and in the 13th the chancel was perhaps rebuilt and a south aisle added to the nave. The north chapel seems to have been of this date, c. 1230, and the tower was nearly rebuilt at this time. The 12th-century north aisle and transept, together with the north chapel, were probably pulled down in the 15th century and the existing aisle substituted, while the chapel was not rebuilt. The south porch dates from the latter part of the 15th century, and since its building no additions have been made to the plan of the church, but the north arcade has been rebuilt on new pillars in the 18th century or later.

The chancel is lighted by five three-light windows, one at the east and two each on the north and south, which have a superficial resemblance to 15th-century work, but in their unskilful and ignorant detail betray a later and probably 17th-century origin. Their labels, on the other hand, seem to be of good late 13th-century section, except in the case of the south-west window and the west half of that at the north-east. Between the two north windows, on the outer face of the wall, part of a moulded 13th-century arch is to be seen, and the base of the east respond of this arch and that of the west respond of a second arch adjoining it on the west are also visible and have typical 13th-century mouldings. The blocked and partly destroyed arcade to which they belonged was of two bays, but its middle column was apparently taken down when the arcade was blocked. There is a south doorway to the chancel between the two south windows, but its details are smothered in ivy.

The nave has a north arcade of three bays, with a length of unpierced walling to the west. The west respond of the arcade is a half-round column of 12th-century character, c. 1160, with a chamfered abacus ornamented with a line of billets and the arches of the two west bays are of the same date, semicircular and of two orders with roll mouldings. The arch in the east bay is of a different type and obviously later, though from its rough character and the fact that it, with the other two, has been reset, its date is doubtful. The east respond has had three engaged shafts, but is much mutilated; it has at the springing square-edged 12th-century abaci which have been a good deal cut away. The two pillars of the arcade are of classic type with plain round shafts and octagonal abaci in Portland stone, and are probably of 18th-century date. At the south-east of the nave is the tower, with a semicircular arch of two square orders opening to it; the voussoirs of the arch are alternately in ironstone and green sandstone, with a very good effect, and at the springing is a chamfered string enriched with a lozenge ornament. In the west wall of the tower, but at a higher level, is a smaller arch, now blocked, of the same character but in a single order; as far as can be seen it appears to be a doorway and not a window, and must have opened to some building west of the tower of which no other trace now exists. The walling of the tower in its lower parts seems to be also of 12th-century date, a good deal of ashlar showing the diagonal tooling, but the pairs of large angle buttresses and those in the middle of the east and south sides are 13th-century additions. The tower seems to have been in great measure rebuilt at this time, and has large lancets of this date in its east and south walls, but the work was evidently left incomplete and a small wooden building set on the top, and of much smaller diameter, serves as a belfry. High in the west wall a two-light 14th-century window exists, but the ubiquitous ivy hides any other architectural details which may remain. The rood loft was entered by a stair in the north-east corner of the tower, and the upper doorway of 15th-century date is still perfect.

The south arcade of the nave is of two bays with tall pointed arches of two chamfered orders and an undercut string at the springing of 13th-century character, and the arch opening from the tower to the south aisle is also of this date, with continuous chamfered orders. The south wall of the aisle is probably of the 13th century, but the only window which it contains, set between the tower and the porch, is 15th-century work of two cinquefoiled lights, now blocked with masonry. The north aisle seems entirely of 15th-century date, and has a blocked north doorway between two windows, each of two cinquefoiled lights, and an east window of two trefoiled lights. If the last is in its original position it goes to show that the north chapel must have been pulled down before this date. At the west end of both aisles is a square-headed two-light window of 18th-century date, and in the west wall of the nave a very large and ugly window of five cinquefoiled lights with tracery over in 15th-century style, now glazed with opaque plate-glass, cracked in all directions by unskilful and too rigid fixing to the mullions. The south porch has a moulded outer arch, c. 1500, and over it a defaced 12th-century carving of a Majesty in a vesica-shaped frame, seated on a rainbow. The ceilings of chancel, nave and porch are of 15th or early 16th-century date, of barrel shape, plastered and divided into panels by small moulded wooden ribs with carved bosses at the intersections. On one of these in the nave is the I.H.S. monogram crowned, but the porch roof, with its embattled and carved plate, is the most interesting part of the woodwork. The roofs are red-tiled, much overgrown with moss, and on the east end of the nave is the base of a large gable cross, which when perfect must have been a very fine example. It has a small gablet on each face, with the head of a beast at the four angles. The font is modern, octagonal with sunk quatrefoils in the sides, and the other fittings of the church are of small interest.

There are five bells, the treble, third and tenor cast in 1666, with inscriptions referring to the calamities of the time on the two latter. One has, 'Our three became five when few els did thrive,' and the tenor, 'I was cast in the yeere of plague, warre and fire.' The second bell is by Wells of Aldbourne, 1803, and the fourth by William Cockey, 1739.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten cover of 1577, a paten of 1719, a flagon of 1755 given by John Nourse, vicar of South Damerham, in 1754.

There are five books of registers. The first has all entries from 1678 to 1753; the second all entries from 1753 to 1788; the third marriages from 1755 to 1793; the fourth marriages from 1793 to 1812; the fifth baptisms and burials from 1795 to 1812.

The advowson of Damerham ADVOWSON belonged until the Dissolution to the Abbots of Glastonbury,<sup>136</sup> and in 1255 was appropriated to the abbot and convent,<sup>137</sup> who on the death or resignation of the then rector appointed a vicar, John Burnel, to whom in 1270 Walter Bishop of Salisbury confirmed the houses and manse which had formerly belonged to the rectory.<sup>138</sup> After the Dissolution the advowson was granted in 1551-2 to John Duke of Northumberland,<sup>139</sup> and was apparently bought from him before his attainder in 1553 by William Earl of Pembroke, who presented to the vicarage in 1554.<sup>140</sup> It remained with the Earls of Pembroke till about 1608,<sup>141</sup> but was granted in that year by the Crown to Robert Earl of Salisbury,<sup>142</sup> with whose descendants it remained till about 1674.<sup>143</sup> The Dukes of Newcastle presented from 1698<sup>144</sup> till 1849, when the patronage passed to the Earl of Chichester.<sup>145</sup> He gave or sold the advowson to Hyndman's trustees, in whom it is still vested.

The tithes of corn and hay belonging to the rectory of Damerham were leased in 1540 for twenty-one years to Nicholas Snell on the surrender by him of a lease of the same granted to him by the Abbot of Glastonbury.<sup>146</sup> The rectory was granted in 1544 to Katherine Parr, consort of Henry VIII,<sup>147</sup> and was leased in 1569-70 for twenty-one years to John Stokeman,<sup>148</sup> to whom a further lease for twenty-one years was made in 1572-3.<sup>149</sup> The rectory and church and all tithes in Damerham and Stapleham were granted in 1579-80 to Anthony Ashley.<sup>150</sup> From that date the rectory has followed the descent of the manor of Rockbourne (q.v.).

The house of Mary Harris at Damerham was licensed in 1672 for Presbyterian worship.<sup>151</sup> There are now Primitive Methodist, Baptist and Congregational chapels in the parish. The Baptist church was founded in 1828.<sup>152</sup>

There are no endowed charities in this parish.

MARTIN

Mertone (x cent.); Meretun (xii cent.); Mertoun (xiii cent.); Martin (xiv cent.).

Martin is a large parish formerly in the hundred of South Damerham (co. Wilts.), but transferred to Hampshire in 1895.<sup>1</sup> Together with the lately constituted parish of Toyd's Farm and Allenford<sup>2</sup> (647 acres) it covers an area of 5,213 acres, of which 3,095½ acres are arable land, 1,719¾ acres permanent grass and only 132½ acres woodland.<sup>3</sup>

The village street runs north-west and south-east, connecting the high roads to Wimborne Minster and Blandford. In the village, which is on low ground in the south-east of the parish, the ancient market cross stands near Sweetapples Farm. In East Martin, a hamlet east of the village, is Bustard Manor Farm, which belonged in 1835 to Mr. Phelps.<sup>4</sup> It was purchased about 1889 by Mr. Bentinck from a Mr. Topp, and was sold in 1901 to the Cistercian Fathers of our Lady of Paradise. The Allen River rises near Bustard Farm and flows south through the hamlet of Tidpit.

From the villages of Martin and East Martin, which are about 200 ft. above the ordnance datum, the land rises to the south to a height of 400 ft., even 500 ft. on Tidpit Common Down, where traces of Bokerly Ditch are visible. The other common is Martin Down, in the west of the parish. Excavations of the tumuli on Martin Down were made in 1893-6 by Lieut.-Gen. Pitt Rivers.<sup>5</sup>

The soil is chalk and gravel and the subsoil chalk. Martin Wood and part of Blagdon Hill Wood are in the south of the parish.

Land at MARTIN formed part of the MANORS grant by King Edmund to Athelfleda,<sup>6</sup>

but by the time of the Domesday Survey it was included in the manor of South Damerham (q.v.), with which it has from that time descended.<sup>7</sup> It is only three times mentioned as a separate manor; once in 1266, when Henry III granted to the Abbots of Glastonbury a weekly Wednesday market in their manor of Martin, and a fair on the eve, day and morrow of the Apostles Peter and Paul,<sup>8</sup> again in 1332, when Edward III granted a market on Fridays,<sup>9</sup> and in 1483, when part of the Abbot of Glastonbury's manor of East Martin was granted to the king for the enlargement of his park of Blagdon (co. Dors.).<sup>10</sup>

The manor of WEST MARTIN probably originated in 1 hide of land in the manor of South

Damerham granted by Henry de Solers Abbot of Glastonbury to William son of Elias before 1189.<sup>11</sup> William subsequently acquired another half-virgate, and the whole estate passed to Peter Elias of Martin.<sup>12</sup> William de Martin inherited the estate and settled it in 1300-1 as a messuage and a carucate of land upon himself and his wife Isabel.<sup>13</sup> The estate, to which 2 hides held of Glastonbury in 1189 were annexed before 1400<sup>14</sup> by Robert Petevyn,<sup>15</sup> afterwards passed to the Romseys of Little Damerham,<sup>16</sup> and from that date followed the descent of Little Damerham<sup>17</sup> (q.v.).

The 5 hides in the Abbot of Glastonbury's manor of South Damerham<sup>18</sup> held by Serlo de Burci in 1086 were probably identical with the manor of TIDPIT (Tudeputte, Todeputte, xiii cent.; Tudputte, xvi cent.) which in the middle of the 13th century was held of Glastonbury by Nicholas son of Martin, to whom the whole of Serlo's barony in Somerset had descended.<sup>19</sup> In 1255 Ralph de Baskerville, who held Tidpit of Nicholas son of Martin, for the service of half a knight's fee, gave it with the consent of Nicholas to the abbey of Glastonbury,<sup>20</sup> and in 1275 the abbot was holding Tidpit for half a knight's fee of Nicholas son of Martin.<sup>21</sup> The manor was subsequently held by the abbot in demesne,<sup>22</sup> and was apparently merged in that of South Damerham<sup>23</sup> (q.v.).

Roger Petevyn gave 4 acres in the field called TOYD (Twyde or Twohide) to Michael Abbot of Glastonbury (1235-52),<sup>24</sup> and this was evidently held by the abbot as part of his manor of South Damerham, the descent of which it has followed.

The church of ALL SAINTS consists CHURCH of a chancel, nave, north chapel, south transept, west tower and south porch.<sup>25</sup>

The earliest church of which there are traces belonged to the first half of the 12th century and parts of the walls of its aisleless nave still stand. Its chancel seems to have been rebuilt and made equal in width to the nave about the middle of the 13th century, and at the same period a west tower was added. The chancel was lengthened eastward early in the 14th century, and the south transept, which was the Lady chapel, dates from c. 1340. The south porch was probably first built in this century.

In the 15th century the north transept was added and the present transept arches inserted, the nave walls being heightened at the same time. In the first part of the 16th century the north transept was enlarged to form the present chapel with the insertion of an arcade of two bays, a new chancel arch being built to the east of the line of its predecessor, with a buttress to support it on the south.

ROCKBOURNE CHURCH : THE NAVE LOOKING EAST

MARTIN CHURCH : THE NAVE LOOKING EAST

The tower seems to have given trouble from early times, buttresses being added to it in the 14th century, a great part of it rebuilt with a new upper story in the 15th, and late in the 18th century the spire and parapet were added. In modern times the church has been patched and restored but not structurally altered. The quoins of the eastern angles of the chancel are in unusually large stones, but probably are not earlier than the 14th century, and have been reset in modern times.

The east window of the chancel is of early 14th-century date, but its tracery is modern. On the north of the chancel is an original window, c. 1310, of two trefoiled lights with a trefoil over and a scroll label, and on the south are two similar windows with a contemporary priest's doorway between them. West of the north window is a 16th-century four-centred arch of two moulded orders, opening to the north chapel. The responds have three engaged shafts with badly-fitting plain belled capitals. To the east of the arch is the opening of a squint from the north chapel. The chancel arch, a 16th-century insertion, is of two chamfered orders with semi-octagonal responds and crude moulded capitals. At the south-east of the chancel is a piscina with a trefoiled head.

The nave opens at the north-east to the chapel by an arch of the same detail as that in the chancel. West of this is the low two-centred 15th-century arch of the north transept. The nave wall west of the transept is in part of 12th-century date and contains two two-light windows, c. 1500, with modern tracery, and between them the original north doorway, now blocked and partly destroyed, but retaining its square jambs, while its original plain tympanum is set above them in the wall. The head of an original window is also here reset, upside down. At the south-east of the nave is a modern two-light window and above it is part of the hollow chamfered jamb and head of a window of uncertain date. The blocked jambs of the 13th-century south door of the chancel, now within the lines of the nave on account of the 16th-century removal of the chancel arch, are to be seen on the outside of the wall. Between them is set a thick slab of Purbeck marble with figure sculpture, perhaps of 13th-century date, on its upper face, but nearly buried in the walling. Opposite the north transept arch is an exactly similar window opening to the south transept, but not central with it, and evidently inserted for the sake of symmetry, like the transept arches at Sopley Church.

The south door of the nave is much repaired, but perhaps of 14th-century date like the porch. In its jambs some 12th-century stones from the former south door are re-used. Between it and the transept is a late window of two rather crude trefoiled lights with a cambered wooden lintel. The tower arch of two chamfered orders is of late 13th-century date. The inner order has half-round shafts with moulded capitals and bases. Above it, but considerably below the present roof, are the lines of the weather moulding of a former steep-pitched roof.

The three-light east window of the north chapel is 16th-century work, with a four-centred head. On the north wall is a large five-light window of like character set in a recess 4 ft. deep and 12 ft. 10 in. wide, opening to the chapel by an arch of the same date and detail as those towards the chancel and nave. It was probably designed to hold a tomb, but is at present empty. West of this is a small door with a four-centred head, also of 16th-century date, and there is a somewhat earlier window of three lights with rather clumsy tracery in the north wall of the old transept, the junction of which with the later chapel wall is clearly shown by the change in masonry, the later work being banded with regular courses of wrought stone. In the west wall of the transept is a 15th-century window of two cinquefoiled lights and above it a 16th-century window of two uncusped lights.

The south transept is lit by two windows of mid-14th-century date. That to the east is of three trefoiled lights with tracery in quatrefoils and trefoils under a square head, and that to the south is of three trefoiled lights with flowing tracery over. At the south-east is a trefoiled piscina of two moulded orders. In the jambs of the east window are remains of contemporary painting with inscriptions proving this to have been the Lady chapel. In the north jamb is part of the Salutation [Ave gr] acia plena, and in the south jamb a small kneeling figure holding a scroll with 'O beata Dei Mat : M [iserere mei]'.

The tower is of three stages with an octagonal stone spire with a rather large moulded finial. The parapet is of the same workmanship as the spire, with plain pyramidal pinnacles at the angles, and on the string at the base of the parapet is the date 1787. The belfry windows are of 15th-century date, of two trefoiled lights with tracery over in two-centred heads; this stage of the tower appears to be entirely of this period, and the south-west corner of the lower stages, and the buttresses at the north, north-east, south-east, and south-west, are all 15th-century work, and show how much the tower must have needed repair at the time. The only original 13th-century buttress seems to be that on the south face, while the pair at the north-west and that on the west face seem to be 14th-century additions. There are two west windows in the ground stage, one a square-headed loop, probably original, and the other inserted in the 15th century, with tracery in two trefoiled lights.

The south porch is probably about the same date as the south doorway and has a two-centred outer arch of two chamfered orders; several pieces of waste Purbeck marble are built into its walls, as at Christchurch.

The font is of late 18th-century date. The chancel roof is steep pitched, of 16th-century date, with moulded battens, and was originally intended to be ceiled with plaster, but the ceiling has been removed. The nave roof is of similar date and design, but retains its plaster and has four cambered tie-beams. The chapel roof is like that of the nave, but without tie-beams, and the south transept roof is also of 16th-century date, of pointed barrel form, with moulded plates and ridge, and a tie-beam with a strutted king-post.

In the south transept, which is used as a vestry, is a good early 17th-century table. Some old panels carved in relief with shields bearing the sacred monogram and set in crocketed finialled canopies are worked into the pulpit.

On the diagonal angle buttresses of the south transept, facing south-east and south-west, are incised sundials, the unusual position being notable. In the churchyard to the south of the church is a fine yew tree.

The tower contains three bells.

The plate consists of an Elizabethan silver chalice, undated, and a paten of 1743, given in 1744 by Mrs. Martha Reade.

There are six books of registers. The first contains all entries from 1590 to 1652; the second all entries from 1653 to 1715; the third all entries from 1716 to 1738; the fourth all entries from 1739 to 1796; the fifth baptisms and burials from 1796 to 1812; the sixth marriages from 1754 to 1812.

Martin chapelry was annexed to ADVOWSON the church of South Damerham<sup>26</sup> until 1844, when it was formed into a district chapelry including the tithings of East and West Martin and Tidpit.<sup>27</sup> It was constituted a vicarage in 1866,<sup>28</sup> and the living is now in the gift of the vicar of Damerham.

The advowson of the free chapel of Tidpit<sup>29</sup> was granted in 1255 with the manor by Ralph de Baskerville to the Abbot of Glastonbury,<sup>30</sup> and after the Dissolution the chapel was granted in 1549-50 to John Barwicke and Robert Freke.<sup>31</sup> In 1557-8 Richard Audley or Tuchet and his wife Elizabeth sold it to John Webb,<sup>32</sup> who died seised in 1571, leaving it to his son William.<sup>33</sup> The chapel has long been destroyed.

According to Aubrey (1659-70) there was a small chapel in the Earl of Shaftesbury's house at Martin paved with tiles bearing the coat and quarterings of Horsey.<sup>34</sup> The house now occupied by Mr. William Street is traditionally the Earl of Shaftesbury's house at Martin, but the chapel no longer exists.<sup>35</sup>

The house of Dorothy Harris at Martin was licensed in 1672 for Presbyterian worship.<sup>36</sup> A Primitive Methodist chapel at Townesend in Martin was registered for marriages in 1873,<sup>37</sup> and there are now Congregational and Primitive Methodist chapels in the parish.

In 1796 William Tawke, by his CHARITIES will, bequeathed £3,000, the interest to be applied in repair of his family burial-ground, the gallery and large window in the church, and the residue in the support of six old persons. The endowment fund now consists of £4,763 13s. 10d. consols producing £119 1s. 8d. per annum.

In 1888 Thomas Waters, by his will proved 27 January, left £275 consols, the dividends to be distributed on St. Thomas's Day among old people in money, fuel, food or clothing. The stock is held by the official trustees; the dividends amounting to £6 18s. a year are duly applied.

In 1900 Malachi Martin by his will proved 24 March left a legacy now represented by £881 2s. 4d. consols with the official trustees, the dividends, amounting to £22 0s. 6d. a year, to be applied for the benefit of the Union Chapel at Martin.

WHITSBURY

Wychbury, Wicheberia (xii cent.); Wiccheburi, Wicheburia (xiii cent.); Witchebury, Whyttesbury, Whistlebury (xvi cent.); Whichbury (xvii cent.); Whitchbury (xix cent.).

The parish of Whitsbury was originally in the Wiltshire hundred of Cawden and Cadworth, but was transferred to Hampshire<sup>1</sup> in 1895, although the parliamentary county boundary allots it to Wiltshire. It contains 1,823 acres, of which 904½ are arable, 689½ are permanent grass and 113 are woodland.<sup>2</sup> The village, with its straggling village street and timbered and thatched houses, is in the narrow Avon valley, about 300 ft. above the ordnance datum, while the church is on one of the ridges of the hills which run north-west from the valley and merge in the Wiltshire downs.

The land rises generally from south to north, reaching a height of 400 ft. at Whitsbury Camp, which is an earthwork containing about 15½ acres within the rampart. There are tumuli on Whitsbury Down and parts of Grims Ditch are still visible on the northern boundary of the parish. Whitsbury Wood, Whitsbury Firs and Whitsbury Common are east and south of the village. The inclosure award for Whitsbury is included with that of Rockbourne and is dated 1798.<sup>3</sup>

The soil is chalk and light sand with a subsoil of chalk and sandstone.

Although not mentioned in the Domesday MANOR Survey, the manor of WHITSBURY<sup>4</sup> was said in 1274-5 to have belonged to the Kings of England until the time of Henry I, who granted it to the monastery of Reading.<sup>5</sup> Seventeen years later it was asserted that Henry I had given the manor to Godfrey de Vilur, who transferred it to the abbey.<sup>6</sup> Whoever the donor, the manor certainly belonged to the abbey in the time of Henry I, who confirmed to it the church of the vill and land there which had belonged to Ingram the monk, and later sovereigns added like confirmations.<sup>7</sup>

In 1171-2 Philip de Hampton<sup>8</sup> had a suit against the Abbot of Reading as to Whitsbury, but in 1181 he had not yet obtained judgement.<sup>9</sup> In 1222 the abbot obtained a grant of twenty oaks in the New Forest for mending his houses at Whitsbury.<sup>10</sup> In 1274-5 he claimed return of writs, pleas of namii vetiti, gallows and the assize of bread and ale in Whitsbury,<sup>11</sup> but in 1291-2, being summoned to declare his right, he denied any claim to the first two liberties, but stated that his predecessors had been in seisin of the other rights in the time of Henry I.<sup>12</sup>

After the Dissolution the site of the manor was leased in 1540 for twenty-one years to Anthony Cotes, the tenant of the abbot,<sup>13</sup> and five years later the manor itself was granted to Richard Morrison.<sup>14</sup> He died seised in 1556, leaving a son and heir Charles,<sup>15</sup> who was succeeded in 1599 by his son Charles,<sup>16</sup> created a baronet in 1611.<sup>17</sup> The latter sold the manor in 1623 to Sir John Cooper, bart., of Rockbourne,<sup>18</sup> and from that date it has descended with Rockbourne (q.v.).

The church of ST. LEONARD is a CHURCH modern building in late 13th-century style, comprising chancel, north vestry, nave and west tower. The east window is a triple lancet with pierced heads and the other windows are of similar type. A moulded arch connects chancel and vestry. The chancel arch is also moulded and rests on corbel capitals. In the vestry is an 18th-century table. The material is flint, interspersed with stones, and with brick buttresses and tower.

The tower contains nine bells.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten given by John Starr in 1673, a tankard-shaped plated flagon and a mazer bowl mounted in silver.

The registers are contained in three books. The first has all entries from 1714 to 1750, the second has baptisms and burials from 1780 to 1812, the third book has marriages from 1780 to 1812. There is thus a gap in all three entries from 1750 to 1780.

The church of Whitsbury is mentioned in confirmation charters of Henry I, Henry II, Richard I and John to the abbey of Reading,<sup>19</sup> but in spite of this the abbey never seems to have possessed the church, as it was granted with the tithes of the manor and all land adjacent to it to the priory of Breamore at the time of its foundation by Ingelramus Apostolicus,<sup>20</sup> or Ingram the monk, and his gift was confirmed by Henry I.<sup>21</sup> The advowson remained in the possession of the priory of Breamore till the Dissolution,<sup>22</sup> when it passed to the Crown. In 1545 the advowson and the rectory were granted to John Broxholme and John Bellowe.<sup>23</sup> The advowson is next mentioned in 1618 when John Penruddock presented.<sup>24</sup> It had probably been purchased of Broxholme and Bellowe by the Penruddocks, for Sir George Penruddock died in 1581 holding the rectory of Whitsbury,<sup>25</sup> which passed on the death of his son Edward in 1613 to John his son and heir.<sup>26</sup> John Penruddock remained in possession of the advowson until 1626, when he conveyed it to John Gray and William Masters.<sup>27</sup> The advowson and rectory apparently next passed to Sir William Dodington, whose heir was returned as patron in 1645-50. At that time the vicar was receiving the profits of the rectory for life by the gift of Sir William.<sup>28</sup> From this date the advowson followed the descent of the manor of Rockbourne until 1822, when it was purchased by Admiral John Child Purvis,<sup>29</sup> on whose death in 1825 his son Vice-Admiral John Brett Purvis succeeded.<sup>30</sup> The advowson remained in the Purvis family until 1879, when it was purchased by Edward Edwards.<sup>31</sup> It was given by him in August 1898 to his daughter on her marriage with Commander A. B. Purvis, R.N., and the advowson is in her possession at the present day.<sup>32</sup>

The church of Whitsbury has always been in the diocese of Winchester and in the hundred of Fordingbridge in Hampshire, though all the parishioners lived in Wiltshire.<sup>33</sup> In 1428 it was returned that there were not ten inhabitants holding houses in the parish of Whitsbury,<sup>34</sup> but this return is made in Hampshire and may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that most of the householders lived in Wiltshire.

There is a Primitive Methodist chapel at Whitsbury.

In 1768 Charles Delafaye by his CHARITIES will, proved in the P.C.C. 5 February, bequeathed £200 South Sea Annuities, the interest to be laid out in physic or surgery for the poor, the surplus, if any, in apprenticing a poor boy. The trust fund now consists of £226 6s. 2d. consols with the official trustees, producing £5 13s. a year, which is usually applied in medical aid.

BREAMORE

The parish of Breamore seems to have formed part of the hundred of Fordingbridge<sup>2</sup> as late as 1570-1,<sup>3</sup> but in 1620-1 it was returned as a separate liberty,<sup>4</sup> co-extensive with the parish.<sup>5</sup> The claim that the parish was a liberty probably arose out of the rights of Breamore Priory.

BREAMORE

Bromore (xi cent.); Brumora, Brimor, Brimmore, Brommore (xiii cent.).

The parish of Breamore, including the tithing of Outwick, contains 35 acres of land covered by water and 2,676 acres of land, of which 1,232 acres are arable land, and 808½ acres are permanent grass.<sup>1</sup> The soil is loam with a subsoil of gravel. There is a station at Breamore on the London and South Western Railway.

The village lies on the right bank of the Avon, about 100 ft. above the ordnance datum, on the high road from Salisbury to Fordingbridge. From it the land rises north and west, reaching 300 ft. in the north-west at Breamore Down, on which are several tumuli.

The rectory, built in 1804,<sup>2</sup> is in the north of the village, while the church is in the park of Breamore House<sup>3</sup> about half a mile away. Nothing remains of the buildings of the Augustinian priory founded here about 1130, and excavations made on its site (Priory Meadow) in 1898 revealed only traces of the cloister and some stone coffins.

A portion of Grim's Ditch lies on the north-west of the parish and on it is a curious maze, called Miz Maze. The place-names Chapelhay and Oure Lady Mersshe occur in Breamore.<sup>4</sup>

The manor of BREAMORE or MANORS BREAMORE COURTENAY was ancient demesne of the Crown, and in 1086 was parcel of the royal manor of Rockbourne. A hide of land in the Isle of Wight held by Gherni belonged to the manor of Breamore, and from it came £9 towards the king's ferm. Half a hide in the manor held by Ulmar and 2½ hides and certain woodland had been put into the New Forest.<sup>5</sup> At an early date, probably by grant of Henry I,<sup>6</sup> Breamore passed to the Earls of Devon, lords of the Isle of Wight, who held it of the king in chief for the service of half a knight.<sup>7</sup> Later, like the lordship of the Isle of Wight (q.v.), it was annexed to the honour of Albemarle, but on the death of Isabel Countess of Albemarle<sup>8</sup> the king took possession of the manor, as part of the manor of Christchurch Twyneham, which he had purchased from the countess.<sup>9</sup> Hence in 1299 Edward I assigned it to his consort, Margaret of France,<sup>10</sup> but by commission of 1302 Breamore was found to be separate from Christchurch,<sup>11</sup> and was delivered in the same year to Hugh de Courtenay, the cousin and heir of Isabel,<sup>12</sup> compensation being made to Queen Margaret.<sup>13</sup> From that time it descended with the title of Earl of Devon<sup>14</sup> until the forfeiture of Thomas Courtenay Earl of Devon in 1461. In the same year Edward IV restored the manor to Henry Courtenay, brother and heir of Thomas,<sup>15</sup> and confirmed it to him in 1465.<sup>16</sup> He did not, however, long enjoy possession of it, for it was granted in 1467 to Walter Blount Lord Mountjoy,<sup>17</sup> who, dying in 1474, was succeeded by his grandson Edward.<sup>18</sup> The latter died under age in the following year,<sup>19</sup> and Breamore escheated to the king, who granted it for life in 1490 to Sir Hugh Conway and Elizabeth his wife.<sup>20</sup> The reversion was granted in 1512 to Katherine widow of William Courtenay Earl of Devon<sup>21</sup> and her heirs. Her son Henry was created Marquess of Exeter in 1525, but was beheaded and attainted in 1538-9,<sup>22</sup> when the manor again passed to the Crown. It was granted in 1541 to the queen consort, Katherine Howard,<sup>23</sup> and in 1544 to Katherine Parr,<sup>24</sup> who, after the death of Henry VIII, married Thomas Lord Seymour of Sudeley, to whom Breamore was granted by Edward VI in 1547.<sup>25</sup>

On his attainder and execution in 1549 it again passed to the Crown and was granted in 1579 by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Christopher Hatton.<sup>26</sup> It was purchased of him by William Dodington,<sup>27</sup> who died in 1600 leaving a son and heir Sir William. From this date Breamore followed the descent of South Charford (q.v.) until 1741, when Francis Lord Brooke sold it to Samuel Dixon,<sup>28</sup> preliminary to its sale to Sir Edward Hulse, bart.<sup>29</sup> The manor has descended with the title,<sup>30</sup> and is now held by Sir Edward Hamilton Westrow Hulse, bart.

Breamore House, the seat of Sir Edward Hulse, stands north-west of the church. The original house was a very fine late 16th-century building of brick and stone, but was unfortunately burnt in 1856. It has been practically rebuilt on the old lines, incorporating such of the old masonry as was left, and now from a short distance has quite the effect of an Elizabethan building. The site is very picturesque, being well timbered, with a fall eastwards to the river valley.

In 1293, when the manor of Breamore PARK was in the king's hands, he commanded the keeper of the park of Breamore to give John de Drokensford two live bucks and six does to stock his park of Crux Easton,<sup>31</sup> and the profits of the park of Breamore formed part of the grant to Margaret, consort of Edward I.<sup>32</sup> In 1316 Hugh de Courtenay complained that certain persons broke his park at Breamore and hunted therein and took away deer.<sup>33</sup> In 1461, the manor of Breamore being again in the king's hands on account of the forfeiture of Thomas Earl of Devon, the custody of the park, warren and manor of Breamore was granted to William Philpote for life.<sup>34</sup> In 1542 wood from the park of 'Overbremer' was assigned to William Pyrrye, farmer of 'Overbremer,' for repairing a stable and building a hayhouse.<sup>35</sup> The 'inclosed ground called the park of Breamore' is mentioned in a deed of 1741.<sup>36</sup>

Baldwin and Hugh de Redvers endowed their priory of Breamore with certain land in Breamore<sup>37</sup> which formed the nucleus of the manor later known as BREAMORE BULBORN.<sup>38</sup> Various donors added gifts of adjoining land which were merged in

A grant of the manor of Breamore to Robert Keylway on 19 Aug. 1547 is mentioned in Letters Patent of 1553 (Pat. 1 Mary, pt. x, m. 9), but the actual grant to Keylway has not been found; there is, however, a grant of exactly the same date to Lord Seymour (Pat. 1 Edw. VI, pt. ii, m. 11). Keylway, moreover, sold the manor in 1580-1 to William Dodington (Com. Pleas D. Enr. Hil. 23 Eliz. m. 6 d. & 7), but in the inquisition taken on William's death he is said to have purchased the manor of Sir Christopher Hatton. An inquiry was held in 1578-9 as to the right of Robert Keylway to receive the profits of the manor of Breamore Courtenay from 1 Jan. 1550 to 20 Nov. 1577-8. This inquiry, which was evidently made on account of the grant to Sir Christopher Hatton, is illegible (Spec. Com. 21 Eliz. no. 2024).

the manor. Thus Isabel de Fortibus Countess of Albemarle gave the canons land which John de Gauefrey once held.<sup>39</sup> Other donors were Nicholas de Clarebold of land in Shortelond,<sup>40</sup> William atte Cumbe and his wife Eva<sup>41</sup>; Thomas<sup>42</sup> and William<sup>43</sup> Polet and John Gobet, brother of Thomas,<sup>44</sup> of lands in Cherlewod, Houtwyke and elsewhere in the parish of Breamore—the lands given by Thomas Polet were to maintain a light before the rood; Lucy la Lavendere, before 1326, of lands to provide a lamp to burn before the cross in the conventual church<sup>45</sup>; Edmund Upehulle and his wife Agnes of land next the prior's land called Walewell in 1345–6<sup>46</sup>; and Richard Alpher of lands lying towards 'la Mulleweye' and 'la Brummel's acre'<sup>47</sup>; John de Breamore in 1348–9<sup>48</sup> of lands for which the prior undertook to receive John, his wife Gena and his son John into the brotherhood of the priory and to celebrate their anniversaries with placebo, dirige and a mass for them and for John and Agnes, John's parents, twice a year, and to distribute 3s. worth of bread to a hundred and forty-four poor people in Fordingbridge on their anniversary.<sup>49</sup>

The manor remained in the possession of the priory until its suppression in 1536,<sup>50</sup> when it was granted to Henry Marquess of Exeter and his wife Gertrude as the manor of Bulborn.<sup>51</sup> On Henry's attainder in 1538–9 it passed once more to the Crown and was granted in 1539 to Anne of Cleves,<sup>52</sup> in 1540 to Katherine Howard,<sup>53</sup> in 1544 to Katherine Parr,<sup>54</sup> and in 1551–2 to the Princess Elizabeth for life.<sup>55</sup> In 1553 Queen Mary granted the reversion to Edward Earl of Devon,<sup>56</sup> but in 1571–2 Queen Elizabeth granted it to Sir Christopher Hatton.<sup>57</sup> It subsequently returned to the Crown, and was granted in 1582, on the petition of William Brooke Lord Cobham, to Edmund Frost and John Walker,<sup>58</sup> who sold it on the following day to William Dodington,<sup>59</sup> and its descent from that time is identical with that of Breamore Courtenay<sup>60</sup> (q.v.).

Bulborn,<sup>62</sup> being last mentioned in 1581–2.<sup>63</sup> Barn's Farm to the north of Woodgreen possibly preserves the site of this grange.

At the time of the Domesday Survey Waleran the Huntsman held a virgate and a half in 'Otoiche,' and Gozelin held it of him. Agemund had formerly held it as an alod of King Edward the Confessor and it had belonged to Welle<sup>64</sup> (? Wellow). This entry may refer to OUTWICK, a tithing and hamlet in Breamore, but there is a curious similarity between this entry and that for West Wellow, which consisted of a virgate and a half of Agemund's manor of East Wellow which had been seized by Waleran the Huntsman and put into Wiltshire.<sup>65</sup> Land at Outwick is mentioned in several deeds relating to the manor of Breamore Bulborn, but there is no indication that there was ever a manor there.

The earliest mention which has been found of a mill at Breamore occurs in 1551–2, when the mill of Bulborn was granted to Princess Elizabeth.<sup>66</sup> This mill was evidently annexed to the manor of Breamore Bulborn and passed with it to Sir William Dodington.<sup>67</sup> The customary tenants of the manor had to bring their corn to be ground at this mill and another which was built before 1582, both near the priory.<sup>68</sup> In a deed of 1741 three water grist-mills are mentioned.<sup>69</sup> There is now a mill on the Avon, south of the village.

a south transept 11 ft. by 8 ft. 10 in., a nave 20 ft. 3 in. by 50 ft. 11 in., and a south porch 10 ft. 3 in. by about 8 ft.

It is a most valuable and unusually complete specimen of a pre-Conquest church, its walls built of whole flints set herring-bone fashion, and originally covered within and without with plaster, which ran unbroken over the splays of the windows, but was stopped at the angles and at intervals on the wall surfaces by heavy quoins and pilaster strips of green sandstone and ironstone, projecting about 1½ in. from the walling. The height and comparative thinness of the walls and the massive character of the wrought stonework make it a most interesting and typical example. It was originally an aisleless cruciform building, with nave and chancel separated by a square tower flanked by transepts. One of these transepts, that on the north, has disappeared, and there seems to have been a western building of equal width with the nave, which is also destroyed, but with these exceptions and certain rebuildings noted below the early work is very well preserved, and the removal of the external plaster, though in other respects a mistake, has revealed the character of the masonry, affording a very useful comparison with other remaining examples.

The proportions of the plan are noticeable, 27 ft. being a ruling measurement. The chancel from outside east to west is 27 ft. long, the tower 27 ft. square over all, the width across the tower and transept was 54 ft. from outside to outside, and from the outside of the west wall of the nave to that of the west wall of the tower is 54 ft. The measurements are not quite exact, but the correspondence is too marked to be accidental.

The internal width of the tower, 20 ft., is also the internal length of the chancel. The arrangement of windows suggests that there were four on either side of the nave, equally spaced on the north, but not on the south, where a window was set on either side of the rood over the south doorway. Two of the north windows remain, but on the south side only one is now visible, to the east of the doorway and blocked by the 15th-century heightening of the south porch. The chancel probably had three windows, one in each wall.

The probable date is late in the 10th or early in the 11th century, and the only addition since that date is the south porch, of which the lower stage is of mid-12th-century date and the upper stage of the 15th century. The chancel was practically rebuilt with the insertion of a new door and new windows about 1340, but the old plan was adhered to, and the lower parts of the walls are perhaps original. The early chancel had much higher walls. Early in the 15th century new arches were inserted in the east and west walls of the tower, and the north transept was destroyed at this date or later. The west wall of the nave has been rebuilt, but apparently on the old lines, and there seems to have been a building of equal width with the nave to the west of it. The chancel was repaired in 1874 and the rest of the church in 1897, and all woodwork except the roofs, a door case south-east of the nave, and the frame of the rood loft door, is modern.<sup>77</sup>

The east window of the chancel, c. 1340, has three trefoiled lights with net tracery in a two-centred head. The external label is modern. To north and south of it are two 15th-century image brackets with heads of angels beneath them. They are further enriched, in one case with bands of foliage, and in the other with small foliate bosses. The north wall is now without openings, but at the west externally are traces—part of the sill and one jamb—of a low side window of uncertain date. There is also a modern blocked north door apparently for an intended vestry, since it is only inserted in the inner face of the wall and has never been cut completely through.

PLAN OF BREAMORE CHURCH

At the east, in the south wall, is a 15th-century piscina of unusual design. The lower part is a fairly deep niche with a three-centred head continuously chamfered, which was closed with a door, one hinge pin remaining. The basin projects from the wall and is moulded and semi-octagonal in form, the back of the basin, with its foliate drain, being carried back to about the line of the door. Above this are two small pointed recesses for the cruets. In the middle of the wall is a priest's door, c. 1340, with a continuously moulded internal reveal and drop rear arch, and externally of two wave-moulded orders with a pointed head and ogee label with head drips. On either side of this is a two-light window. That to the east is of two trefoiled lights contemporary with the door, the head cut out of a single slab. The other window is of 15th-century date and has two cinquefoiled lights with a square-headed external label with one drip at the east in the form of a mitred <sup>77</sup> The early character of this church was first brought to notice during repairs in 1897, and a description of it by the Rev. A. J. Hill was printed in Arch. Journ. lv, 84 (1898).

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

head. At the west the label butts against the east wall of the tower. The chancel arch is of 15th-century date and is of two moulded orders and four-centred form and has no responds, the opening being the full width of the chancel. The outer order, moulded with a hollow chamfer, a fillet and a case-ment, is stopped on a band of well-modelled foliage. The inner order rests upon moulded three-sided capitals with short wall shafts of similar form carried on conical corbels, one with a human head, the other with foliage only, but foliage of very unusual character, founded on thistle leaves, and evidently belonging to the same school as the work at Christchurch Priory. Externally the north wall of the chancel shows a considerable irregularity of build. It is mainly of knapped flint rubble, but there are patches of the original whole flint rubble. The east wall is more regular and is almost entirely of knapped flints. The south wall is mainly of whole flints and appears to have been less rebuilt than the others. The eastern angles have heavy green sandstone quoins, probably old work re-used. The south-east corner of the tower has been rebuilt, but at the north-east is the original weather table showing that the height and pitch of the early chancel roof were about the same as those of the nave, and the original wall much higher than it is now.

The central tower originally had a first floor about 15 ft. from the ground, entered through a doorway from the south transept. There must have been a wooden stair, or perhaps only a ladder in the transept, to reach the doorway. The room was lighted by four windows, two on the south and two on the north, with mid-wall openings widely splayed on each side, and round heads, all being of plastered flint rubble. Three of these remain, that at the south-east having been destroyed, but all have square-headed stone frames set in their outer faces, the outer splay being blocked. This may be a 15th-century or later alteration. The door is a plain, narrow, square-headed opening, and from it an iron ladder leads to the bells overhead. Below the two north windows of the tower is the weathering of the old north transept roof in heavy blocks of stone, and at the ground level are the blocked jambs of the destroyed arch to the transept, of about the same width as that to the south transept, which remains intact. The head has been destroyed by the insertion late in the 15th century of a window of three cinquefoiled lights under a square head, with an external label. The arch to the south transept is of one square order with a semicircular head built of long 'through' stones. At the springing are deep square abaci with heavy cable moulds on the angles, and on the north face of the arch is incised, in well-proportioned letters, the inscription

HER SPUTELAD SEO GECFYDRAEDNES DE

'Here is made plain the covenant to thee.' There were similar inscriptions, as it seems, on the other arches, but only a single stone is now preserved, with lettering on a larger scale than that on the transept arch, and probably belonging to the original east arch of the tower. The inscription, when uncovered in 1897, had its letters filled with plaster and coloured red, with a red line above and below.

On either side of the south transept arch are inserted windows, that to the east being of two trefoiled lights of 14th-century date, and that to west a 15th-century window of two cinquefoiled lights with a square head and label. This has on its west dripstone a shield with a bezant between two harts' heads cabossed in a chief, quartering a chevron between roundels, which is perhaps a Popham coat quartered with Zouche. In the west wall of the tower is the arch to the nave, which is of similar date and detail to the chancel arch, and the upper rood-loft doorway, with its old wooden frame, remains at the north-west.

The transept has on the south a small pointed window of 13th-century date inserted in an original double-splayed window, and on the east a 12th-century doorway cut straight through the wall, with a round head of one square order and plain chamfered abaci. Above this is a complete original window with a double splay all formed in flint rubble and rendered with plaster. The south-east and west angles have the heavy long and short quoins set out to stop the plastering, and at the base of the gable to the south, crowning the quoins, are two projecting stones originally intended to carry the barge-boards of rather widely projecting eaves. At the foot of the quoins are square projecting base stones. On a 17th-century stone let into the west wall is the brief inscription, 'AVOYD FORNICATION.'

The nave has on the north two original double-splayed windows of the same detail as that in the tower but larger. One of these is about a third of the length of the wall from the east, the other is the last window to the west, and both are placed high in the wall. Between them is a window, probably of 16th-century date, of two coarse trefoiled lights with a pierced middle spandrel and a four-centred head, and to the east of the first window are two 15th-century windows, both of two cinquefoiled lights with external square-headed openings. One of these is placed comparatively low, and the other at about the same level as the early windows. At the south-east of the nave is a modern doorway with a good 18th-century head and architrave of oak, and above this, but a little further westward, is a window of two cinquefoiled lights of 16th-century date. Beyond it is another window of two clumsy trefoiled lights, probably of 16th-century date, and partly hidden by the east wall of the porch is an original window, now blocked. The south doorway is of mid-12th-century date, with a semicircular head of two moulded orders, the outer carried upon circular shafts with scalloped capitals, of which that to the east is modern. West of the porch is a window of late 15th-century date of two trefoiled lights with a quatrefoil over. In the west wall is a modern window of three trefoiled lights, below which may be seen the lower stones of the jambs of an original west doorway, opening to the destroyed western chamber, the start of whose walls yet remains. The upper part of the west wall has been rebuilt and contains a large modern window of two lights, between which has been set a shield-shaped drip, on which are carved the initials 'W D' and the date 1603, doubtless for Sir William Dodington, then lord of the manor. At the western angles are diagonal buttresses overlying the start of the early walls, and of the same date as the rebuilt part of the west wall.

The south porch is of two stages. The lower is of 12th-century date and has a much-restored round-headed entrance arch of two moulded orders with shafted jambs similar in style to the south doorway. The upper stage is of 15th-century date and has on the south a low pointed opening of two chamfered orders, which may have been filled with a wooden frame originally, and at the south-east is a pointed piscina recess with a moulded head. The gable is modern and of half-timber construction. The floor of this upper chamber is now removed, like that of the very similar room built in front of the great rood on the west wall of Headbourne Worthy Church. There is a close analogy between the two, both having contained an altar and both having been decorated with wall paintings, but the paintings at Breamore have been much more elaborate than those at Headbourne Worthy. The rood itself, between the figures of our Lady and St. John, is not such a fine example as the other, but still must have been a striking figure. Each of the three figures has a large nimbus and above the rood is a hand projecting downwards from a cloud. Painted on the wall as a background to the figures is a landscape of rolling hills with trees and copses and in the middle distance a small church with a spire. There are traces of drawings of other buildings. The colours used are a reddish brown for uncovered ground, a darker brown for the buildings, a light peacock green for the hills and lampblack for foliage. The painting is continued on the west wall, where a figure of Judas hanging is to be seen, and on the east and west walls are the Maria and IHS monograms in reddish brown, with a diaper of drops. Below the rood is a 12th-century Agnus Dei carved in a circular medallion in low relief. In the porch are two oak benches, one dated 1617, which seem to have been made for their position.

The chancel roof is modern, of open timber construction, and is tiled. The tower roof internally has curved timber framing of 15th-century date, forming a cove on all four sides. Externally it is tiled and of pyramidal form and surmounted by a small square modern shingled bell-turret with two trefoil-headed sound holes to each face. The nave roof contains some old material incorporated in a modern roof of the original pitch. The porch roof is tiled. The west gallery is modern. The font has a plain octagonal bowl on a square stem and is ancient but of uncertain date. On the north wall of the chancel is a small wall monument to Rev. John Crabbe, 1748, once sub-librarian of the Bodleian and also rector of this parish. The arms are Azure a chevron between two fleurs de lis and a crab or. On the north of the tower is a small wall tablet to William, 1685, and Robert, 1682, the sons of William Holloway; also Elizabeth his wife, 1690, and Mercy (Holloway) (no date), the relict of Joseph Durnforth. In the tower are also a number of painted hatchments of the Hulse family. On the north of the nave is a very pretty white marble wall monument to George Johnson, his wife Anne, their son Henry and daughters Frances, Elizabeth and Mary. The only date given is that of the son's death, 1703, who left the sum of £100 for apprenticing the poor children of 'Bremmor' and Wood Green. The arms given are Or a water bouget sable.

There are three bells; the treble of 1662, the second by John Wallis, 1606, and the tenor of 1637.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, paten, flagon and almsdish of 1745, given in that year by Lady Elizabeth Brooke.

The registers are contained in five books. The first has all entries 1675 to 1731, the second baptisms and burials 1731 to 1780, the third marriages only 1755 to 1797, the fourth baptisms and burials 1781 to 1813, and the fifth marriages 1797 to 1813. There are also overseers' accounts from 1649.

The rectory and advowson of ADVOUSON Breamore with the chapels of Charford and Hale belonged at the Dissolution to the priory of Breamore,<sup>78</sup> probably by gift of Baldwin and Hugh de Redvers. The rectory and church were granted in 1536 to Henry Marquess of Exeter,<sup>79</sup> but, returning to the Crown on his forfeiture, passed by exchange in 1552 to John Poyntet, Bishop of Winchester.<sup>80</sup> Queen Mary deprived him and took possession of the rectory and advowson, the reversion of which, after the termination of a lease to William Pury, she granted in the first year of her reign to Edward Earl of Devon.<sup>81</sup> Both, however, were granted in 1558 to John White, Poyntet's successor,<sup>82</sup> but again returned to the Crown and were sold by Queen Elizabeth in 1578 to Sir Edward Horsey.<sup>83</sup> The latter sold them in 1581 to John Stockman,<sup>84</sup> of whom they were purchased in 1586 by William Dodington,<sup>85</sup> and from this time the advowson followed the descent of the manor of Breamore until the death of Lady Anne Brooke in 1690-1,<sup>86</sup> when it passed to her daughter Dodington wife of Charles Montagu, created Duke of Manchester in 1719.<sup>87</sup> The advowson and rectory then descended with the title of Duke of Manchester<sup>88</sup> until sold by George Duke of Manchester to Henry Longden in 1776-7.<sup>89</sup> Subsequently both advowson and rectory became vested in James Palmer, who presented to the church in 1838,<sup>90</sup> and in 1870 they passed from Rev. James Nelson Palmer to Rev. Edward Parker Dew,<sup>91</sup> in whose trustees the advowson is now vested.

There is a Primitive Methodist chapel at Breamore, and there was formerly a Congregational chapel, but it now no longer exists.

John Dodington by deed dated CHARITIES 16 February 1638 charged certain grounds in Fordingbridge called Sandy Balls with an annuity of £5 for the apprenticing of poor children of this parish, Fordingbridge, Harbridge and Ringwood (alternis vicibus) for ever. Edward Hulse, bart., and applied as required together with Johnson's Charity next mentioned.

In 1703 Henry Johnson by his will directed £100 to be laid out in lands and hereditaments, so as to secure that £5 a year be applied in apprenticing. The sum of £5 10s. a year is received from Lord Normanton, the lord of the manor of North Ashley, being one moiety of a fee-farm rent thereout, less land tax.

A sum of £300 consols arising from investment of accumulations of these charities was in May 1908 standing in the bank books in the names of John Hulse Hamilton and two others.

Church Lands.—The parish is in possession of 6a. 1r. 8p., let in part in allotments producing about £25 a year, which is applied towards the church expenses.

Pennington, in 1831 a tithing of Milford, now a separate parish, is also in this hundred, but is treated with Milford in that of Christchurch. Certain parts of Ringwood are not in the hundred. Burley with Bisterne Closes and Burley and Woodgreen, extra-parochial in 1831, belong to the New Forest. North Ashley is part of the liberty of Westover, where its tithingmen seem to have attended the view of frankpledge but not the hundred.<sup>2</sup>

In the Domesday Survey Ringwood and Harbridge are the only places entered under Ringwood Hundred, the two together being assessed at 3 hides and 1 virgate as against 33 hides in the days of the Confessor.<sup>3</sup> Bisterne and Crow, tithings of Ringwood, were in 'Rodedic' Hundred. In the time of King Edward they were assessed at 5 hides, in 1086 at 4 hides.<sup>4</sup> Neither Burley, Ashley nor Somerley occurs.

In the Nomina Villarum of 1316 Ringwood and Christchurch Hundreds are given together, North Ashley, Ringwood, Pennington, Harbridge and Bisterne being entered.<sup>5</sup> In the Aids of 1346 and 1428 the hundreds are separated,<sup>6</sup> but Ringwood is only represented by Pennington.<sup>7</sup> In that of 1431 Ringwood is omitted and Pennington given under Christchurch Hundred.<sup>8</sup>

The hundred was always held with Ringwood Manor.

HARBRIDGE

Herdebrige (xi cent.); Hardebrygg (xiii cent.); Haberrigge (xiv cent.); Harebrigg (xv cent.); Harbridge (xvi cent.).

The parish of Harbridge contains over 4,000 acres, comprising 650 acres of arable land, 986½ acres of permanent grass and 356½ acres of woodland.<sup>1</sup> The height above sea level is for the most part above 100 ft. and below 200 ft. The soil is sandy, the subsoil gravel, which has been considerably worked.<sup>2</sup> The western and south-western parts of the parish comprise the great uncultivated tracts of Plumley Heath with its tumuli and Nea Heath. In the south-east is Somerley, the seat of Lord Normanton, with its magnificent picture gallery and its park of 900 acres. Nearly the whole parish together with Ibsley and Ellingham belongs to Lord Normanton's estate.

The little village of Harbridge, with its church, lies about 2 miles north-east of Somerley, at the edge of the low meadow land to the east of the River Avon. North again are Harbridge Green and North End Park and Farm. Old Somerley is on the northern border of Somerley Park.

There was an inclosure award at Harbridge in 1817.<sup>3</sup>

There is a tithing of Harbridge, Efford, in Milford parish and Christchurch Hundred (q.v.).

In 1086 HARBRIDGE was held of MANORS the king by Bernard the Chamberlain, having been held by Ulveva in the days of the Confessor. The assessment had fallen from 5 hides to 3 hides and 1 virgate.<sup>4</sup> The subsequent history of Harbridge is not easy to unravel. Gilbert de Clare Earl of Gloucester and Hertford, the last of the Clares, was receiving a rent of 25*s.* 8*d.* held of the king by knight service at his death in 1314.<sup>5</sup> This was then committed to the charge of Lawrence de Rustiton, and afterwards of Richard de Rodeneye, Ithel de Keyrewent and Richard de Byffet, keepers of the earl's lands,<sup>6</sup> the places of the last two being subsequently taken by Bennet de Cokefeld and William de Aylmere.<sup>7</sup> It was probably by virtue of the Clare possessions that the king's name occurs in the Nomina Villarum of 1316.<sup>8</sup>

The king's parcenary in 1316 was Isabel de Acton.<sup>9</sup> Her holding may be traced in the messuage and virgate the reversion of which Sir John Poyntz conveyed to Sir John de la Hale and his heirs in 1364.<sup>10</sup> John Palmer was then holding the estate of the hereditament of Poyntz; after his death it was to remain to Joan wife of Sir John de Acton, deceased, and after her death to remain to Poyntz or by the terms of the conveyance to Sir John de la Hale.

By the early part of the 15th century Harbridge, then known as a manor, had come into the hands of a Henry Smith who was unjustly disseised by John Poole.<sup>11</sup> However, in January 1500 Thomas Poole of Holwall (co. Somers.), a descendant of John, sold and quitclaimed to John Smith of Askerswell (co. Dors.) grandson of Henry, both for himself and Margery, late wife of Thomas Trowe, and possibly sister or mother of Thomas Poole,<sup>12</sup> all right and title in the manor of Harbridge, together with all the possessions of the late Margery Trowe, and those occupied by Jane widow of John Poole, uncle of Thomas, and by Edith Poole widow.<sup>13</sup> The full sum due on this sale was not paid off, however, until 1504,<sup>14</sup> and meanwhile Poole conveyed the premises to Sir John Turbervyle and to Richard Kemer.<sup>15</sup> Nevertheless Nicholas Smith, heir, presumably, of John, died seised in 1538,<sup>16</sup> leaving a widow Sybil, on whom Harbridge was settled in dower for life, and a son and heir George. Sybil apparently married as her second husband John Okeden,<sup>17</sup> with whom she was holding the manor for the term of her life in 1541,<sup>18</sup> in which year Jaspar Smith, presumably brother of Nicholas, settled all his reversionary right on Thomas Whyte. Sybil died in 1551, leaving as heir her son George Smith before mentioned, then sixteen years old.<sup>19</sup> However, by 1567 Harbridge was carried by co-heiresses Elizabeth and Jane to their respective husbands John Rose and Francis Poyntz.<sup>20</sup> The remainder was to Ambrose Rose of Ringwood, who sold it in 1601<sup>21</sup> to John Wykes of Harbridge. Francis Poyntz quitclaimed to the new lord a few years later.<sup>22</sup> The Wykeses continued to hold during the greater part of the 17th century. John Wykes had been sequestered in 1649 and in 1654 he was still awaiting redress.<sup>23</sup> In 1688 Lewis Bampfield and Elizabeth his wife and Margaret Wykes, spinster, were party to a conveyance of the manor, when, however, one John Wheeler seems to have been in actual possession.<sup>24</sup> Elizabeth and Margaret would seem to have been the co-heirs of the Wykeses and Margaret was probably the Margaret wife of William Bowreman who with her husband and Lewis and Elizabeth Bampfield sold three messuages and land in Harbridge, Ellingham, Hurst, Blashford, Rockford, Ringwood, Lyndhurst, Linwood and the New Forest to Henry Hommige in 1689, warranting him against the heirs of Elizabeth and Margaret.<sup>25</sup>

<sup>17</sup> John Okeden was already holding the Punchardon moiety of Harbridge (q.v. infra). Sybil evidently married him the year after the death of Nicholas, since in 1539 he settled Ellingham on himself and 'one Sibilla Smyth widow of Nicholas Smyth' for their lives with reversion to the heirs of John (L. and P. Hen. VIII, xiv [2], 435 [16]).

By 1693 the manor was in the hands of Edward Twyne<sup>26</sup> and in 1700 Joseph Hussey and Mary his wife sold it to Joseph Gifford.<sup>27</sup> Early in the 18th century Gifford must have sold the manor to James Whitaker,<sup>28</sup> who in 1733 conveyed it to Dayrell Hawley.<sup>29</sup> No further mention of Harbridge Manor has been discovered until 1810, when it was held by Percival Lewis.<sup>30</sup> Soon after that it passed to the Earl of Normanton (see Somerley) and now forms part of the Somerley estate.

The Punchardons had an estate in Harbridge for a considerable period. In 1263 Robert de Punchardon and Alice his wife quitclaimed from themselves and the heirs of Alice a messuage and a carucate of land to William de Punchardon, Maud his wife and Hawis her sister and the heirs of Maud and Hawis. This seems to have been the same estate of which in 1375 John de Boyland of Eling and Alice his wife, holding it of the hereditament of Alice, conveyed a moiety to William de Athelyngton and a moiety to Oliver de Punchardon, the whole estate being in the actual possession of John Bereford and Denis his wife for the life of Denis.<sup>31</sup> Oliver de Punchardon died seised of lands there in 1417.<sup>32</sup> Like Ellingham (q.v.) the Punchardon moiety of Harbridge passed to the Okedens,<sup>33</sup> and in 1604 William Okeden sold it to Thomas Worsley,<sup>34</sup> who died seised in 1620,<sup>35</sup> leaving an infant grandson Thomas Worsley as his heir. Thomas Worsley's daughter Barbara was the wife of a William Bowreman, whose namesake, possibly himself or a son, was dealing with land in Harbridge in 1689.<sup>36</sup> From that date this moiety of Harbridge undoubtedly merged in the manor proper and belongs at the present day to the Earl of Normanton.

The earliest discovered reference to SOMERLEY is in 1272, when Thomas Baldwin granted Nicholas son of Philip le But an annuity from a messuage and land there.<sup>37</sup> It is possible that the third holding in the vill of North Ashley (see Ringwood) assigned in the Nomina Villarum of 1316<sup>38</sup> to John Marshall refers to Somerley. At any rate, that estate always descended with Somerley Manor. In 1336 John son of William de la Penne conveyed to John Marshall of Bovingdon and Constance his wife and the heirs of John a messuage and land in North Ashley, Somerley and 'La Penne'<sup>39</sup>; and five years later Thomas Marshall and Ralph Marshall of West Chinnock settled an estate in the same places on John Marshall of Bovingdon and Maud his wife, with remainder to John's son John and Katherine his wife and the heirs of their bodies.<sup>40</sup> Early in the 15th century Henry Keswick took the place of the Marshalls. In 1412 William Park granted John Fromond and Henry Keswick a messuage, a carucate of land, &c., to hold for the life of Henry, with remainder to John Morris, clerk, and his heirs.<sup>41</sup> In 1417 Michael Marshall quitclaimed the same estate to Fromond, Park and Keswick and the heirs of Keswick<sup>42</sup>; two years later John Gyles of Winchester released to Henry Keswick and his heirs all his right in the manor of Somerley and all lands and tenements in North Ashley, Somerley and 'La Penne,' which had once been John Marshall's<sup>43</sup>; while in 1438 John Frampton and Joan his wife, presumably the Marshall heiress, quitclaimed to the new lord.<sup>44</sup> In the inquisition held on John Frampton's death it is stated that the manor of Somerley was formerly held by John Marshall and Agatha his wife, from whom it passed to their elder son Walter.<sup>45</sup> In 1442 Henry Keswick granted an estate, comprising four messuages, 2 carucates of land, 30 acres of meadow and 26s. rent, to Thomas Luyt and heirs.<sup>46</sup> In 1529 Philip Baskervyle and Agnes his wife created trustees of the manor of Somerley during their lives with remainder to the heirs of Agnes.<sup>47</sup> She must have been the Agnes daughter and heir of John Hamlyn who had been the wife of William Okeden of Ellingham<sup>48</sup> (q.v.), for in 1542, when John Okeden, William's son, was settling the manor on himself with remainder for life to his second son Henry, Philip Baskervyle was said to be holding for life from the hereditament of John.<sup>49</sup> At his death in 1558, Henry having predeceased him, John Okeden left the manor to his grandson William son and heir of his who settled them on his son Herbert on the marriage of the latter with Elizabeth daughter and co-heir of John Colles.<sup>52</sup> Herbert Dodington died in 1633 in his father's lifetime, his brother John being his heir.<sup>53</sup> Edward Dodington was lord of the manor in 1653.<sup>54</sup> John Dodington left two daughters (see South Charford), of whom Anne, the younger and eventually sole heir, married as her second husband Thomas Hoby.<sup>55</sup> He was probably the uncle of Sir Thomas Hoby, third baronet, to whom by 1728 the manors of Somerley and North Ashley had passed.<sup>56</sup> Sir Thomas Hoby died in 1730 and was succeeded by his son and namesake.<sup>57</sup> The immediate subsequent history of the manors is unknown, but in 1781 Ambrose St. John, a younger son of John tenth Lord St. John of Bletsoe, was holding the manors of North Ashley juxta Ringwood and North Ashley Nea.<sup>58</sup> This last-named is obviously Somerley, for in a deed of the following year 'Somerley and North Ashley alias Nea' is the form found. In 1782 Ambrose St. John with his brother, the Rev. St. Andrew St. John, sold the manors to Daniel Hobson,<sup>59</sup> and in 1814 Edward Hobson conveyed them to Henry Baring.<sup>60</sup> Shortly afterwards they passed to Welbore Ellis (Agar) second Earl of Normanton, whose son, the third earl, was created Lord Somerton of Somerley in 1873. Sidney James (Agar) fourth and present Earl of Normanton is the present lord of Somerley.

The church of ALL SAINTS is an CHURCH ashlar-faced building consisting of chancel, nave and west tower, rebuilt in 1838 in 15th-century style, but part of the tower masonry appears to be older. There is a small wall tablet to Edward Dodington ob. 1656, with a quartered shield.

The bells are three in number, all by Thomas Mears, 1839.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, paten and paten cover, undated, a flagon of 1754 and a silver-gilt paten of 1869.

The registers are in four books: the first has burials 1571 to 1720, marriages 1616 to 1717, and baptisms 1679 to 1719, but they are incomplete. There is a gap in the baptisms 1682 to 1695, and from 1696 to 1719 they are irregular. There are gaps in the burials 1635 to 1654 and in marriages 1644 to 1654 and 1657 to 1713. The second book has baptisms and burials 1720 to 1792, the third marriages 1754 to 1812, and the fourth baptisms and burials 1792 to 1812.

The living of Harbridge is a ADVOWSON rectory attached to the vicarage of Ringwood and in the gift of King's College, Cambridge.

There is an elementary school built with class-room and residence for mistresses by the late Earl of Normanton, with the aid of a voluntary rate, for 90 children.

John Dodington by deed of CHARITIES 16 February 1638 charged certain grounds called Sandy Balls in Fordingbridge with an annuity of £5 for binding out apprentices of poor children in this parish, Breamore, Fordingbridge and Ringwood (alternis vicibus) for ever.

The sum of £5 is received every fourth year and duly applied.

RINGWOOD

Rincveda (xi cent.); Ringwud (xii cent.); Ringwode, Rinkewode (xiii cent.).

Ringwood, including the tithing and parochial chapelry of Bisterne, is an extensive parish comprising 11,842 acres, of which 2,809 acres are arable land, 2,321 acres permanent grass and 2,385 acres woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> The parish lies low round the River Avon, which frequently overflows the neighbouring meadows. The river is spanned by a stone bridge of three arches. In the neighbourhood of Hightown and Crow in the east the land rises to 200 ft. Ashley Heath, joined at the south by Barnsfield Wood and Leybrooke Common, forms most of the parish between Moors River and the Avon; while eastwards copse and moorland merge in Burley Walk and the New Forest.

The town of Ringwood, to which the captive Monmouth was brought after Sedgemoor, lies on the east bank of the Avon, where the river is widest.

The town is built along the Christchurch road about an open market place, around which stand the church and the Town Hall erected by Mr. John Morant in 1868. There are a Lecture Hall in Christchurch Street, built in 1874 by Miss Carter of Ringwood, and an iron theatre given to the town in 1888 by Mr. Hay Richards Morant. There is a large linen collar and cuff factory, while 'Ringwood' woollen gloves are famous.

Ashley lies to the west just across the river near the Ringwood Union Workhouse; Moortown is a mile south of the town on the Christchurch road and Kingston a mile south of that, with North Kingston a little to the north-east. Hightown and Crow are in the east and Poulner and North Poulner in the extreme north-east, reached from Ringwood by Poulner Lane.

St. Ives, the seat of Dr. William James Russell, F.R.S., stands on a hill a mile south-west of the town. Avon Castle, a modern house, the property of Colonel Ralph Peacock, V.D., C.E., stands in picturesque grounds on the banks of the Avon.

The tithing and chapelry of Bisterne, which includes the hamlet of Sandford, is in the south. The manor-house stands in a park of 150 acres.

The civil parish of Burley, covering 11,311 acres, is nearly as extensive as Ringwood. It was formed in 1868 from Burley Walk and Holmsley Walk, extra-parochial parts of the New Forest, together with the ancient vill of Burley. The ecclesiastical parish was formed in 1840 out of Ringwood. In 1876, by an Order of the Local Government Board, part of Ringwood was transferred to Burley. The parish has a soil of sandy loam and a subsoil of gravel and sand. The height above sea level varies from 150 ft. to 300 ft. There are 163 acres of arable land, 877 acres of permanent grass and 1,690½ acres of woods and plantations,<sup>2</sup> but by far the greater part of the parish is forest land. Burley Manor House, now occupied by Mr. Ellis Cunliffe Lister-Kay, stands in a park of 85 acres. Near Burley Lodge are some fine oak trees, known as the 'Twelve Apostles,' though not half that number now remains. Picket Post is the residence of Lord Lucas of Crudwell, and Old House, hard by, belongs to his sister, Miss Herbert. It was here that their father, Auberon Herbert, author of A Politician in Trouble about his Soul, put into practice his theories of the open-air life.

Among other notable people connected with Ringwood may be mentioned Joseph D'Arcy Sirr (1794–1868), author of a Memoir of Archbishop Trench, a Life of Archbishop Usher, and other works, who held the living; George Williams, the topographer of Jerusalem, who was vicar from 1869 until his death in 1878; and Joseph Ivimey, the Baptist minister and historian, born there in 1773.

There was an inclosure award in Ringwood in 1807.<sup>3</sup>

Earl Tostig held RINGWOOD before MANORS the Conquest, when it was assessed at 28 hides. In 1086, however, when it was royal demesne, it was assessed at nothing: all but 6 hides had been taken into the New Forest.<sup>4</sup> Part of the holding was in the Isle of Wight. During the 12th and early 13th centuries Ringwood, like other manors of which John and Henry III had the immediate overlordship, was frequently in new hands. Roland de Dinan, a Breton lord, was holding in 1167<sup>5</sup>; and he appears to have been succeeded by his nephew and eventual heir, Alan de Dinan, whose lands, however, were subsequently taken into the king's hands.<sup>6a</sup> In 1204 King John gave the manor to his servant, Theodoric the Teuton,<sup>6</sup> and in the following year a further mandate was issued to the sheriff to re-deliver seisin to Theodoric in case he had been disseised.<sup>7</sup> Before this, however, the manor had been held by Robert Fitz Parnel Earl of Leicester, after whose death in 1204 it passed to Joel de Meynell.<sup>8</sup> In March 1217 it was given to William Marshal the younger, afterwards second Earl of Pembroke, as part of the possessions of Seyer de Quinci Earl of Winchester,<sup>9</sup> who had married Margaret, one of Robert Fitz Parnel's daughters and co-heirs. A month later Marshal was ordered to restore the manor to Theodoric the Teuton,<sup>10</sup> and in 1223 the knights and free tenants of Ringwood were bound to answer to Waleran the Teuton during the king's pleasure.<sup>11</sup> In February 1226, however, the manor was restored to Richard Marshal third Earl of Pembroke, as the right of his wife Gervaise daughter and heir of the above-mentioned Alan de Dinan.<sup>12</sup> The earl's tenure was intermittent. In 1227 and again in 1231 he had fresh seisin,<sup>13</sup> because the manor had been in the king's hands, and in 1234, after Earl Richard's death, it was given to Simon de Steyland, king's clerk, until restored to the right heirs.<sup>14</sup> In the following year Gilbert Marshal fourth Earl of Pembroke assigned the issues of Ringwood to his sister-in-law, the Countess Eleanor, in part payment of £400 due to her<sup>15</sup>; but in 1237 Simon de Steyland, who a year previously was receiving compensation for the loss of the manor,<sup>16a</sup> had a fresh grant,<sup>16</sup> and in 1238 he was pardoned the rent of £10 yearly previously exacted.<sup>17</sup> Next year the manor was granted to Simon for life at the yearly rent of a sore sparrow-hawk.<sup>18</sup> In 1240 it was given to John son of Geoffrey and his heirs, being described as 'of the lands of the Bretons.'<sup>19</sup> This grant was repeated in 1257, with the addition of a provision for compensation in case the manor should be restored to the right heirs<sup>20</sup>; but the Marshals never again seem to have had an interest in the manor. John son of Geoffrey died about 1272, and his son John subsequently sold it without licence to Nicholas of Ely, Bishop of Winchester,<sup>21</sup> on which account it was taken into the king's hands,<sup>22</sup> but afterwards, in 1275, restored to the bishop, who did homage for the same.<sup>23</sup> Nicholas of Ely died in 1280, and in February of that year, during the voidance of the see of Winchester, the custody of the manor was given to Queen Eleanor of Castile.<sup>24</sup> In December John le Boteler surrendered his claim to it for £60 worth of land yearly,<sup>25</sup> and in 1292, Eleanor being dead, John son of Thomas was appointed custodian.<sup>26</sup> On the marriage of Edward I with Margaret the French king's sister in 1299 Ringwood was part of the dower of the new queen.<sup>27</sup> Margaret died in 1318 and the manor was assigned to Isabel queen of Edward II.<sup>28</sup> In January 1331 Ringwood and other manors which Isabel had previously surrendered were granted to William de Montagu, subsequently created Earl of Salisbury,<sup>29</sup> whose descendants with some intermission held it for more than two centuries. The earl died seised of the manor in 1344<sup>30</sup> and the issues were in 1344 restored to his widow, the Countess Katherine, who died so seised five years later.<sup>31</sup> William de Montagu second Earl of Salisbury died seised in 1397<sup>32</sup> and was succeeded by his nephew John, a zealous partisan of Richard II. He was beheaded in 1400 and his lands were escheated, but in 1404 Ringwood was restored for the maintenance of his son Thomas, a minor, afterwards restored as fourth Earl of Salisbury, and Eleanor his wife.<sup>33</sup> Meanwhile the manor had been farmed out for £200 a year to Thomas Earl of Kent, whose widow Alice was pardoned £100 of arrears in December 1405.<sup>34</sup> In 1427 Thomas Earl of Salisbury settled the manor<sup>35</sup> and died in 1428,<sup>36</sup> leaving an only daughter and heir Alice, whose husband Sir Richard Nevill was acknowledged Earl of Salisbury. In 1431 the manor was again conveyed to trustees.<sup>37</sup> Richard Earl of Salisbury, who was beheaded in 1460 on the day after the battle of Wakefield, was succeeded by his son Richard, the famous 'King-maker,' already Earl of Warwick by right of his wife.<sup>38</sup> After his death on Barnet Field in 1471 his estates were divided between his two daughters, and Ringwood passed to Isabel wife of George (Plantagenet) Duke of Clarence.<sup>39</sup> She died seised in 1476<sup>40</sup> and the duke in February 1478, after being attainted.<sup>41</sup> Their son Edward Plantagenet was barely three years old at his father's death, and within a month William Berkeley, squire of the body, was appointed steward of Ringwood and Christchurch during his minority.<sup>42</sup> In 1480 Berkeley was succeeded in office by Thomas (Grey) Marquess of Dorset,<sup>43</sup> but in 1484 the stewardship was given for life to the king's servant John Hoton.<sup>44</sup> Edward Plantagenet, who succeeded to the earldom of Warwick in 1492, became implicated in Perkin Warbeck's conspiracy and was beheaded on Tower Hill in November 1499, being subsequently attainted in 1504.<sup>45</sup> Ringwood thus came to the Crown, and in July 1510 William Belus was appointed bailiff, while in the following October Sir William Sandys was appointed steward.<sup>46</sup> In 1513 Warwick's sister, the Lady Margaret Pole, was restored in the earldom of Salisbury and the Montagu inheritance,<sup>47</sup> and at once appointed Sir Thomas Englefield steward of all her castles and lordships with a yearly rent of 40s. out of the manor of Ringwood.<sup>48</sup> After her attainder the stewardship was given in February 1541 to Sir Thomas Wriothesley.<sup>49</sup> In July 1547 the manor and hundred of Ringwood were given to Edward (Seymour), the newly created Duke of Somerset, to hold of the king by the fortieth part of a knight's fee.<sup>50</sup> This grant was repeated in 1550 after Somerset had been deprived of the office of Protector by Act of Parliament.<sup>51</sup> However, in 1553, after his attainder and death, Ringwood was given to Sir John Gates, a favoured servant of Edward VI.<sup>52</sup> Gates was not long to enjoy possession, however. By helping the cause of Lady Jane Grey he early in the new reign fell a victim to the fate that had overtaken so many of the lords of Ringwood.<sup>53</sup> Queen Mary at once granted the lands to Francis (Hastings) second Earl of Huntingdon, in virtue of the fact that his wife, Catherine Pole, was one of the heirs of the Countess of Salisbury.<sup>54</sup> The remainder was to the issue of Catherine with contingent remainders to the Countess Margaret's heirs. The earl died in 1561 and the countess, seised of the manor, in 1576.<sup>55</sup> In 1592 the manor and hundred of Ringwood were re-granted to their son Henry third Earl of Huntingdon and his heirs,<sup>56</sup> and he in the same year sold it to Richard Branthwayte,<sup>57</sup> who died in 1594, leaving a son and heir Thomas Branthwayte.<sup>58</sup> The history of the manor of Ringwood in the 17th century is uncertain, but it undoubtedly passed to the Arundells of Wardour and in 1728 was in the hands of Henry (Arundell) sixth Lord Arundell of Wardour.<sup>59</sup> His grandson Henry eighth Lord Arundell of Wardour<sup>60</sup> sold it in 1794 to John Morant of Brockenhurst<sup>61</sup> (q.v.), whose great-grandson,

An extent of the manor made at the end of the 13th century records the services due from the customary tenants. They paid £9 tallage. Their services included mowing the lord's meadow, hay-making on 8 acres in 'Muchelmershe,' carting the hay and making a rick; they were to repair the mills and the houses within the court.<sup>69</sup>

A 15th-century custumal quotes a lost Pipe Roll of the eighth year of Henry I to the effect that the tenants of the 'manor of Ringwood and Harbridge' had common rights in the New Forest, among the knights and esquires, for their farm beasts and plough beasts between 'Teg att Brokelisford' and 'Ostaven' and in the vill of Beaulieu for all their live stock except goats and geese: for this they paid the king an annual agistamentum called 'lesse.'<sup>68</sup>

The principal views were at Martinmas (11 November) and Hockday (Monday and Tuesday following the second Sunday after Easter).<sup>64</sup>

A mill in Ringwood is mentioned in the Domesday Survey and later there were two.<sup>65</sup> There was also a fulling-mill.<sup>66</sup> At the present day there is a corn-mill at the north of the town.

In the March of 1226 Henry III granted a weekly market in Ringwood on Wednesdays to Richard Marshal Earl of Pembroke and Gervaise his wife to hold until the king should come of age.<sup>67</sup> A market for corn, cattle and pigs is still held on Wednesdays.

In 1337 the Earl of Salisbury, as lord of Ringwood Manor, was granted a yearly fair on the vigil, feast and morrow of St. Andrew (30 November).<sup>68</sup> There was also another fair held on the feast of St. Peter (29 June) in the 16th century.<sup>69</sup> Fairs are now held on 10 July and 11 December.

BISTERNE (Betestre, xi cent.; Bettesthorne, xiii cent.) was held under the Confessor by Godric Malf in parage and by his sons in 1086. Of the 3 hides at which it was formerly assessed, one had been taken into the Forest.<sup>70</sup> The place gave its name to its early lords,<sup>71</sup> and the history of the manor is practically identical with that of the Bettesthorne or Bisterne moiety of Minstead (q.v.) until 1792, when John Compton sold the manor to William Mills.<sup>72</sup> The latter, who died in 1820, was followed at Bisterne by his son John Mills, verderer of the New Forest. To him succeeded in turn his sons, John, who died in 1899, and the MILLS of Bisterne. Gyroned of six pieces argent and azure a mill-rind sable.

Rev. Cecil Mills, M.A., who died in 1908, and was succeeded by his son, Mr. John Digby Mills, the present lord of the manor.

There is a legend, for the truth of which the name of 'Dragon Fields' would once have been held ample proof, that at Bisterne Sir Maurice Berkeley, son of Sir John Berkeley and Elizabeth de Bettesthorne, killed a dragon which had its home on Burley Beacon and greatly vexed the surrounding country. A document at Berkeley Castle, of a date earlier than 1618, tells the story.

Sr Moris Barkley the sonne of Sr John Barkley, of Beverston, beinge a man of great strength and courage, in his tyme there was bread in Hampshire neere Biatherne a devouring Dragon, who doing much mischief upon men and cattell and could not be destroyed but spoiled many in attempting it, making his den neere unto a Beacon. This Sr Moris Barkley armed himself and encountered with it and at length overcam and killed it but died himself soone after. This is the common saying even to this day in those parts of Hampshire, and the better to approve the same his children and posterity even to this present do beare for their Crest a Dragon standing before a burning beacon. Wch seemeth the rather more credible because Sr Morice Barkley did beare the Miter with this authentic seale of his armes as is heare underneath one of his own deedes exprest bearing date ye 10 of Henry 6 An Dni 1431.<sup>73</sup>

Like Bisterne CROW (Croue, xi cent.) was held of the Confessor by Godric Malf and by his sons of the Conqueror.<sup>74</sup> The subsequent descent was, however, different. There is no early record of a manor, but John de Burley, Sir Hugh Cheyne, Sir John Berkeley, and Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, all held there in the 13th and 14th centuries.<sup>75</sup> Richard Milbourne died seised of four messuages in Crow in 1451,<sup>76</sup> and was succeeded by his son Simon, who died in 1464, leaving a son Thomas, aged fifteen.<sup>77</sup> At Sir Thomas Milbourne's death in 1492 the estate, for the first time called a manor, was held of the manor of Ringwood.<sup>78</sup> Crow thus followed the same descent as Tangle (q.v.), passing at the death of Richard Milbourne, Sir Thomas's grandson, in 1532<sup>79</sup> to his second cousin William Fauconer of Drayton (co. Bucks.). In 1543, however, the manors again parted company, Fauconer selling Crow to William Button,<sup>80</sup> who died seised in 1547.<sup>81</sup> He left a son and heir of the same name, who dying in 1591 left a son and heir Ambrose, but settled Crow on his second son William.<sup>82</sup> William Button the third died seised of the manor in 1599.<sup>83</sup> He also left an heir William Button, but Crow subsequently passed to the Comptons of Minstead (q.v.) and Bisterne and thence with Bisterne to William Mills in 1792.<sup>84</sup> The two manors are now considered practically one.<sup>85</sup>

The history of NORTH ASHLEY, distinguished generally from the other Hampshire Ashleys as 'Ashley by Ringwood,' is somewhat obscure. The earliest certain reference to the place is in 1276,

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

when a grant of the lands of the late Roger de Longford, to be held during the minority of the heirs of Walter de Longford, was made to Wálter de Helyun.<sup>86</sup> Walter, however, shortly surrendered this custody,<sup>87</sup> which in 1280 was given to Hugh de Escote.<sup>88</sup> Who were the heirs of Longford does not appear. The Escotes themselves long held lands here, and Walter de Helyun may have been heir to that Geoffrey Hulon who was one of the three holders of the vill in 1316.<sup>89</sup>

Neither Hugh de Escote nor his heir is named in the Nomina Villarum, but about that date (1316) his wife Joan died seised of the manor of North Ashley, said to be held of Alan Plugenet.<sup>90</sup> She left a son and heir Walter de Escote, who died in 1341 holding land in North Ashley of Elizabeth de Burgh.<sup>91</sup> In 1350 his son Sir Hugh de Escote granted the manor to William de Overton,<sup>92</sup> who died seised about 1361.<sup>93</sup> He left a son and heir Thomas (vide West Tytherley), but North Ashley was carried by his daughter Isabel to her husband Thomas Warner, and in 1379 it was settled on him and his second wife Joan and the heirs of their bodies.<sup>94</sup> Accordingly, at Warner's death in 1407 the manor passed to his grandson Thomas Sandys the son of Walter Sandys and Agnes his daughter by Joan,<sup>95</sup> instead of to his other grandson and heir, Thomas Tawke,<sup>96</sup> who really had the better claim to it, being the son of one of Isabel de Overton's daughters. From Thomas Sandys, who died seised in 1442,<sup>97</sup> the manor descended to his heirs the Lords Sandys of the Vyne,<sup>98</sup> who held of Thomas Brune and his heirs.<sup>99</sup> It appears, however, to have been made over to the Oke- dens, lords of neighbouring manors, for in 1604, when William Okenen sold the manors of Somerley and North Ashley to Sir William Dodington, a yearly rent-charge of £12 or 11*d.* was to be paid for North Ashley to William Lord Sandys.<sup>100</sup>

About 1310 Richard de Bucksgate died seised of the manor of North Ashley, held of Hugh de Escote,<sup>101</sup> leaving a son and heir Adam, who six years later was one of the three parcenaries of the vill.<sup>102</sup>

He died in 1333, holding by the same tenure, and leaving three daughters, Joan wife of Thomas de Byndon, Helen wife of Richard de Bettesthorpe and Katherine wife of Giles de Escote.<sup>103</sup> Of their portions nothing certain can be said concerning that of Katherine; that of Helen de Bettesthorpe is presumably the land in Ashley of which Margaret de Bettesthorpe died seised in 1350.<sup>104</sup> It was afterwards considered a whole manor and followed the same descent as Bisterne (q.v.).

In 1336 Thomas de Bindon and his wife Joan, Adam de Bucksgate's eldest co-heir, fined with Richard de Kingston to the intent to entail their land in Ashley on their heirs.<sup>105</sup> In 1390 Edith, the widow of their eldest son Thomas de Bindon, granted the manor of North Ashley to Thomas de Godyton of Chale and Alice his wife and the heirs and assigns of Alice.<sup>106</sup>

The Ludlows were holding this manor in 1492, when William Ludlow and Elizabeth his wife granted therefrom an annuity of 5 marks to Thomas Ludlow and Magdalen Lambard.<sup>107</sup> In 1570 John Ludlow settled it on himself, his wife Dorothy and his heirs, and died seised at North Ashley in 1614.<sup>108</sup> His heir was his kinsman, Joshua Aylmer, but the manor appears to have been immediately disposed of, for in 1619 Edward Curll of the Middle Temple sold it to Samuel Lynch of Whiteparish. In 1627 Samuel Lynch again sold it to Herbert Dodington, after whose death it was held by his father, Sir William Dodington, who died in 1638,<sup>109</sup> and the manor henceforward followed the same descent as Somerley in Harbridge (q.v.).

The third part of the vill of North Ashley held in 1316 by John Marshal was parcel of, if not identical with, the manor of Somerley in Harbridge and followed the same descent.<sup>110</sup>

There was a water-mill in the manor of North Ashley held by Richard de Bucksgate and his heirs and afterwards by the Ludlows and the Dodingtons.<sup>111</sup> Two mills are mentioned in a fine, dated 1398, of land which probably belonged to the same manor, as also in an earlier fine to which Thomas de Bindon and Joan, Adam de Bucksgate's co-heir, were parties.<sup>112</sup>

In 1313 William de Laybrooke had licence to grant a messuage, 32 acres of land, 27 acres of meadow, 6 acres of pasture, 5 acres of wood, 200 acres of heath and 5 marks rent in Ringwood, held in chief, to Walter de Feryngford and for Walter to regrant the same to William and his wife Eustasia and his heirs,<sup>113</sup> which was accordingly done.<sup>114</sup> This, doubtless, was the manor of LAYBROOKE which in 1480 Thomas Semer (Seymour) and Joan his wife quitclaimed to William Boket and his heirs.<sup>115</sup> This manor was not long afterwards in the possession of Henry Brydges, who in 1519 settled it on himself and his wife Margery and their heirs, with remainder in default to the heirs of Margery.<sup>116</sup> Henry Brydges died about 1538,<sup>117</sup> leaving a son and heir Sir Richard, who by his will proved in 1558<sup>118</sup> left Laybrooke to his son and heir Anthony. In 1575 Anthony Brydges sold the manor to Richard Lyne,<sup>119</sup> to whom in 1586 Roger Lyne quitclaimed.<sup>120</sup> Richard Lyne, nephew apparently of the Richard just mentioned,<sup>121</sup> died seised of the manor in 1599.<sup>122</sup> From this date onwards Laybrooke Manor disappears from the records until 1830, when it was held by James Edward (Harris) Viscount Fitz Harris, afterwards third Earl of Malmesbury.<sup>123</sup> It is now merged in the Heron Court estate. The Lynes, however, had land here well on in the 18th century.<sup>124</sup>

BURLEY was anciently royal demesne and a bailiwick of the New Forest.<sup>125</sup> The manor is said to have been in the king's hands down to the time of James I, but after that there are no evidences for its history. To whom it was first granted is uncertain, but in 1624 the king gave William Holt and William Gwynn, for thirty-one years, all swainmote courts and their profits and all rents called 'le lees rents,' that is to say, money, oats and eggs which the inhabitants of the hundreds of Christchurch, Ringwood and Fordingbridge and Burley vill were accustomed to pay yearly for their cattle, pigs, &c., depastured in the lordship and bailiwick of Burley.<sup>126</sup>

The bailiwick of Burley was held in the 18th century by the Paulets, Dukes of Bolton and Marquesses of Winchester,<sup>127</sup> and is now claimed by the Earl of Portsmouth.<sup>128</sup>

In 1551 John Mill died seised of a moiety of the manor of Burley, leaving a son and heir George,<sup>129</sup> and less than four years later John Batten died seised of the other moiety, leaving a son and heir William.<sup>130</sup> These moieties came to be known as the manors of BURLEY MILLS and BURLEY BATTEN and both were in the hands of William Batten at his death in 1607.<sup>131</sup> They have since been held together. William Batten left a son and heir

Anthony, and although records are scanty during the 17th century it is evident that the Battens continued to hold the manor. Another William was holding early in the 18th century,<sup>132</sup> and in 1723 Frances Batten his widow, William Batten and Judith his wife, and James Batten conveyed the manors to John Powell.<sup>133</sup> Some years later they became the property of Sir Thomas Ridge, and by 1776 of Colonel John Carnac.<sup>134</sup> In 1852 Charles Shaw-Lefevre, afterwards Viscount Eversley, sold the Burley Manor estate to Colonel Esdaile, whose nephew, the Rev. William Esdaile, is now lord of the manor.<sup>135</sup>

In 1251 it was notified that whereas Richard de Burley, sometime bailiff of the bailiwick of BURLEY, was adjudged to have forfeited the same for trespass, the king had of his special grace re-granted him the bailiwick, together with all lands both of the old enfeoffment as of the purprestures made by Richard in the royal demesne, to be held by him and his heirs during good conduct.<sup>136</sup>

In 1316 the vill of Burley, part of the dower of Queen Margaret, was held by Richard de Burley,<sup>137</sup> and in 1361 John de Burley died seised of tenements there held in chief and paying rent at the manor of Lyndhurst.<sup>138</sup> His possessions were divided between his daughters Margery and Alice wife of Henry Old.<sup>139</sup> The moiety belonging to the latter was probably the so-called manor of OLDES, which made its appearance in the 17th and 18th centuries.<sup>140</sup>

There was a water corn-mill belonging to the manors of Burley Batten and Burley Mills.<sup>141</sup> This seems no longer to exist, but is probably commemorated in Mill Lawn and Mill Lawn Brook.

The church of ST. PETER AND CHURCHES ST. PAUL is a large modern structure built upon the site of an older one in 1853, and consisting of a chancel with a north vestry, a central tower, north and south transepts, nave with aisles, and a south porch, the whole building being of late 13th and early 14th-century design. The chancel is lit by ranges of large lancet windows to north and south, with polished marble detached shafts common in each case to the jambs of a pair of windows, and in the east wall are three grouped lancets. The transepts contain large galleries, and in that to the north is the organ. The nave is of four bays. There is no clearstory. The windows of the aisles have plain geometrical tracery. The tower rises above the roof two stages, and has an embattled parapet pierced with quatrefoils. The second stage is reached by a vice in the angle of the chancel and south transept. The belfry has a pair of traceried and shafted two-light windows on each side.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

At the south-east of the chancel is a large double piscina of late 12th-century date, with an arch of two orders, the outer being heavily moulded and having a label and jamb shafts, while the inner order has a trefoiled head. It was removed from the old church and reset. At the south-west of the chancel is a brass of 15th-century date somewhat mutilated, and having lost its inscription. It is that of John Prophete, Dean of Hereford and York, 1416; his figure is nearly perfect, and wears an alb and almuce, over which is a cope fastened at the throat with a morse ornamented with a vernicle. The orphreys of the cope are embroidered with niches in which are the figures of St. George, St. Bartholomew, St. Christopher, St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Winifred (the only one whose name is inscribed), St. Catherine, St. Mary, and St. John the Baptist. Over the head of the figure is a mutilated cinquefoiled canopy, and the slab has the indents of the rest of the canopy, a marginal inscription and four shields. There are also a number of 18th-century monuments removed from the old church. In the north transept is a large marble wall monument of the composite order to John Willis 1727, Anne his wife 1716, also Elizabeth and Robert, their son and daughter; also John Willis 1729, the second son, who erected the monument; James Willis 1755, and John his son 1779. There is a shield of their arms Party fessewise gules and argent three lions countercoloured and a border ermine. In the same part of the church is another large monument with a shield of his arms to Henry Compton, 1724; Eleanor his widow, who afterwards married Charles Bave, 1742; Henry Compton, his nephew, heir of the above Eleanor, 1786, and Lucretia (Mills) his wife 1771. In the gallery over is a well-designed wall monument, with plain pilasters and a broken curved pediment, to Mr. Bartholomew Layton of London, merchant, 1681, and Anne his wife 1702; also Joseph their son, 'late vicar of this parish.' Of his arms only a fesse between three crosslets fitchy remains. In the south transept is a large plain monument to George Bright 1768, Elizabeth his wife 1725, and their sons George 1753, Francis 1782, John 1725, and their daughter Elizabeth 1723; and also to other later members of the family.

The tower contains eight bells, the treble and tenor cast, the other recast in 1764 by Mears & Stainbank.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of the late 16th century, a paten, pair of flagons and almsdish of 1664, all given by Richard Branthwayte; a chalice of 1836 and two other patens, one of 1871 and the other of 1900.

The registers are as follows: (i) all entries 1561 to 1684 (last entries incomplete); (ii) baptisms 1692 to 1761, marriages 1688 to 1754, and burials 1682 to 1761. Marriages are continued in four printed books, 1754 to 1767, 1767 to 1787, 1787 to 1800, and 1800 to 1812; baptisms and burials in two further books, (1) both entries 1762 to 1782; (2) baptisms from 1784 to 1812, and burials 1782 to 1812.

The church of ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, Burley, is a plain brick building, consisting of chancel, nave, vestry, south porch and western bell-cote containing one bell. It was built in 1839 and added to in 1886-7.

The church of ST. PAUL, Bisterne, was built in 1842 of brick with stone dressings in the Gothic style of the period. It consists of clearstoried nave of five bays, aisles, north porch and tower with spire containing one bell.

The church of Ringwood is mentioned in the Great Survey as having half a hide in almoign belonging to it.<sup>142</sup> The advowson was at first held by the lord of the manor, and in 1219 the king was presenting by reason of the lands of the Bretons (vide supra) being in his hands.<sup>143</sup> In 1273 John son of John, to whose father the manor had been granted in 1240 (vide supra), was disputing the royal right.<sup>144</sup> Judgement was given in favour of Edward I, and he and his successors presented for the next fifty years.<sup>145</sup> In 1329, by the intervention of Roger de Mortimer Earl of March, the advowson of Ringwood was granted to the monks of Beaulieu to find four monks to pray for the soul of Edward II.<sup>146</sup> This was revoked in 1332<sup>147</sup> and the advowson went like the manor to the Montagus. There was an echo of this affair in 1351 when the Earl of Salisbury brought a suit against the abbot for hindering him from presenting and judgement was given for the earl.<sup>148</sup> In 1336 William de Montagu founded his priory at Bisham (co. Berks.) and Ringwood Church and an acre of land were among the premises with which he was to endow it.<sup>149</sup> He seems to have changed his mind, however, and Ringwood remained in the gift of his family until 1445, when Richard Nevill Earl of Salisbury and his wife Alice sold the advowson to the provost and scholars of King's College, Cambridge, to whom it now belongs.<sup>150</sup>

In 1291 the church of Ringwood was assessed at £66 13s. 4d.<sup>151</sup>

In 1541 certain yearly pensions from Ringwood, in common with many other churches, which had formerly belonged to St. Swithun's, and been known as the 'penticostalls,' were granted to the Dean and chapter of Winchester.<sup>152</sup>

hands of the lord of the manor of Bisterne.<sup>154</sup> In 1535 the clear yearly value of this chantry was £6 5s.,<sup>155</sup> the sum being given later as £6 0s. 8d. and £6 2s. 8d.<sup>156</sup> It was situated 2 miles from the parish church and was used as a chapel of ease.<sup>157</sup> In 1550 it was given to William Winlow and Richard Feld,<sup>158</sup> and in 1578 lands belonging to the chapel of Bisterne were granted to Sir Edward Horsey.<sup>159</sup>

The modern living of Bisterne is a chapelry annexed with the rectory of Harbridge to the vicarage of Ringwood and is in the gift of King's College, Cambridge.

The ecclesiastical parish of Burley was created in 1840, the living being in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester, from whom it was transferred in 1872 to the vicar of Ringwood, the present patron.<sup>160</sup>

The Nonconformist cause in Ringwood dates from 1662. The present Congregational church was erected in 1866, the Wesleyan chapel in 1872. There are also a Unitarian chapel, Salvation Army barracks and a mission hall. At Crow is a Wesleyan chapel, at Kingston a Congregational chapel with schools attached, and at Poulner a Baptist chapel.

There is a Congregational chapel at Burley, where is also the Moorhill Ministers' Home of Rest open to ministers, evangelists, missionaries and ministerial students of the Congregational, Baptist and Presbyterian denominations.

There is an elementary (mixed) school, built in 1848 for 560 children. It is partly supported by the endowment of the old Free school (see Charities), where Bishop Stillingfleet was educated.<sup>161</sup> There is also another elementary school for 300 children. At Bisterne is a school built in 1840 for 40 girls and infants. The boys attend at Ringwood.

The school at Burley was built in 1854 to accommodate 120 children.

Charities for the poor.—Thomas CHARITIES Lyne by will dated 7 May 1621 (inter alia) devised an annuity of £3 for the poor charged on the tithes of a farm at Bradford and land called Whitehall, Burley, applied in the distribution of bread or clothing.

In 1722 Richard Lyne (as appeared from the church tablet) gave an annual sum of 25s. to the poor of Hightown and Poulner, which is now paid by the Rev. William Esdaile, the owner of a piece of land in Burley charged therewith.

The same tablet also mentioned that John Lyne gave £14 yearly arising out of an estate at Kingston called Waterman's, applicable in the payment of 10s. monthly to the vicar for preaching a sermon preparatory to receiving the sacrament, and 10s. monthly to poor communicants, and £2 yearly for the poor of Bisterne Closes in Burley. The annuity is paid by Mr. John Morant of Brockenhurst Park.

Charity of Thomas Brown founded by will 4 February 1667 and re-established by deed of 11 May 1802 executed under the direction of the Court of Chancery (see under Christchurch). The share of this parish amounts to about £10 a year, of which 10s. is paid to the incumbent for a sermon and the residue in clothes, bread or otherwise.

John Dodington's Charity.—(See under Breamore.) The churchwardens receive from Sir Edward Hulse the sum of £5 every fourth year, which is applied as the occasion requires in binding of poor children apprentice.

John Thaine, as mentioned in the church tablet, gave to the poor an annuity of 5s. charged on land in Upmead, now the property of Mr. John Morant.

In 1621 Richard Garrett by will gave an annuity of 20s. for providing three coats for three poor men yearly. It is paid by the tenant of Bradford Farm and applied in clothing.

In 1660 Jane Burch by will left £20 for the poor to be invested in land, with which was purchased a rent-charge of 20s. on 23 and 25 Butcher's Row, Salisbury.

preferred) on St. Thomas's Day. The legacy was invested in £50 9s. 10d. consols, producing yearly £1 5s. 2d., which is usually applied in gifts of 6d. each to poor widows.

In 1875 Miss Sarah Carter by deed (enrolled 27 October) conveyed to trustees land in Christchurch Street and buildings thereon as a lecture hall and reading room, which is maintained by the rents received from various societies using the same.

Charities connected with the Protestant chapel called St. Thomas', situated in Meeting House Lane.—The above-mentioned William Clark by his will left £1,500 for the minister of this chapel, £200 for the poor in bread on Christmas Day, £400 for the organist, £400 to be called the Charity School Fund and £100 for providing Testaments, psalms and hymn books. As the result of proceedings in the Court of Chancery in 1845 in the cause of the 'Attorney-General v. Clark and another' a sum of £2,304 18s. 3d. consols was arrived at as belonging to the charities, and in 1867 was transferred to the official trustees, of which fifteen-twenty-sixths, or £1,329 15s. 3d. consols, is apportioned for the minister on condition that such minister should declare his belief in the pre-existence of Jesus Christ before His birth, failing such declaration to buy bread, blankets or clothes or fuel for the poor of Ringwood; two-twenty-sixths, or £177 6s., for bread; four-twenty-sixths, or £354 12s., for organist; one-twenty-sixth, or £88 13s., for books; and four-twenty-sixths, or £354 12s., for education (see under Educational Charities below).

In 1872 Mrs. Sarah Adams by her will proved at Winchester 19 December bequeathed certain charitable legacies for purposes connected with the same chapel. The trust funds are now represented by £1,011 4s. India 3 per cent. stock, producing annually £30 6s. 8d., of which five-elevenths is payable to the minister, provided that he shall not be a Trinitarian, two-elevenths for the support of the day school (see under Educational Charities below), two-elevenths for the repairs and decorations of the chapel, and one-eleventh to be distributed in money among poor and indigent members of the congregation, and one-eleventh for extraordinary repairs of the chapel or otherwise towards promoting the cause of religion therein.

The trustees also receive the dividends of a sum of £179 4s. 8d. consols, arising under the will of Christopher Lake, dated 6 December 1735, which is applied towards the support of the minister and 'supplies.'

Wesleyan Methodist Chapel at Crow Hill.—George Pittman Shorey by deed dated 24 November 1865 settled certain real estate for the benefit of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in connexion with this chapel and for the poor of the society and congregation of the said chapel, in moieties for each purpose, in trust for which the official trustees hold the sum of £97 6s. 3d. India 3 per cent. stock, arising from sale of land. In 1908 new trustees were appointed and the legal estate vested in the official trustee of charity lands.

Thomas Lyne by will of 7 May 1621 charged the tithes of a farm known as Bradford Farm in Wimborne Minster and lands called Whitehall at Burley with an annuity of £6 for a poor scholar from Ringwood Free School at Oxford or Cambridge for four years, or failing such, a scholar from Wimborne Minster or Sherborne Grammar Schools.

At the time of the Domesday Survey the Hampshire portion of Bramshaw, Brockenhurst and Minstead was entered under the hundred of 'Rodedic.' Lyndhurst and Boldre were included in the hundred of Boldre, while no mention is found of Linwood, which was probably then included in Godshill, which, if the identification be correct, appears under Rodedic Hundred.<sup>2</sup> Some time before 1316 the hundred of the New Forest was formed from parts of Rodedic and Boldre Hundreds, and it then included the vills of Ippley, Buttessashe, Langley, Holebury, Hordle, Warborne, Pilley, Battramsley, Wooton, Burley, Linwood, Godshill, Nova Villa, Fritham, Canterton, Minstead, Bartley, Lyndhurst, Brockenhurst and Brookley.<sup>3</sup> The hundred remained practically unchanged until 1662,<sup>4</sup> but between that date and 1831 the portion of the parish of Fawley hitherto included in the hundred of the New Forest was transferred to that of Bishop's Waltham.<sup>5</sup> Since 1831 Minstead and Lyndhurst have been removed to Thorngate Hundred.

The extra-parochial district of Linwood, except for its insertion under this hundred in 1831, belongs properly to Fordingbridge Hundred, and is now a detached portion of Ellingham (q.v.).

The hundred, as far as is known, has always remained in the hands of the Crown. The courts, presided over, until the early part of the 19th century, when the office was abolished, by the Under Steward of the Forest, were held at Lyndhurst.

BOLDRE

Boore (xi cent.) ; Bolre (xiii cent.).

Boldre is a large parish in the New Forest extending inland 3 miles north of the Solent, containing 10,370 acres of land, of which 63 are covered with water.<sup>1</sup>

The Beaulieu River forms the eastern boundary of the parish, while the western boundary is formed for some distance by the Boldre or Lymington River, which is tidal as high as Vicars Hill. This river flows through the centre of the village, rendering it at times liable to floods. The Lymington branch of the London and South Western Railway crosses the parish in the extreme west, but the nearest station is Brockenhurst,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles distant.

The church, in which Southey married his second wife, Catherine Bowles, is a picturesque old building situated in an isolated spot a mile from the village. John Kempe, one of the members of the Long Parliament, is buried in the church. The Rev. William Gilpin, ancestor of William Sawney Gilpin, the first president of the Water Colour Society, was vicar at Boldre from 1771 to 1804. He established schools in Boldre for twenty boys and twenty girls and endowed them with the proceeds of the sale of his drawings and sketches. Dr. William Arnold Bromfield, the botanist, was a native of Boldre. The Rev. Charles Kingsley, father of Charles Kingsley, the author, lived at Battramsley House.

Among houses to be noticed in the parish are Boldre Grange, the residence of Mr. John Lane Shrubbs, from which views of the Solent may be obtained ; Warborne House, belonging to Mr. David Jones, J.P., with 300 acres attached ; Vicars Hill, occupied by Mr. Edward Henry Pember, K.C., J.P. ; and St. Austins, the residence of Mr. Keppel Pulteney. Walhampton House is the property and residence of Miss Morrison. George III visited Walhampton in 1804 and dined with Sir Harry Burrard Neale. One of the old houses in the village, the date of which, 1692, is cut in a stone tablet in one of the rooms, has been described by a modern writer as 'a small old picturesque red brick house with high pitched roof and tall chimneys, a great part of it overrun with ivy and creepers, the walls and tiled roof stained by time and many coloured lichen to a richly variegated red. . . . In the front there is no lawn, but a walled plot of ground with old ornamental trees and bushes symmetrically placed—yews, both spreading and cypress shaped, Irish yew and tall tapering juniper and arbor vitæ . . . a sort of formal garden which has thrown off its formality.'<sup>2</sup>

Crops of wheat, barley and oats are grown on the 1,893 acres of arable land, 1,647 acres consist of pasture land, and there are 2,257 of woodland.<sup>3</sup> The soil is clay and loam, the subsoil gravel.

East Boldre, 5 miles east from Lymington, is an ecclesiastical parish formed in 1840 from the civil parish of Boldre. It contains  $84\frac{1}{2}$  acres of arable land and  $59\frac{1}{2}$  acres of permanent grass.<sup>4</sup>

South Baddesley is an ecclesiastical parish, consisting of 3,000 acres, formed in 1859 from the civil parish of Boldre, and it includes the hamlets of East End Norley, Pitts Deep and Lisle Court. From Pylewell Park, consisting of 228 acres, the residence of Mr. William Ingham Whitaker, the lord of the manor, good views of the Solent may be obtained. Newton Park is the seat of Mr. Jules Duplessis.

Sway, consisting of 2,208 acres, was formed in 1839 from the civil parish of Boldre, and in 1879 was made a separate parish for all purposes. There is a station on the London and South Western Railway. There are 635 acres of arable land,  $527\frac{1}{2}$  acres of permanent grass and 27 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>5</sup> Sway House is the residence of Mrs. Hagen, The Mount of Lord Arthur Cecil, and Shirley Holmes of Col. William Henry Burton, R.E.

At the Conquest two manors called MANORS BOLDRE were held by a certain Pagen, as they had been held by two allodial owners in the time of the Confessor.<sup>6</sup> This land, with the exception of 6 acres of meadow held by Hugh de Quintin, was taken by the Conqueror into the New Forest, and no further mention of a manor is found.

In 1236 Henry III granted 50 acres of heath round Boldre to the monastery of Breamore in compensation for the loss they had suffered by the foundation of the abbey of Beaulieu. With the grant went the right to inclose the same and hold it 'free of view of foresters saving the king's venison.'<sup>7</sup>

Before the Conquest 1 hide in Boldreford, assessed at £10, was held by Wislac of the king. It was taken into the forest, except 2 acres of meadow which Hugh de Quintin held. This has been identified by Mr. Moens as The Shallows, south of Boldre Bridge and about a mile above Lymington. There is still a 'Boldreford Bridge' two or three miles up-stream beyond Brockenhurst.<sup>8</sup>

In 1086 SOUTH BADDESLEY was held as 1 hide by Durand of Earl Roger of Shrewsbury, as it had been held by Suarting in the time of the Confessor.<sup>9</sup> It no doubt escheated to the Crown on the forfeiture of the estates of Robert of Bellesme, son of Earl Roger, in the reign of Henry I, and from this date the overlordship followed the descent of the manor of Lyndhurst until the end of the 14th century.

The first record of Baddesley after the Survey is early in the reign of Henry III, when Geoffrey de Baddesley was stated to be holding half a carucate of land in Baddesley and Fritham by a rent of 60s.<sup>10</sup> This probably included the manor of Baddesley. Some time during the next century, however, it passed to the family of Welles, and in 1316 Henry de Welles rendered feudal service for the vill of Baddesley.<sup>11</sup> He died seized of the manor in 1353, and the same year John his heir, son of Thomas de Welles, probably brother of Henry, and Cicely his wife granted it to William Edendon, Bishop of Winchester.<sup>12</sup> In 1383 John de Edendon brought a suit against Ralph Cheyne and Joan his wife for the recovery of the manor of Baddesley in possession of which he alleged he had been confirmed by royal writ.<sup>19</sup> The suit was postponed and the result does not appear.

The next recorded owner of the manor is John Lisle, who died seised of it in 1429, leaving a son and heir John.<sup>18</sup> John Lisle was followed by a son and grandson named respectively Nicholas and John. The latter died without children at the end of the 15th century, when his sister Eleanor, who had married John Kingston, became his heir, and in 1539, after her, her daughter Mary, who had married a Sir Thomas Lisle, died seised of the manor.<sup>14</sup> On the death of her husband three years later one moiety of the property was divided between the descendants of Margery (Rogers),<sup>15</sup> sister of Sir Nicholas Lisle, Thomas Dennys her great-grandson, Joan her granddaughter, who had married Christopher Morgan, and John Samborne, her other great-grandson.<sup>16</sup> By the failure of issue in this branch of the family this moiety before 1556 passed to Thomas Philpott, who had inherited the other moiety as the great-grandson of Anne (Philpott) younger sister of Margery (Rogers). Thomas died possessed of the manor in 1586,<sup>18</sup> and was succeeded by a son George, whose son John, owing to pecuniary difficulties, leased his manor of South Baddesley in 1625 to John Lord St. John of Basing for sixteen years.<sup>19</sup>

John Philpott was convicted of recusancy in 1628, but appears to have been allowed to retain his estates, as on his death in 1637 South Baddesley passed to his son and heir Henry,<sup>20</sup> whose property was, however, shortly afterwards forfeited for delinquency, though he obtained his discharge in 1646.<sup>21</sup> Henry was holding the manor jointly with his wife in 1650,<sup>22</sup> and it apparently remained in this family<sup>23</sup> until it passed, probably by purchase, to Henry (Arundell), Baron Arundell at the beginning of the 18th century.<sup>24</sup> He died in 1746, and was succeeded by his eldest son Henry, who was followed in 1756 by Henry eighth Baron Arundell, who sold the manor in 1781 to Ascanius Williams,<sup>25</sup> by whom it was conveyed in 1787 to Thomas Robins.<sup>26</sup> In 1802 it was bought by Thomas Weld of Lulworth, who settled it in that year on the Hon. Charlotte Stourton, fourth daughter of Charles Philip sixteenth Lord Stourton, on her marriage with his second son Joseph.<sup>27</sup> From the Weld family it passed about the middle of the century for a few years to that of Peacocke, from whom it was purchased by Mr. Williams Freeman in 1853. He sold it in 1875 to Mr. Whitaker, whose son Mr. J. Ingham Whitaker, J.P., is the present owner.<sup>28</sup>

At the Conquest BAT-TRAMSLEY, consisting of 2 hides assessed at £3, was held jointly by Saulf and Alfric. This land was taken into the forest with the exception of 4 acres which Saulf was allowed to retain.<sup>29</sup>

After the Survey no further mention is found of Battramsley until 1296, when one messuage and 1 carucate of land and 25s. 4d. rent in Battramsley were held by Alice Foucher,<sup>30</sup> from whom they passed to her daughter Margery before 1325.<sup>31</sup> In this year the latter obtained permission to grant the property, which was held by the payment of 20s. yearly at the court of the king at Lyndhurst and suit every three weeks, to John Blakedon and Alice his wife and their issue with contingent remainder to Margery and her heirs.<sup>32</sup> Before 1345 the estate had passed to Walter de Russington and Joan his wife,<sup>33</sup> who appear to have conveyed it to Walter Patricke, who was in possession in 1363.<sup>34</sup> The history of the next two centuries is obscure. Record is found of small estates in Battramsley held by various families, but the first actual mention of manorial rights is in 1542, when the manor of Battramsley was conveyed by John Arney to John Mill,<sup>35</sup> purchaser and grantee of other estates in the parish. It remained in this family until the death of Richard Mill without issue in 1613.<sup>36</sup> His wife Mary, who survived him, married as her second husband Thomas Wroughton, and they jointly conveyed the manor in 1622 to George Wroughton,<sup>37</sup> probably brother or son. This is the last actual mention of manorial rights, and it is obvious that the manor was split up into many small holdings. In 1670 William Burrard appeared before the justice seat held at Lyndhurst in 1670 to assert his claim to an ancient messuage and 60 acres of land in Battramsley.<sup>38</sup> In 1765 the site of the manor was in the possession of William Buckler,<sup>39</sup> who held it certainly till 1771.<sup>40</sup> It passed in 1779<sup>41</sup> to Sir Andrew Snape Hamond, captain in the navy, who was created a baronet in 1783 for his services in the American war.

After this no further record of the manorial existence of Battamsley is found, but Battamsley House and property undoubtedly mark the site of the capital messuage.

A mill in Battamsley is mentioned in 1296,<sup>42</sup> in 1324,<sup>43</sup> and again in 1348,<sup>44</sup> probably the water-mill which passed with the manor to John Mill in 1542,<sup>45</sup> but no later record of it is found.

There is no mention of HEYWOOD in the Domesday Survey, but in December 1361 Nicholas de Pershute died seised of lands in Heywood, 22 acres of pasture land with appurtenances which passed to his son Nicholas,<sup>46</sup> and ten years later Edmund de Kendal, kt., died seised of four messuages and 6 acres of land in Heywood.<sup>47</sup>

At the Dissolution the manor of Heywood appears among the lands of the dissolved priory of Breamore,<sup>48</sup> though there is no evidence to show how it came into the possession of this house. The priory, including the manor of Heywood, was granted to Henry Marquess of Winchester and Gertrude his wife in 1536,<sup>49</sup> but reverted to the Crown on the execution of the former in 1538, followed by the attainder of his wife in 1539. It was then allotted to Anne of Cleves as part of her dower, but again came into the king's hands on the dissolution of her marriage in 1540,<sup>50</sup> and was granted in 1544 to Thomas Hobson,<sup>51</sup> who the same year obtained licence to alienate it to John Mill and Richard his son.<sup>52</sup> It remained in the latter family (vide Pilley) until the death of Richard Mill without issue in 1613. His wife Mary, who survived him, married as her second husband Thomas Wroughton, and in 1617 they jointly conveyed the manor to George Wroughton.<sup>53</sup> In 1630 it passed by fine to John Kempe,<sup>54</sup> and was carried by the marriage of Frances daughter and co-heir of Thomas Kempe (possibly brother of John) to Henry Bromfield of Chawcroft, verderer of the New Forest, bow-bearer to Charles II, who died seised of it in 1682. From him it passed in succession to his son and grandson, both named Henry.<sup>55</sup> The estate remained in this family until 1773, when it was sold by the Rev. John Trenchard

Mention is made in 1558 of a corn-mill adjoining Heywood Farm,<sup>58</sup> probably the one still existing in 1809,<sup>59</sup> and there is also record of a windmill in 1601.<sup>60</sup> Heywood mill still exists in the parish.

There was an estate in Baddesley known as NORTHLEGH (Norley, xvii cent.), the first notice of which is found in 1306, when Edward I granted 100 acres of waste land in 'Northlegh by Baddesley' to Hugh de Ristone, to hold by a rent of 16s. 8d.<sup>61</sup> This land reverted to the king, presumably on the death of Hugh, and was then granted to John de Leith to hold on the same condition.<sup>62</sup> Before 1353, however, it had passed to Henry de Welles, lord of the manor of South Baddesley, who died seised of it in that year,<sup>63</sup> and its further descent is identical with that manor (q.v.).

Record is found in the Domesday Survey of three holdings in PILLEY (Pistelei, xi cent.; Pylele, xiv cent.). Of these the largest, consisting of 1 hide and assessed at 30s., was held by Edric of the king, half a hide, assessed at 15s., was held by Alric, and Hugh de Quintin held 1½ virgates, assessed at 10s., of Hugh de Port. The whole of this land was taken into the New Forest except 6 acres of meadow which Hugh de Quintin was allowed to retain.<sup>64</sup>

It is impossible to say with certainty which of these estates developed later into the manor of Pilley, which was held of the king's manor of Kingwood,<sup>65</sup> but it may fairly be assumed that it was the largest, that held by Edric.

Pilley probably gave its name to the first owners of the land, though no mention is made of a family of this name before 1316, when Roger de Pilley appears as joint owner with John de Wereburn of the vill of Pilley.<sup>66</sup> The former died in 1337,<sup>67</sup> and in 1376 Richard Pilley, presumably his son, enfeoffed John de Pullo of one messuage and 50 acres of land worth 6s. 8d. in Pilley held by the service of guarding nineteen cows and one bull in the New Forest.<sup>68</sup> During the 15th century record is found of small estates held by various families,<sup>69</sup> but the first actual mention of a manor in Pilley is in 1505, when it was in the possession of Roger Filey, who left as heir a niece Joan, aged nine years, daughter of his elder brother John.<sup>70</sup> In 1547 John Filey sold the manor to John Mill.<sup>71</sup> It remained in this family (vide Nursling) until the death of Richard Mill in 1613.<sup>73</sup> His wife Mary, who survived him, married as her second husband Thomas Wroughton, and in 1617 they jointly conveyed the manor to George Wroughton,<sup>74</sup> who may have been a brother of Thomas, from whom it seems to have passed to William Goldwyer, who died seised of the site of the manor of Pilley, leaving a son and heir William.<sup>74</sup> After this no further mention is found of the manor until 1726, when it was conveyed by John Chetwynd and Hester his wife, Arthur Hyde and Lawrence Hyde to Sir James Worsley.<sup>75</sup> Before 1787 it had passed to Ascanius Williams, who in that year conveyed it to Thomas Robins.<sup>76</sup> This is the last recorded owner of the manor, and it is probable that the manorial rights afterwards lapsed.

No mention apparently occurs of the manor of SHARPRICKS (Shepprix, xiv cent.) until the 14th century, when it was in the possession of the Countess of Salisbury,<sup>77</sup> having probably passed to her on the death of her husband, William de Montagu first Earl of Salisbury, in 1344. It remained with this family certainly until 1415,<sup>78</sup> after which all trace of the overlordship is lost.

The first undertenant of Sharpricks of whom there is record was John Trenchard,<sup>79</sup> and before 1331 it passed from him to Henry Trenchard, presumably his son,<sup>80</sup> who appears to be the last of the name connected with the manor.

Sharpricks was held by service of 6d. per annum immediately of Henry Trenchard by John de Lisle, who died in 1331, leaving a son, Bartholomew, who succeeded to the manor. It then consisted of a messuage, 160 acres of land and a windmill.<sup>81</sup> In 1339 Bartholomew was entrusted with the defence of the Isle of Wight against a possible French invasion, and for this reason his manor of Sharpricks was free from assessment in the Muster Roll for that year.<sup>82</sup> Bartholomew de Insula or de Lisle died in 1345, leaving a son John, aged nearly nine years,<sup>83</sup> for whom the manor was held by his mother Elizabeth. This John de Lisle, who held the manor jointly with his wife Maud,<sup>84</sup> died abroad in 1370, leaving a son and heir John, aged three. In 1378 his wife Maud died and was succeeded by the said John, then said to be thirteen.<sup>85</sup> No mention is found of Sharpricks for the next century and a half, but it apparently remained in the Lisle family, following the descent of South Baddesley (q.v.), as it reappears in 1539,<sup>86</sup> in the possession of Mary wife of Sir Thomas Lisle, who died seised of the manor in that year. From this date it is certain that the two descents are identical.

A rental of Sharpricks is given in a Recovery Roll dealing with the manor in 1781. It had been sold to Ascanius Williams senior for a sum of £1,500, and its copyhold and leasehold estates included a tenement called Fording, a close called Great Saltern Close, Nashes Farm, Lisle Court Farm and a house and garden.<sup>87</sup>

At the time of the Domesday Survey 2 hides in SWAY (Suei, xi cent.; Sweia, xiii cent.) were held of Earl Roger of Shrewsbury by Fulcoin and Nigel respectively.<sup>88</sup> The earl himself was holding, in demesne, land in 'Bermintune' which has been identified as Birmingham in Sway.<sup>89</sup> It is probable that these holdings afterwards coalesced and became one estate. A certain Edmund at the same date was holding 1 hide in Sway which Algar had held of King Edward.<sup>90</sup> At a subsequent date the abbeys of Quarr and Christchurch Twyneham both held manors in Sway, but what entries in Domesday Book these manors represented is uncertain.

Some time prior to 1150 Hugh de Witteville gave 'his whole land of Sway with its men and one mill' to the abbey of Quarr,<sup>91</sup> and about the same date Ralph Fulcher granted a mansura and land at Sway which he had of the fee of Hugh de Witteville and all claim in Sway mill and the mansion of Robert Tanner to the same house.<sup>92</sup> These possessions were retained by the abbey until the Dissolution, when Sway, then worth £3 15s. 8d.,<sup>93</sup> was granted to Sir John Williams, Master of the Jewels, and others,<sup>94</sup> by whom it was subsequently conveyed to John Mill,<sup>95</sup> the purchaser and grantee of much monastic property in the neighbourhood. It then followed the descent of Battramsley (q.v.) until 1627, when the estate henceforth known as the manor of Sway Quarr was sold by George Wroughton to John Button of Buckland Lymington,<sup>96</sup> and in 1670 he or his son appeared before the justice seat held at Lyndhurst as the lord of the manor of Sway, in right of which he claimed common of pasture for his cattle and common of mast for hogs and pigs at the rate of 4d. for a hog and 2d. for a pig yearly. Other annual payments were lease-fee money 5s. 2d., 22½ bushels of oats and 112 eggs.<sup>97</sup> Before the end of the century, however, it had passed to Edmund Dummer of Swaythling, whose widow Leonora Sophia in 1746 married Denis Bond of Creech Grange, co. Dorset, a member of the Dorset branch of the Cornwall family of that name. Her daughter Mary Dummer, who inherited the Sway property, became the wife of John Bond nephew of her step-father Denis Bond, and from them the property passed in succession to a son and grandson both named John. The latter on his death in 1844 was succeeded by his brother the Rev. Nathaniel Bond, whose son Mr. Nathaniel Bond gave the Sway property to his eldest son Mr. John Wentworth Garneys Bond, the present owner.<sup>98</sup>

In 1228 Richard de Avon and Maud his wife granted 5s. rent in Sway to Roger, Prior of Christchurch Twyneham,<sup>99</sup> presumably the 'land of Sway' for which the prior was liable in 1263 to provide castle guard for eight days in time of war for the castle of Christchurch.<sup>100</sup> In the following century the possessions of the priory were increased by the grant of three messuages and 49 acres of land in Sway and elsewhere from John vicar of Christchurch in part satisfaction of the £10 worth of land and rent which they had the right to acquire yearly.<sup>101</sup> Free warren in their demesne lands of Sway was granted to the prior and convent in 1384.<sup>102</sup> Sway continued in the possession of this house until the Dissolution, when it was granted to Sir John Williams with Sway Quarr and apparently became merged in the latter manor, as henceforth no separate mention of it is found.

In 1086 the abbey of Romsey held 1 hide in Sway,<sup>103</sup> afterwards known as the manor of Sway Romsey or South Sway, but when or by whom it was granted there is no evidence to show. The Abbess of Romsey was holding in Sway together with the Abbot of Quarr and the Prior of Christchurch Twyneham in 1316,<sup>104</sup> and the abbey held lands there until the Dissolution, when they were granted with Sway Twyneham and Sway Quarr to Sir John Williams,<sup>105</sup> and followed the descent of Sway Quarr (q.v.).

Mention is made of a mill in Sway in the 12th<sup>106</sup> and 13th centuries,<sup>107</sup> probably the water-mill granted to Sir John Williams with the manor in 1543,<sup>108</sup> but there is no later record concerning it.

In 1086 WALHAMPTON (Welnetune, xi cent.), consisting of half a hide, was held by Fulcoine of Earl Roger of Shrewsbury. Formerly it had been held by Alnod and had been worth 15s., but its value was now reduced to 10s.<sup>109</sup>

Walhampton escheated to the Crown on the forfeiture of the estates of Robert de Bellesme son of Earl Roger at the beginning of the 12th century, and was then granted by the king to Richard de Redvers Earl of Devon, whose son Baldwin gave it to the priory of Christchurch Twyneham.<sup>110</sup>

In 1263 the possessions of the priory in Walhampton were further increased by the grant of one messuage and 40 acres of land by Ralph le Plumber and Christine his wife to John, Prior of Christchurch Twyneham. In return the prior was to provide reasonable sustenance both of victuals and clothing in the priory for Ralph and Christine.<sup>111</sup> A somewhat similar arrangement was made in the same year with John Osborn and Ralph his son in respect of other lands in Walhampton.<sup>112</sup>

In 1285 the prior and convent were granted free warren in their demesne lands at Walhampton.<sup>113</sup> The manor continued among the possessions of this house until the Dissolution,<sup>114</sup> at which time it was held by John Castle and Joan his wife and their son William for their lives.<sup>115</sup> The queen granted a renewal of the lease to William Castle and Elizabeth his wife and their son John in 1564,<sup>116</sup> and to Elizabeth Castle, by this time a widow, and John Castle and William Castle in 1572, and in 1574 the reversion, after the expiration of the latter lease, was granted to Drew Drury and Edmund Downynge.<sup>117</sup> Before 1631, however, it had been acquired by Sir George Trenchard, member of the well-known Dorset family of that name, who died seised of it in that year,<sup>118</sup> leaving his property to his son Sir Thomas, who was holding in 1633.<sup>119</sup> It passed before 1658 to Francis Hanbury of Lymington,<sup>120</sup> who held it certainly until 1670.<sup>121</sup> In 1727 it was in the possession of Charles Bulkeley, probably member of the family of that name, which for many years held the manor of Lymington. He conveyed Walhampton by fine to William Tulse in that year.<sup>122</sup> From the latter it apparently passed to William Samber,<sup>123</sup> member of another Lymington family, who sold it in 1742 to Harry Burrard,<sup>124</sup> bowbearer to the king and riding forester of the New Forest, who represented Lymington in Parliament for forty-three successive years, was created a baronet in 1769, and, having no surviving issue, he settled the estate in tail-male upon his two nephews, sons of his brother William, the elder of whom, Admiral Sir Harry Burrard, succeeded him on his death in 1791.<sup>125</sup> The latter assumed the surname of Neale on his marriage in 1795 with Grace daughter of Robert Neale of Shaw House, Wilts.<sup>126</sup> He represented Lymington in many Parliaments during a period of forty-six years, and dying without issue in 1840 was succeeded in his estates by his brother, the Rev. George Burrard, chaplain-in-ordinary to four successive sovereigns. The latter was followed by his son Sir George Burrard, who died without issue in 1870. His half-brother Sir Harry Burrard inherited the estate, from whom it passed to his son Sir Harry Paul Burrard.<sup>127</sup> It was subsequently alienated by this family to Mr. John Postle Heseltine, who has lately sold it to Miss Morrison.

The first record of WARBORNE (Werburne, xiv cent.) is found in 1316, when John Warborne and Roger Pilley are returned as joint owners of the vill of Warborne.<sup>128</sup> Beyond the mention of small parcels of land in Warborne held by the Bocland family in the 14th century,<sup>129</sup> no further record of Warborne is found until 1478, when the manor of Warborne passed by fine from John Reve and Joan his wife to Edward Berkley.<sup>130</sup> Before 1505, however, it had been acquired by the family of Filey,<sup>131</sup> and it then followed the descent of Pilley (q.v.) until 1617, when it was conveyed by Thomas Wroughton and Mary his wife to George Wroughton.<sup>132</sup> After this no further trace of Warborne is found until 1670, when Henry Bower appeared before the justice seat held at Lyndhurst in that year to assert his claim to the manor.<sup>133</sup> Warborne reappears with Pilley in a fine of 1726 in which John Chetwynd and Hester his wife, Arthur Hyde and Lawrence Hyde conveyed the manor to Sir James Worsley,<sup>134</sup> after which the two descents are again identical.

The CHURCH church of ST.

JOHN consists of chancel, nave with a north chapel of three bays and a south aisle of six bays, a tower south-west of the chancel, a north vestry and south porch.

The first three bays of the present nave probably represent the nave of a 12th-century church, which would have had a small chancel. The first enlargement of this church was c. 1200, when a south aisle and the first three bays of the existing south arcade were added. In the first half of the 13th century the nave was lengthened westwards, three more bays being added to the south arcade.

A 13th-century arch opening from the west end of the north chapel to the present vestry shows that a south aisle was prepared for if not built at the same time, but it has since disappeared. A north aisle probably existed before this time, but about 1250-60 was replaced by the present north chapel and arcade. In the 14th century, c. 1320, the chancel was enlarged to its present size and the tower built.

The east window of the chancel is a modern three-light traceried window in early 14th-century style, and the chancel has been considerably restored in modern times. In the north wall is a modern two-light window with old inner jambs, and in the south no window, but a two-centred arch of a single chamfered order opening into the ground story of the tower, now used as an organ chamber. It has an east window of two lights with restored tracery, and in the south wall a trefoiled piscina and a window of two trefoiled lights with a quatrefoil over, both of 14th-century date. The 14th-century chancel arch contemporary with the chancel is acutely pointed, of two chamfered orders, dying into the responds with a broach stop between the orders; below the responds are cut away on a slant. The very irregular line of the south wall of the chancel is to be noted, the tower being set nearly square with the nave, while the south wall of the chancel has a marked southward inclination, which can only be due to the method of setting out.

The north arcade is of three bays with arches of two chamfered orders and a heavy chamfered label with good head stops. The responds are of stone and half round with moulded capitals and bases; but the round columns with their capitals, shafts, and bases are of Purbeck marble, the whole arcade being a very beautiful piece of 13th-century work. The chapel is also of very good proportions, and has an east window with modern tracery of three lights in the original shafted jambs. The sill is cut down for the reredos of an altar, and below it runs a roll string, which is continued at a lower level below the north windows and again at a higher level on the west wall, ranging with the springing of the western arch.

In the north wall are three widely splayed lancets with moulded labels, which have apparently been widened on the inside at the glass line. In the west wall is a similar window, but larger and without a label. Below it a plain arch with chamfered angles opens into a modern vestry, which stands on the eastern part of the destroyed (or abandoned) 13th-century aisle, the weathering of its low pent roof still showing on the west face of the chapel wall.

In the north wall of the nave west of the vestry is a modern trefoiled light. The south arcade is of six bays, the three eastern ones having plain round arches with chamfered angles, resting on narrow rectangular piers with chamfered angles stopped out just above the plain bases. There are no capitals, but a chamfered abacus runs round the pier. All the tooling is vertical, and the date must be at the very end of the 12th century. Against its west respond is set the east respond of the later work of three bays which have pointed arches of two chamfered orders and round columns with octagonal moulded capitals of a very good and deeply-cut section and bases hidden by the floor. The west window of the nave is modern in 14th-century style, part of the reveal being old. The west door, contemporary with the arcade, has three external continuous chamfered orders, with undercut label and returned stops. On the outer face of the west wall are a string-course and a shallow buttress, both original. The south aisle opens to the south chapel by a pointed chamfered arch and is lighted by three modern three-light traceried windows. The south door, having a two-centred head continuously moulded, and the porch date from the 13th-century extension of the aisle; above the door externally is a trefoiled opening. In the east respond of the south arcade are the remains of the rood stair with the original 15th-century wood framing in place. The tower is of two stages, the upper having been rebuilt in the 17th century of red brick with square-headed wooden belfry lights and an embattled parapet. The lower stage has a trefoiled light on the west above the south aisle roof and the south and east windows already noticed.

The font is octagonal with a plain bowl of 15th-century date and a tall modern stem and base. The chancel roof is modern, the nave plastered in a barrel vault with moulded ribs and foliate bosses at the intersections; it appears to be of 15th-century date, and may mark the time when the north aisle was destroyed. The aisle roofs are plastered. The altar table is of 17th-century date with carving and heavy moulded legs; in the vestry is another table rather later and less elaborate.

On the north wall of the nave is a very good marble and alabaster wall monument with the life-sized bust of John Kempe, 1652, inclosed in an oval frame under a pediment with cresting. Above is a shield with the sheaves and engrailed border of Kempe, and below a Latin inscription in eight lines. On the floor close to the west door is a portion of a slab with a 14th-century flowered cross.

The bells are three in number, the first and second cast in 1838, the tenor in 1867, all by Mears.

The plate consists of a late 17th-century silver chalice, a paten of 1669, the gift of James Worsley, a pair of patens of 1848 given by the Rev. Charles Shrubbs and the Rev. Henry Shrubbs, a flagon of 1830 given by Elizabeth Purvis of Vicar's Hill House, and a plated cup and cover.

The registers are as follows: (1) baptisms and burials 1596 to 1621 and 1626 to 1756, marriages 1596 to 1622 and 1627 to 1753; (2) baptisms and burials 1756 to 1795; (3) baptisms and burials 1795 to 1812. There are four printed marriage books: 1754 to 1777, 1777 to 1789, 1789 to 1805, 1805 to 1812.

The small brick church of ST. PAUL, East Boldre, consists of chancel, nave and turret with one bell. It was built in 1839, but was restored and the chancel added in 1891. The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten of 1839, a chalice of 1902, a paten of 1897, and a plated flagon given by Mr. J. Blount Thomas in 1890.

Richard de Redvers, who died in ADVOWSON 1107, confirmed to the priory of Christchurch Twyneham the church of Boldre with the chapel of Brockenhurst.<sup>135</sup> This confirmation was repeated by his son Baldwin Earl of Devon and by Henry Bishop of Winchester.<sup>136</sup> In 1291, by which time a vicarage had been ordained, the church of Boldre with a chapel was assessed at £21 6s. 8d., a pension to the priory of £2 13s. 4d. being chargeable on the vicarage as compensation for tithes in Boldre, Lymington and Brockenhurst.<sup>137</sup> In the Valor of Henry VIII the church was valued at £14 3s., the charges upon it with the pension reducing it to the net value of £11 2s.,<sup>138</sup> including the small tithes of Lymington; 3s. annually was also paid to the churchwardens of Boldre by the inhabitants of Lymington to provide a dinner for the 'quiristers and others,' a payment which apparently ceased in the 16th century.<sup>139</sup> The patronage remained with the priory until the Dissolution, when it was granted to George Mill,<sup>140</sup> who died seized of it in 1568.<sup>141</sup> From him it passed to his nephew and heir Richard, son of his elder brother Thomas, who held it till his death in 1613.<sup>142</sup> In 1617 Mary, jointly with her second husband Thomas Wroughton, conveyed the advowson to George Wroughton,<sup>143</sup> probably a son or brother of Thomas. After this date no connexion can be traced between the various patrons<sup>144</sup> until 1819, when the advowson was in possession of John Peyto Shrubbs,<sup>145</sup> whose descendant Mr. John Peyto Charles Shrubbs is the present patron.

Before 1329 a free chapel dedicated to the honour of the Virgin Mary was founded in South Baddesley for the accommodation of the inhabitants, as the parish church of Boldre was situated 2 miles distant.<sup>146</sup> A chantry was founded in this chapel by Henry de Welles, the lord of the manor, in 1329, and endowed with a messuage, 13 acres of land and 100s. rent and common of pasture in Baddesley for

The vicar in reply denied that any pension had ever been paid by his predecessors to the priory, and as a result of the inquisition held in the following year he was exonerated from payment (Exch. L.T.R.

Memo. R. no. 339). However, the question was again raised as late as January 1603, when a certain John Mawller declared he had heard that such a pension had once been paid, that both Robert Rande and Nicholas Barnard, vicars, had been sued for the same, whereupon the latter had given up his vicarage. Further, a certain Anthony Goodwyne stated that his father found by a record that a pension was due (Exch. Dep. Hil. 45 Eliz. no. 13).

Thus in the survey of 1546 taken previous to the suppression of the chantry Nicholas Barnard, vicar of Boldre, was serving as chantry priest and was 54 years old. Of ornaments, jewels and chattels belonging to the chapel there were none.<sup>150</sup> A capital house and mansion with barn, stables, &c., lately belonging to the chapel, were granted in 1549 to Sir John Peryent and Thomas Reve.<sup>151</sup>

Unknown donor's charity.—The poor are entitled to an annuity of £2 issuing out of the Pylewell estate.

The 'Minnitt Charity,' founded by the Rev. Francis Allen Minnitt, by deed dated 26 November 1889 is endowed with £60 3s. Bank of England stock, producing £5 14s. a year, or thereabouts, which is applied for the benefit of the poor, as defined by the trust deed.

In 1891 Miss Sarah Watson by will left a legacy for the repair of the fabric of the parish church, now represented by £29 15s. 1d. Bank of England stock, producing about £2 16s. a year. The sums of stock are held by the official trustees.

The Congregational church endowments.—(See under Lymington.) The official trustees hold a sum of £667 stock of the West of India Portuguese Railway, founded by William Lancaster by memorandum in writing of 10 March 1862, producing £33 7s. yearly, and £420 London and North Western Railway 4 per cent. stock given by Charles Rashley by deed 6 October 1884, producing £16 16s. a year. The income is paid to an evangelist.

In 1894 William Ingham Whitaker by will bequeathed £4,000 consols, the dividends to be paid to the incumbent of South Baddesley for the time being. The principal fund has been transferred to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty.

BRAMSHAW

Bremmessage (xi cent.); Brymbelshawe, Brem-saghe, Bremelshawe (xiii cent.).

Before 1895 part of the parish of Bramshaw was situated in Wiltshire, but in that year this portion was transferred to Hampshire and made a new civil parish called Bramshaw East.<sup>1</sup> Bramshaw contains 3,497 acres of land, of which 5 are covered with water, and Bramshaw East 1,578 acres.<sup>2</sup>

Bramshaw is thickly wooded, there being 336 acres of woods and plantations in the parish,<sup>3</sup> including Bramshaw Wood in the north, which is said to have provided the timber for the roof of Salisbury Cathedral.<sup>4</sup>

The land rises from east to west, the height varying from 421 ft. above the ordnance datum in Bramblehill Walk in the north-west of the parish to 114 ft. near Brook in the south-east. From Bramblehill Lodge, in the north of the parish, one of the finest views in the forest can be obtained. A vast area of woodland stretches to the English Channel, broken only by Malwood Ridge over Minstead Valley, while the hills of the Isle of Wight can be seen in the distance.

The church stands on high ground in the north of the parish and until the Act of 1895 it had the curious distinction of having its nave in Wiltshire and its chancel in Hampshire. Most of the inhabitants of Bramshaw are engaged in agriculture. There are 84 acres of arable land and 446 acres of pasture land.<sup>5</sup> The soil is of a mixed character; the surface is clay and sand and the subsoil clay.

Fritham is a hamlet partly in Ashley Walk and partly in Bramshaw. It has a school and chapel opened in 1861, the latter being served by the vicar of Bramshaw. In East Fritham Plain there are three barrows locally called butts, the central one being known as Reachmore. In West Fritham are the Schultze Gunpowder Works, covering several acres of ground. Brook is a hamlet in the south of the parish, Furzley is a hamlet in Bramshaw East.

Two entries occur in Wiltshire MANORS Domesday relating to Bramshaw. One records that Ulnod held land in Bramshaw worth 10s. assessed at half a hide, which his father had held before him<sup>6</sup>; the second that a certain Edmund held half a virgate worth 30d.<sup>7</sup>

Odo of Bayeux was overlord of these lands in Bramshaw at the time of the Survey. In the late

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

14th century they were said to be held of the fee of the Earl of Warwick,<sup>8</sup> and in the next century of the West family,<sup>9</sup> but no connected descent can be traced.

The larger of the two holdings in Bramshaw mentioned in Domesday Book<sup>10</sup> may probably be identified with the manor of Bramshaw, which, together with that of Britford (co. Wilts.), with which it was for some centuries associated, appears to have been granted by one of the Norman kings to the family of De Lacy some time during the 12th century. The evidence in support of such a grant lies in the fact that Parnel the widow of Ralph de Toni, to whom her father Walter de Lacy had granted Britford as a marriage portion in the reign of Henry III,<sup>11</sup> was seised of lands in Bramshaw which she granted to William Pincerna, her servant.<sup>12</sup> Margaret daughter of Parnel married Thomas de St. Omer, and the latter was holding the manor of Bramshaw certainly as early as 1284,<sup>13</sup> and was still in possession in 1316.<sup>14</sup> He left by his second wife Alice a son William, who succeeded his father before 1341.<sup>15</sup> He was followed by a son Sir Thomas, who died in 1365. The latter by his second wife Margaret left a daughter Elizabeth, who married as her second and third husbands respectively Richard Horn and John Siward, each of whom held the manor in succession in right of his wife.<sup>16</sup> John Siward predeceased Elizabeth,<sup>17</sup> who lived until 1405.<sup>18</sup> By her second husband, Richard Horn, she had a daughter Joan, who had married (1) John Siward, son of her mother's third husband, and (2) Robert atte More. On the death of her mother the manor passed to Joan and Robert<sup>19</sup> in accordance with a previous settlement.<sup>20</sup> Since there was no issue of this marriage, Joan, who survived her husband, conveyed the property at Bramshaw in 1436 to trustees, by whom it was subsequently sold to Robert Lord Hungerford and Margaret his wife.<sup>21</sup> The former died in 1459. His son and successor Robert was attainted in 1461 as a partisan of the Lancastrian cause and was beheaded<sup>22</sup> after the battle of Hexham. Margaret his mother was allowed a life interest in the estate, but at her death in 1477-8 the manor passed by virtue of a royal grant made in 1474<sup>23</sup> to Richard Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III, who on his accession in 1483 granted it to John Howard Duke of Norfolk.<sup>24</sup> When the latter was slain at Bosworth Field two years later the manor came into the hands of the Crown. In 1485 Henry VII, having reversed the attainder of Robert Lord Hungerford, granted the manor to Mary granddaughter of the latter and wife of Sir Edward Hastings in consideration of the sufferings both families had undergone during the Civil War.<sup>25</sup> It apparently passed from her to her son George Lord Hastings, created Earl of Huntingdon in 1529, whose grandson, Henry third Earl of Huntingdon, sold the manor of Bramshaw (which from this time seems to have been also known by the alternative name of MOORE CLOSES) in 1561 to Thomas Dowse,<sup>26</sup> who held it till his death in 1601,<sup>27</sup> leaving as heir a son Francis who had married Elizabeth daughter of Sir Hampden Paulet. In 1646 Thomas second son of Francis sold the manor to George Cony,<sup>28</sup> and he in turn appears to have sold it to Jonathan Rivil, who was holding in 1670.<sup>29</sup> Rivil is said to hold the manor together with eight ancient messuages, four ancient cottages and 180 acres of land parcel of the said manor without the metes and bounds of the forest. It next passed, probably by purchase, to Hugh Blynman, who gave the manor the alternative name of Blynman's Inclosures<sup>30</sup> and in 1688 transferred it by fine to William Nichols.<sup>31</sup> In 1700 it was acquired by Henry Goddard of Birchenwood,<sup>32</sup> who left the whole of his property by will to Daniel Goddard subject to the payment of legacies amounting to £9,000. In 1713 the latter arranged to transfer the whole of the estates subject to this condition to Richard Paulet of Gray's Inn, who in return was to secure to him the possession of Birchenwood. The net gain of this transaction to Richard appears to have been the manors of Bramshaw and Canterton.<sup>33</sup> Bramshaw remained in the Paulet family until 1887, when it was purchased by Mr. George Edward Briscoe Eyre, J.P., the present owner.<sup>34</sup>

The estate of WARRENS in this parish probably takes its name from the family of Warren who held property here as early as the beginning of the 17th century.<sup>35</sup> Simon Warren of Bramshaw in 1639 left all his estates in Bramshaw to his grandson Edmund Warren, who in 1670 asserted his claim before the justice seat held at Lyndhurst to one messuage and 24 acres of land in Bramshaw, parcel of the manor of Moore Closes.<sup>36</sup> Edmund Warren, probably son of <sup>10</sup> The second holding of half a virgate was possibly the later messuage and 22 acres of land, 8 acres of meadow and 13 of wood in Bramshaw held by John le White of Bramshaw in the early half of the 14th century and forfeited by him when he was hanged for felony to the lord of the manor of Bramshaw, William de St. Omer (*Cal. the latter, who inherited the estate, left it subject to a life interest on his wife to his cousin William Warren, whose son succeeded and in 1746 sold it to Samuel Young of Morecroft, near Romsey. The property passed in 1756 to his son William Young, who sold it in 1789 to Samuel Orr. From him it was purchased in 1798 by Mr. George Eyre,<sup>37</sup> who added to the property and built the large mansion which is the present seat of his grandson Mr. George Edward Briscoe Eyre.

A capital message called BIRCHENWOOD or BURCHENWOOD HOUSE in Bramshaw was sold for 1,000 marks in 1588 by Thomas Dowse, lord of the manor of Bramshaw, to Thomas Goddard of Southampton.<sup>38</sup> It continued in this family for several generations and was left at the beginning of the 18th century by Daniel Goddard to Elizabeth his daughter and heir, who had married Aaron Knight of Bramshaw. It passed from them to their son and heir Mylan, who in 1767 sold the estate to James Hibberd of Bishopstone (co. Wilts.).<sup>39</sup> By his will he left the estate to his great-nephew James Hibberd in tail-male, with contingent remainder in tail-male to John and William brothers of James, but owing to the failure of their issue the estate eventually devolved in 1787 upon his sister Rachel Brewer and his nephew James Turner, as co-heirs. Birchenwood fell by arrangement to the share of James,<sup>40</sup> after whose death it was sold to Mr. George Eyre of Warrens, whose grandson Mr. G. E. Briscoe Eyre is the present owner.

Birchenwood was termed a manor in the late 18th century, and Mr. George Eyre, the grandfather of the present owner, used to be called 'the laird of Birchenwood.' It had about seven tenants and was reputed to be one of the smallest and most interesting 'manors' in the locality on that account.<sup>41</sup>

There are five entries in the Domesday Survey relating to FRITHAM (Trucham, xi cent.). One records that Hugh de St. Quintin was holding 1 hide under Hugh de Port, which had been held by Wislac before the Conquest and was then worth 30s.<sup>42</sup>; a second holding was that of 2½ hides which Walkelin, Bishop of Winchester, had held as part of the endowment of the cathedral church.<sup>43</sup> Alvrice the Little had held 1 hide and 2 virgates in parage worth £4<sup>44</sup>; a certain Hunter 1 hide worth 30s.<sup>45</sup>; while Earl Roger of Shrewsbury had held two manors at Fritham assessed at 2½ hides and worth 60s.<sup>46</sup> The whole of this land had been taken into the forest before 1086 with the exception of 1 acre held by Hugh de St. Quintin.

The first mention of Fritham after the Survey is early in the reign of Henry III, when Geoffrey de Baddesley was stated to be holding half a carucate of land and his bailiwick in Baddesley and Fritham by a rent of 60s.<sup>47</sup> From this date Fritham followed the descent of South Baddesley in the parish of Boldre (q.v.) until 1429,<sup>48</sup> after which its descent has not been ascertained.

The church of ST. PETER consists of a chancel 21 ft. 3 in. by 14 ft. with a small north vestry, a nave 39 ft. 3 in. by 16 ft., a north transept 12 ft. 6 in. square, a south transept 21 ft. 2 in. by 16 ft. 8 in., and a tower at the south end of the south transept 10 ft. by 8 ft. The earliest part of the church is the west end of the nave, which is of mid-13th-century date, but from the west of the transepts eastwards the whole has been rebuilt, the transepts and tower belonging to the early part of the 19th century and the chancel and vestry being modern. There are large galleries with curved fronts at the west end of the nave in the south transept, the former dated 1828.

The east window of the chancel is a triple lancet, and there are single lancets to north and south. At the north-west is a small door to the vestry continuously roll-moulded. The head is modern but the jambs are of late 13th-century date. The chancel arch is modern, of 14th-century design.

On the north of the nave to the east is the opening to the north transept with a plain chamfered arch. Above and a little to the east of this is a small modern lancet as a pulpit light. The opening to the south transept is without an arch, and west of it is the blocked south door of the nave of mid-13th-century date with heavy roll mouldings in the arch carried down as shafts with small circular capitals. West again of this is a 16th-century window of two uncusped lights. There is also a modern external door to the gallery staircase. This wall has also been much repaired, refaced brickwork being used in bands in the flint rubble. The west window is of mid-13th-century date, and consists of three grouped lancets with heavy hollow-chamfered mullions, a moulded rear arch and internal undercut label with human heads at the springing. Above it is a modern trefoiled opening.

The north transept is built of brick, and has a modern stone window of three grouped lancet lights. The south transept is also of brick, and is lit by three three-light wooden-framed windows. The tower, of the same date and material, serves as an entrance porch, and also contains a staircase to the north transept gallery. It is surmounted by a square weather-boarded timber bell-chamber with louvred sound holes.

The roofs of the chancel and transepts are modern, but that of the nave is of early 15th-century date much restored. The moulded wall plate remains and also moulded and cambered tie-beams. The circular bowl of the font is old but so scraped as to be undatable.

The tower contains two bells. The treble is of 13th-century date, very long and tapered, and has a square lip. The second bears no marks, but is probably of late 18th-century date.

The plate consists of a plain silver chalice dated 1669 and a copy of the chalice together with a paten and flagon given in 1840 by Mr. G. E. Eyre of Warren.

The registers are as follows: (1) has all entries 1597 to 1703 somewhat mutilated; (2) the same 1703 to 1784 incomplete; (3) baptisms and burials 1754 to 1804; (4) marriages 1774 to 1812 and (5) baptisms and burials 1804 to 1812.

The church of Bramshaw belonged ADVOUSON at an early date to the Premonstratensian priory of Britford.<sup>49</sup> In 1158, however, Henry II granted the church, from which the monks had been expelled by Bishop Jocelin, to the cathedral of Salisbury, when it was appropriated to the resident canons.<sup>50</sup> From that date the patronage has been in the hands of the Dean and chapter of Salisbury, who claimed forest privileges for themselves and their tenants as holders of the rectory of Bramshaw.<sup>51</sup> In a survey of the parsonage or chapel made in 1649 it appeared that the lessees of the parsonage were bound to provide 'a sufficient curate and minister of honest and good reputation to serve the cure,' who was to be paid £8 yearly and be provided with a house and grounds. He was entitled to tithe eggs, to all fees and to the Easter offerings.<sup>52</sup> The rectorial tithes were sold at the end of the 18th century under Pitt's Act for the redemption of land tax<sup>53</sup> to Mr. Samuel Orr, on whose death they were purchased by Mr. George Eyre, whose grandson, Mr. G. E. Briscoe Eyre, is the present lay rector.<sup>54</sup>

Bramshaw was a peculiar of the archdeaconry of Salisbury until that archdeaconry was abolished in 1847.<sup>55</sup>

There are no endowed charities in Bramshaw.

BROCKENHURST

The parish of Brockenhurst (Broceste, xi cent.; Brokenst, xiii cent.; Brokehurst, xiv cent.; Brocknes, xvi cent.; Brocknest, xvii cent.) contains 6,903 acres of land, of which 37 are covered with water. The village is situated on high ground on the main road from Lyndhurst to Lymington, and owing to its situation is extremely picturesque. The parish contains large patches of wood and moorland and the timber is exceptionally fine. There is a station on the London and South Western Railway.<sup>1</sup> The Boldre or Lymington River after flowing through the parish in a south-easterly direction passes out into Boldre and thence to the Solent.

Brockenhurst Church, one of the only two churches in the New Forest mentioned in the Domesday Survey, is built on rising ground on the western edge of Beaulieu Heath, a short distance out of the village. It is picturesquely surrounded by trees, and in the churchyard is a remarkably fine yew tree, and to the south-west near the church is the hollow stump of a still older yew.

Brockenhurst Park, containing 425 acres of land the property of Mr. E. J. H. Morant, the lord of the manor, descends eastwards from the village to the Boldre River. Rhinefield is the residence of Mr. Edward Lionel Walker-Munro, R.N.; Lady Cross Lodge of the Hon. Sir Charles John Darling, Justice of the High Court. New Park, which is Crown property, is mentioned as early as 1484, when 'the custody of the king's park called New Park' was granted to John Hoton alias Huton.<sup>2</sup> In a survey of 1615 it is described as 'divided with pales, lodges and ditches into several meadows and pastures and containing 416 acres and 12 perches, with lodge stables and appurtenances worth yearly £100: the timber trees and beech trees in the park being in number 498. The park and lodge are in the tenure and occupation of Sir George Carye, who hath fully stocked the same with cattle and horses. The oak and beech trees within the park marked out for the use of the navy are in number 270.'<sup>3</sup> In 1670 it was added to by Charles II for the reception of red deer from France and subsequently granted as a farm to the Duke of Bedford, the Lord Warden. Carys, the residence and property of the Rev. Frederick Hermann Bowden-Smith, probably takes its name from John Cary, who held the office of riding forester to Charles II.<sup>4</sup>

There are 530 acres of woodland, 1,421 of grass and 548 of arable land.<sup>5</sup> The soil is marl and loam, the subsoil gravel and in some parts clay.

Rhinefield is a township consisting of 7,360 acres 2 miles south-west from Brockenhurst station, constituted by an Order of the Poor Law Board 23 November 1868, and consisting of parts of Rhinefield and Wilverley Walks in the New Forest, which were extra-parochial before the passing of the New Forest Poor Law Act of 1866.

Field-names which occur in the 16th century are: Westsetley<sup>6</sup> and Banetts,<sup>7</sup> and in the 17th century Guydintill, Whilepill, Colehayes,<sup>8</sup> Hinchersley<sup>9</sup> and Ayshlatchmore.<sup>10</sup>

In 1086 Brockenhurst was held as MANORS 1 hide by Alvrice as his father and uncle had held it before him. Before the Conquest it had been worth 40s., but its value had doubled by the time of the Great Survey.<sup>11</sup>

Edward Vunithingi, probably a descendant of Alvrice, held Brockenhurst in the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. He was succeeded by a grandson Hugh, who presumably died before King Stephen granted Brockenhurst to Alvrice de Broclea

BOLDRE : PYLEWELL IN EARLY 18TH CENTURY

BROCKENHURST : QUEEN'S BOWER OAK

(Brookley) his kinsman to hold as his grandfather Edward Vunithingi had held, together with 'ministerium suum' in the New Forest. Henry II when Duke of Normandy granted Brockenhurst to William Spileman as it had been held by his grandfather Edward Vunithingi and his brother Hugh and Alvrice Parvus. King Stephen confirmed this charter, as did Henry II also when he became king.<sup>12</sup> In 1212 William Spileman was still holding lands in Hampshire (including Brockenhurst) by the serjeanty of finding litter for the king's bed and forage for his horse when he came to hunt at Brockenhurst, and this was probably the 'ministerium' before mentioned.<sup>13</sup> In the reign of Henry III William Spileman, probably a son of the first William, was holding 1 carucate of land in Brockenhurst by the serjeanty of serving the king eleven days in England in time of war.<sup>14</sup> He died in or before 1232<sup>15</sup> and was succeeded by a son William, who survived him only six years, leaving as heir a minor,<sup>16</sup> presumably the William Spileman who died in 1290 seised of the manor of Brockenhurst, leaving a son and heir Peter, aged twenty-eight years.<sup>16a</sup> Peter Spileman died two years later,<sup>17</sup> leaving as co-heirs his two sisters, Maud wife of John de Grimsted and Catherine married to Richard de Testwood. The former inherited the manor of Brockenhurst, and her husband John de Grimsted was holding it at his death in 1314-15 by the serjeanty of providing a horseman for twenty days in time of war and doing suit every forty days at the court of the forest.<sup>18</sup> He was followed by a son John, during whose tenure a dispute arose as to his right of taking estovers of housebote, haybote and firebote in the demesne woods of the New Forest, then in the hands of Queen Philippa. John pleaded that this right had always belonged to his ancestors as lords of the manor of Brockenhurst and his claim was allowed.<sup>19</sup>

John de Grimsted died before 1346, and Margery his widow was granted one-third of the manor in dower and the custody of the remaining two-thirds during the minority of her son Thomas.<sup>20</sup> The latter died, however, in 1350,<sup>21</sup> and his uncle and heir Peter de Grimsted granted the manor subject to the dower of Margery the same year to John de Beauchamp,<sup>22</sup> who held it till his death in 1361.<sup>23</sup> His nephew and heir Thomas de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick the same year surrendered it to Edward III,<sup>24</sup> who in 1363 granted the custody of the manor for life to Richard de Pembridge for a yearly rent of £10,<sup>25</sup> and ten years later to John de Foxle on the same condition.<sup>26</sup> In 1388 a grant of the manor was made by the king to his half-brother Thomas de Holand Earl of Kent,<sup>27</sup> who could have held it for a short period only, as in 1399 John de Buckingham, Bishop of Lincoln, died seised in his own right of the manor of Brockenhurst.<sup>28</sup> He left no heir, and Brockenhurst consequently escheated to the Crown, which continued in possession until the middle of the following century, when it was granted to Henry Earl of Arundel.<sup>29</sup> He sold it in 1571-2 to Reginald Howse,<sup>30</sup> a merchant of Southampton, who conveyed it shortly afterwards to Walter Sherwood, from whom it passed to Richard Knapton, who was holding in 1582.<sup>31</sup> It was next held by Alban Knapton<sup>32</sup> his son, who was in turn succeeded by his son Robert in 1630.<sup>33</sup> William Knapton son of the latter was the next and last member of this family to hold the manor, and in 1670 he appeared before the judgement seat of the New Forest held at Lyndhurst formally to assert his claim to the manor of Brockenhurst.<sup>34</sup> He sold the manor in 1700 to Jeremiah Grey of Ibsley, who died in 1709, leaving it to his nephew John.<sup>35</sup> In the latter half of the 18th century the Morant family acquired Brockenhurst,<sup>36</sup> and Mr. Edward J. H. E. Morant, J.P., is the present lord of the manor.

Brockenhurst in common with all manors within the bounds of the New Forest enjoyed many special privileges. The lord had the right of common of pasture in all open places of the forest for eleven months in the year for all beasts except goats; also common of pannage for hogs and right of estovers of dead wood for all necessary fuel. He also claimed to hold his land 'quit and free from verderers and foresters without hindrance from the king.'

The view of frankpledge was attached to the manor.<sup>37</sup> A water-mill described in 1350 as 'broken down'<sup>38</sup> belonged to the manor. This is, however, the only mention of it.

Before the Conquest BROCKLE? (Broclea, Brochellie, xi cent.; Brokle, xiv cent.), assessed with Maplesham at 2 hides, had been held by a certain Ednod, but by 1086 it had been taken into the New Forest and was then worth 20s.<sup>39</sup>

No further mention is found of Brookley until 1262, when John le Gras and Dionysia his wife conveyed half a carucate of land and 11s. 6d. rent in

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Brookley to William Spileman, member of the family who held the adjoining manor of Brockenhurst.<sup>40</sup> Before 1316, however, it had passed to Henry Toulouse.<sup>41</sup> Nine years later he obtained permission to grant the manor to Richard de Tudeworth,<sup>42</sup> who conveyed it in 1334 to John son of Ralph de Bokland and Margaret his wife, with remainder to their three sons, John, Thomas and Nicholas.<sup>43</sup> In 1347 John obtained a grant of a weekly market on Tuesday in his manor of Brookley and a yearly fair to last four days.<sup>44</sup> He was succeeded in 1362<sup>45</sup> by his brother Thomas, who died without issue in 1377 seised of Brookley, which then passed to his daughter Margaret, who had married John Worth.<sup>46</sup> The latter died in 1396, leaving a son John,<sup>47</sup> who succeeded, and on whose death in 1407 the manor came into the king's hands during the minority of John's heir.<sup>48</sup> The latter died under age in 1412, when his sister Elizabeth, who had married William Palton, became his heir.<sup>49</sup>

On her death in the following year<sup>50</sup> the estate passed to the Tiptofts through Agnes, one of the daughters of John Worth, who had married Sir Payne Tiptoft. She had died in 1396, but the estate came to her son Sir John, who died seised of the manor in 1444.<sup>51</sup> He left a son John Earl of Worcester, who was beheaded in 1470 and whose son Edward died unmarried in 1485.<sup>52</sup> Joyce sister of the latter was the wife of Sir Edmund Dudley, and in 1490 their son Edward Lord Dudley jointly with his wife Cecily conveyed the manor to Geoffrey Downes.<sup>53</sup> Before 1551 it had passed probably by purchase to John Mill.<sup>54</sup> It remained in this family (vide Nursling) until the death of Richard Mill in 1613.<sup>55</sup> His wife Mary, who survived him, married Thomas Wroughton, and in 1620 the latter conveyed the manor to William Castell.<sup>56</sup> From him it apparently passed to the family of Knapton, who held the neighbouring manor of Brockenhurst, and in 1629 Alban Knapton was holding the manor of Brookley.<sup>57</sup> He was succeeded by his son and grandson, Robert and William Knapton respectively.<sup>58</sup> In 1682 the latter, who had married Cecily daughter of John Button of Lymington, conveyed the manor to Paul Burrard,<sup>59</sup> who had married Anne sister of Cecily.<sup>60</sup> Paul appears to have left the Brookley estate to his cousin John Burrard, High Sheriff of Hampshire in 1738.<sup>61</sup> The latter bequeathed it at his death in 1765 to his natural son Edward Brailsford, the will being disputed without success by Sir Harry Burrard, eldest son of Paul.<sup>62</sup> Edward was still holding the manor in 1782,<sup>63</sup> after which there is no further trace of manorial rights, which probably were allowed to lapse.

The grange of ROYDON was granted by Henry III<sup>64</sup> to the abbey of Netley, though there is no evidence to show at what precise date, and it remained with this house until the Dissolution.

Thomas Curteis was apparently lessee of the manor in 1377,<sup>65</sup> and he was succeeded in that year by John Lyly.<sup>66</sup> The next recorded tenant is John Cooke, 'friend' of Thomas Cromwell, who held a lease of Roydon at the beginning of the 16th century.<sup>67</sup> In 1533 the latter wrote to Thomas Abbot of Netley desiring him 'to grant to John Cooke a new lease for sixty years at the old rent of the farm called Roydon,' as being near the sea it would be convenient for him to serve in his office of Admiralty.<sup>68</sup>

At the Dissolution Roydon returned to the Crown, and in 1577 it was granted to Roger Manners, third son of Thomas Duke of Rutland.<sup>69</sup> He died in 1587, and shortly afterwards it was apparently acquired with Brockenhurst by the family of Knapton,<sup>70</sup> who held it until 1700, when William Knapton conveyed the manor jointly with his son William to Jeremiah Grey,<sup>71</sup> who died in 1709, leaving it to his nephew John.<sup>72</sup> The latter appears to have sold it before 1738, as at that date it was held by Naphtali Hussey and Jane his wife, George Baker and Thomas South, from whom it passed to William Jenkins,<sup>73</sup> who twenty years later sold it to William Steele.<sup>74</sup> From the latter it was acquired in 1771 by Mr. Edward Morant,<sup>75</sup> whose son John was holding in 1812.<sup>76</sup> Mr. Edward J. H. E. Morant is the present lord of the manor.

In 1086 Wislac held half a hide in Hincelveslei assessed at 20s., which was taken by the Conqueror into the forest.<sup>77</sup> This estate has been identified with Hincheseley in Brockenhurst, but it does not appear to have ever had any manorial history. In 1670 Henry Goddard appeared before the judgement seat held at Lyndhurst to assert his claim to a messuage called 'Hinchersley,'<sup>78</sup> and this appears to be the only mention found of it. The name survives today in Hinchelsea House and Wood.

Before the Conquest a certain Bolle held half a hide assessed at 40s. in Gretheham,<sup>79</sup> which has been identified as Greatnam on the borders of Lyndhurst and Brockenhurst parishes. The name still survives in Greatnam.

BROCKENHURST CHURCH FROM THE SOUTH-EAST

LYNDHURST: GENERAL VIEW FROM THE NORTH

The church (of unknown dedication) CHURCH consists of a chancel 24 ft. by 13 ft. 3 in., a nave 34 ft. 6 in. by 17 ft. 4 in., a north aisle 16 ft. 2 in. wide, a west tower 9 ft. 6 in. square surmounted by a short spire, a south porch and a small vestry to the east of the aisle. The earliest detail of the church is that of the south door of the nave, which is of mid-12th-century date, and the south and west walls of the nave are perhaps of the same date. Late in the 13th century the chancel was rebuilt in its present dimensions and in the 18th century the aisle and tower were added in brick.

The east window of the chancel is of four uncusped lights contemporary with the wall, with interlacing tracery formed by curved continuations of the mullions. There are two similar windows of two lights in the north and two in the south wall. All have been somewhat restored. Between the pair on the south is a small contemporary door with a plain pointed chamfered head. At the south-east is a small defaced piscina, probably original. Under the south-west window is a tomb niche of 14th-century date with a moulded septfoiled head curiously cusped. The chancel arch is quite plain, round-headed and plastered, dying into the chancel walls, and is of no great age.

The nave is of three bays. The north wall has been almost completely removed and the roof on that side is carried on a beam supported by two iron posts. To the south are two windows. The first is of 16th-century date and two trefoiled lights under a square-headed external label with head drips. Over this window is inserted a carved stone shield bearing a leopard rampant quartering a fretty coat. The second is a wood sashed opening to light the west gallery and is of late 18th-century date. Between them is the original south door with a round head of two orders, the outer enriched with horizontal zigzag, the inner square, and there is a label with a hatched ornament. The outer order is carried upon circular shafts with scalloped capitals, the abaci being broken round both orders. The west door to the tower and the door above it to the gallery are of late date.

The tower is of brick and of two stages with a curiously designed short octagonal brick spire springing from a circular dome. The angles are quoined and rusticated in brick and there is a moulded brick cornice. The belfry openings and the west door have semicircular heads.

The font of Purbeck marble has a square late 12th-century bowl with shallow round-headed arcades and square leaf pattern on the sides. The circular central and angle shafts are modern.

The chancel roof is of 17th-century style, plastered, of a pointed barrel form with moulded wooden ribs, at the crowns of which are moulded and pierced wooden pendants. The nave roof is modern.

There is a 17th-century altar table, and the altar rails of early 18th-century date have turned balusters and moulded sills and ramped handrail of good design.

The font cover is 17th-century work, and in the nave is a large family pew, the west face of which has four panels of 17th-century woodwork.

There is a small 18th-century achievement of the royal arms carved in wood in high relief and a slightly earlier one bearing France modern and Hanover.

A large west gallery runs across nave and aisles.

The bells are six in number, recast by Pack & Chapman 1775.

The plate consists of a silver chalice, paten cover, flagon and alms-plate of 1735, given in that year by Dame Margaret Vandeput.

The registers are as follows : Book (1) mixed entries 1537 to 1673, (2) the same 1673 to 1750, (3) 1750 to 1796 for baptisms and burials and 1750 to 1754 for marriages, (4) baptisms and burials 1796 to 1802, (5) baptisms 1802 to 1812, (6) burials 1803 to 1812, (7) marriages 1754 to 1778 and 1778 to 1812.

The description of Brockenhurst ADVOUSON in the Domesday Survey included a church<sup>80</sup> which afterwards became a chapelry dependent upon Boldre. A vicarage was instituted in Brockenhurst in 1866,<sup>81</sup> the patronage being vested in the Morant family. Mr. E. J. H. E. Morant is the present patron.

There is a Baptist chapel erected in 1841 and also a Wesleyan Methodist chapel. An elementary school was built in 1863.

The school founded and endowed CHARITIES by will of Henry Thurston, proved in the P.C.C. 1745. (See article on Hampshire schools.<sup>82</sup>)

The endowment funds consist of £440 2½ per cent. annuities and £608 4s. 3d. consols held by the official trustees, producing £26 4s. a year, which under a scheme of 22 July 1862 is applicable for the support of the schoolmaster and schoolmistress for the education of children and adults or children only of labouring or other poorer classes.

LINWOOD

The small extra-parochial district of Linwood containing 780 acres belongs only to the New Forest Hundred by its insertion in that hundred in 1831. However, its return was then given under Wood Green in Godshill tithing (Fordingbridge parish), and it has since been mostly added as a detached portion to Ellingham parish, while it is partly also in Broomy township. It lies between Minstead and Ringwood. Linwood Farm in the south-east apparently marks the only inhabited portion of the district.

LINWOOD (Lindewode, xiii cent.) is MANOR first mentioned early in the reign of Henry III when Hugh de Godshill, the owner also of land in Ibsley, held 1 carucate of land in Linwood and the bailiwick of Linwood for a rent of 60s.<sup>1</sup> At some date prior to 1271 Peter de Linwood gave all his holding in Linwood together with that of John de Nevill, that is to say two holdings in Linwood, to William le Rus and Adam de la Bere, as this grant was confirmed in that year.<sup>2</sup> Thirteen days later the grantees received a royal charter 'for good services rendered' by which they and their heirs and their men and tenants of the town of Linwood were declared free of the lawing of their dogs in the New Forest and were permitted to have their swine and beasts free of pannage and herbage without interference from the king's officers.<sup>3</sup>

In the early part of the 14th century Edmund de Kendall and Aubrey his wife were holding tenements in Linwood, a moiety of which, consisting of half a messuage and 1 carucate of land, was settled in 1325 on his daughter Agnes and her husband John le Waleys,<sup>4</sup> with reversion to his daughter Felicia, who also entered into the agreement. The second moiety passed to Margaret, another daughter<sup>5</sup> of Edmund, who married William de Mours. The moiety of Felicia, afterwards known as EAST LINWOOD, passed into the Norton family since she married John Norton,<sup>6</sup> and in 1370 their son John de Norton died seised of her moiety, leaving a son and heir John, a minor of three years.<sup>7</sup> This moiety then we may for convenience term the Norton moiety. It passed from father to son and was termed 'half the manor of Linwood' on the death of Richard Norton in February 1537.<sup>8</sup> His son and heir John died in July 1561, leaving a son and heir Thomas.<sup>9</sup> This moiety evidently passed from the Norton family to the family of Okeden in the latter half of the 16th century and in 1604 was conveyed by Sir William Okeden to Sir William Dodington of Breamore.<sup>10</sup> By 1624, however, it had been again acquired by William Okeden under conditions appointed in the conveyance,<sup>11</sup> and in 1670 his descendant, also William Okeden, pleaded before the justice seat held at Lyndhurst, though apparently without warrant, the right to claim estovers, and to be quit of the expedition of his dogs in the New Forest by virtue of the charter of Henry III mentioned above.<sup>12</sup> From this date Linwood is not mentioned by name, its existence being merged in the Okedens' manor of Ellingham (q.v.).

Meanwhile the other half of the so-called 'manor,' the moiety of Margaret wife of William de Mours, had by the early part of the 15th century come into the hands of a Henry Smith, and from that date followed the descent of the manor of Harbridge (q.v.).

There are no endowed charities in Linwood.

LYNDHURST

Lindest (xi cent.).

Lyndhurst is a small parish in the heart of the New Forest containing 3,822 acres of land, of which only 3 are covered with water. The village is situated at cross roads  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles from Lyndhurst Road station. It is principally composed of modern villas and somewhat larger houses, having largely extended as a residential district in recent years. There are, however, on the outskirts a number of the typical Hampshire cottages and small farms with deeply thatched roofs sloping sharply from back to front. Two miles from Lyndhurst near the Christchurch Road is the Knightwood Oak, one of the largest in the forest. The Beaulieu or Exe River rises in the north-west of the parish and for a short distance forms its northern boundary before passing into the neighbouring parish of Colbury.

The church, which in the reign of Edward I was referred to as 'the chapel attached to our lodgings at Lyndhurst,'<sup>1</sup> is situated in the centre of the village on what appears to be an artificial mound. Close by the church is the King's House, the official residence of the deputy surveyor of the forest. Adjoining is the Verderer's Hall, within which is the so-called 'Stirrup of Rufus,' the ancient gauge of the dogs allowed to be kept in the forest without expedition, the 'lawing' being carried out on all 'great dogs' that could not pass through the stirrup.<sup>2</sup> Also in the same hall is carefully preserved the ancient royal coat of arms which was provided for the last justice seat held in Lyndhurst (1669-70). The court of swainmote is held regularly in the Verderer's Hall.

On the eastern side of Lyndhurst in one of the open spaces characteristic of the New Forest, formerly known as launds, are the golf links and the cricket ground and a mound locally known as Bolton's Bench supposed to be an ancient barrow. To the north of the village is Mount Royal, a hill so named by George III during one of his visits to the King's House. Many of the houses round that Felicia married John Norton, who married as his second wife a certain Alice by whom he had a son John, whereas by Felicia he had daughters only. This is wrong, for the inquisition on his death clearly states that he was a son of Felicia. Berry also calls Felicia daughter of Edward Kendall, whereas the inquisition and the fine of 1325 both call him Edmund.

LYNDHURST : KING'S HOUSE

Lyndhurst have interesting and some historical associations. Foxlease, formerly Coxlease (Cox Leyes), is mentioned as early as 1604 as 'part of the demesne lands of the manor of Lyndhurst containing 120 acres then in the tenure of William Brown by grant of Charles Earl of Devonshire.'<sup>3</sup> Further mention of it is found in 1667, when Mabel wife of John Cole of Odiham petitioned Charles II for a lease in reversion for her husband of the house and grounds called Coxlease as a reward for her attendance on the late king in his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight.<sup>4</sup> The present house was built towards the close of the 18th century in imitation of Horace Walpole's villa at Strawberry Hill and is the residence of Mr. Herman Barker-Hahlo. High Coxlease (formerly 'Coxlease wild ground') is a Crown wood adjoining Foxlease on the south. In it a residence belonging to Mrs. Eustace Smith has been built on a lease from the Crown. In 1784 the house known as Cuffnalls was purchased by and became the residence of George Rose, editor of the Marchmont Papers and friend of George III, who frequently visited him in his Hampshire home. It is now the seat of Mr. Reginald Gervis Hargreaves, J.P. Brooklands belongs to Lieut.-Col. William Martin Powell, J.P.; Wilversley Park with 58 acres is the seat of Mr. Henry Martin Powell, J.P.; Northerwood House of Col. Fenwick Bulmer de Sales La Terrière, J.P.; and Park Hill of Mr. Charles Edward Ridout.

Sir John Colborne, Baron Seaton, who fought at Corunna and Waterloo, was born at Lyndhurst in 1778. Dr. Wise, author of The New Forest, its History and Scenery, died here in 1690. Lyndhurst has given a title to John Singleton Copley, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Chancellor from 1827 to 1830.

The soil is loamy, the subsoil gravel. The parish contains 67½ acres of arable land, 574 acres of permanent grass and 835 acres of woodland.<sup>5</sup>

Emery Down is an ecclesiastical parish formed in 1864 chiefly from parts of the parish of Lyndhurst abutting on Minstead.

Field-names met with in the 13th century are:—Grettenhamdune, Wolleyshulle, Coggersbrugge, Addesley, Kerspoule, Mottlesfourde and Pleyinghulle.<sup>6</sup>

Pike's Hill and Bolton's Bench are hamlets in this parish.

At the time of the Great Survey MANOR LYNDHURST, which 'lay in Ambresbury,' belonged to the king. Before the Conquest it had been assessed at 2 hides, but by 1086 it was in the New Forest with the exception of 1 virgate which was held by Herbert the Forester.<sup>7</sup>

It is possible that this Herbert may have been the ancestor of the family of Lyndhurst who took their surname from this property. However that may be, in 1165 Herbert Lyndhurst appears as responsible to the Exchequer for 100 marks from his bailiwick of Lyndhurst,<sup>8</sup> which possibly included the manor. He was succeeded by William Lyndhurst, presumably his son, who was holding the bailiwick in 1202.<sup>9</sup> From him it apparently passed to Richard Lyndhurst, and in 1251, the latter having forfeited the bailiwick for misconduct, it was granted by royal charter to his son William to hold by the payment of £34 to the Exchequer instead of the £10 rendered by his father.<sup>10</sup> It is certain that this grant included the manor, as William granted that together with the bailiwick of Lyndhurst to Alan de Plunkenet, nephew and heir of Robert Waleran, in exchange for the manor of Rotherfield, and in 1270 Alan surrendered it to the king in exchange for manors in Somerset and Oxford.<sup>11</sup> Henry III then granted the manor together with the wardenship of the New Forest, which invariably accompanied the grant, to Eleanor of Castile, wife of Prince Edward.<sup>12</sup> She died in 1290 and two years later the king granted the custody of the manor to John Fitz Thomas,<sup>13</sup> who apparently held it till 1299, when it was allotted as dower to Margaret of France on her marriage with Edward I.<sup>14</sup> This grant was confirmed by Edward II on his accession,<sup>15</sup> and Margaret held the manor till her death in 1318,<sup>16</sup> when it was granted by the king in dower to Queen Isabel.<sup>17</sup> On the death of Mortimer in 1330 the queen was sentenced to imprisonment for life and deprived of all her possessions with the exception of a pension of £3,000, and in the following year the king granted the manor of Lyndhurst to Queen Philippa,<sup>18</sup> who two years later leased it to Sir Thomas West of Hempston Cantilupe (co. Devon).<sup>19</sup> He died before 1343, and the queen then granted it to John de Beauchamp, brother of the Earl of Warwick,<sup>20</sup> who was taking a prominent part in the French wars, and this grant was confirmed by the king in the following year.<sup>21</sup> The king appears, however, to have taken the manor into his own hands again before 1362, as in that year he granted it to Sir Richard Pembridge,<sup>22</sup> probably for his services in the French wars, and he apparently held it till 1375, when a grant of it was made to John de Foxle for life.<sup>23</sup> He appears to have died shortly afterwards, as Richard II on his accession granted it to his half-brother Thomas Holland Earl of Kent,<sup>24</sup> and on his death in 1397 to another kinsman Edward Duke of York.<sup>25</sup> However, on the accession of Henry IV the latter was deprived of all lands he had received during the last two years of the reign of Richard II.<sup>26</sup> Afterwards he was restored to his estates,<sup>27</sup> and apparently held Lyndhurst till his death in 1415.<sup>28</sup>

The next grantee of the manor was Edward Courtenay, eldest son of Edward Earl of Devon,<sup>29</sup> who died without issue in 1418, when Thomas

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Montagu Earl of Salisbury, who had accompanied the king on his expedition to France and had taken a prominent part in the battle of Agincourt, received the manor in reward for his services.<sup>30</sup> He apparently held it till his death in 1428, when it appears to have been granted to Humphrey Plantagenet Duke of Gloucester, who died seised of it in 1447.<sup>31</sup> It then reverted to the king, who kept it in his own hands for the remainder of his reign. Edward IV on his accession made a grant of it for life to William Fiennes Lord Saye and Sele.<sup>32</sup>

This grant was revoked in 1467 in favour of William Fitz Alan Earl of Arundel,<sup>33</sup> who as a staunch Yorkist had done good service to the king in the late wars. In accordance with the terms of the grant it passed on the death of William to his son Thomas, to whom in February 1490 the king confirmed the office of custodian and guardian of the New Forest in the manor and park of Lyndhurst.<sup>34</sup> Thomas died in 1524, leaving a son William, who apparently succeeded. Henry Earl of Arundel, son of the latter, died without male issue in 1581,<sup>35</sup> when the manor returned to the Crown. No further grant of it was made until 1600, when it was transferred to trustees,<sup>36</sup> who on the accession of James I granted it to Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, Earl of Devon.<sup>37</sup> He died seised of it in April 1606, leaving no legitimate heirs. His estates were inherited by a distant cousin Sir Henry Baker, the great-great-grandson of his great-great-aunt Constance Mountjoy (Terell).<sup>38</sup> The next grantee was Henry Wriothesley Earl of Southampton,<sup>39</sup> who died in 1624, leaving as heir a son Thomas under age, during whose minority the custody of the manor was granted to William Earl of Pembroke.<sup>40</sup> Thomas apparently held the manor till his death in 1667, when Charles II granted it to Charles Lord St. John of Basing, eldest son of the Marquess of Winchester,<sup>41</sup> reserving to the Crown a yearly rent of £6, being £3 for herbage and pannage, £1 for turf and heath and £2 for all rents.<sup>42</sup> The grantee formally asserted his claim to the manor before the judgement seat of 1670 held at Lyndhurst by Vere Earl of Oxford, as justice in eyre, the last held for the New Forest. He also claimed for his customary tenants, known as 'homage tenants,' common of pasture and pannage with full rights of estovers according to their ancient rights 'if sufficient timber and wood for their necessary estovers be not found growing upon their several tenements.'<sup>43</sup> Lord St. John was created Duke of Bolton in 1689 for his share in the settlement of William and Mary as king and queen, and received a renewal of the grant of the manor of Lyndhurst.<sup>44</sup> He died in 1699 and was followed successively by a son and grandson both named Charles. In 1746 John Duke of Bedford appears on the Court Rolls as lord of the manor of Lyndhurst, on whose death in 1771 it was granted to William Henry Duke of Gloucester, brother of the king. He died in 1805, and the manor was then held by Frederick Duke of York, second son of George III, until his death in 1827. Up to this date the wardenship of the New Forest had always accompanied the grant of the manor, but in 1827 the court baron was held by the steward of George Harrison, lord of the manor (but apparently not Lord Warden), whose last court was held in 1831. At this date the Crown appears to have resumed possession of the manor, and henceforth the courts were held by the successive stewards of the manor. The latter, too, assumed an entirely different character. From this time it was held that the manor was 'not important to be kept'; the larger copyholds therefore became enfranchised, while others fell into the king's hands on the death of the tenants. At the present day one copyholder only is left. The last court was held in 1898.<sup>45</sup>

In 1359 by the advice of the keeper of the forest the manor was inclosed with a ditch and hedge,<sup>46</sup> but these have apparently long since disappeared. In 1787 the copyholds of the manor, which included estates in Minstead, Burley, Bartley Regis and Poulner near Kingswood, consisted of 625 acres. Heriots had then been discontinued for many years.<sup>47</sup> A manor-house probably existed here at a very early date. In the reign of Edward I an order was given for 'twenty oaks to make laths for the use of the queen's manor-house at Lyndhurst.'<sup>48</sup> This house was probably superseded by the hunting lodge built at Lyndhurst in the 14th century,<sup>49</sup> and the number of state documents dated from Lyndhurst attest the frequency of the royal visits. Constant references are made in public records to the repair and enlargement of this lodge.<sup>50</sup> In 1388 a hall was built within the lodge,<sup>51</sup> known later as the Verderer's Hall. The 'old house' was repaired and enlarged by order of Henry VIII.<sup>52</sup> By the 17th century, however, the accommodation had become insufficient for the needs of the Stuart kings and in 1635 an order was issued for the sale of 250 loads of timber 'at the highest profit for building lodgings for the king's use and service adjoining the old house of Lyndhurst with outhouses and a stable for forty horses.'<sup>53</sup>

The work was apparently not carried out immediately, as Secretary Coke writing from Lyndhurst two years later says: 'This morning His Majesty and all that hunted with him in the forest were roundly wet and the weather has continued so extreme that since his return to Lyndhurst scarce a room in his house has held out the rain.'<sup>54</sup> More attention was given to the King's House in the reign of Charles II when the work of enlarging and restoring it was carried on and apparently finished. In 1669 the repairs cost £500<sup>55</sup> and in the following year £1,500 was raised by the sale of 'tops and lops' to be employed in rebuilding the stables.<sup>56</sup> Again in 1671 £1,750 was paid to the paymaster of the works for repairs at the King's House at Lyndhurst.<sup>57</sup> Reference is thus made to it by Thomas Baskerville, who visited Lyndhurst in 1679: 'The King's House is well-built with good stables belonging to it. Here at this time happening to be a court kept for the foresters were much good company met together and they had a good feast at a small inn near the King's House.'<sup>58</sup> In 1789 it is described as 'the possession of the Lord Warden,' who was allowed £70 a year for keeping the house and stables in repair.<sup>59</sup> It remained in the occupation of the Lord Warden until the death of the Duke of Cambridge in 1848. It was then taken into Crown hands by the Department of Woods and made the residence of the deputy surveyor instead of New Park.<sup>60</sup>

In 1851 the building was much altered and the hall, which up to this period had preserved its customary form, was altered and the rooms above it destroyed; two bays were also added to the front of the house, and windows with plastered brick mullions inserted throughout the building, replacing the original wood frames. In recent times the building has been restored to very much its original form and rooms built again above the hall. The prisoners' dock, tables and chairs of considerable age are preserved in the hall. The staircase appears to date from Jacobean times. The windows on the south-east side have moulded stone architraves.

A park was attached to the manor of PARK Lyndhurst from a very early date. In 1299 it covered an area of 500 acres, the profits from the honey gathered there amounting to 2s. per annum.<sup>61</sup> In 1313 mention is made of 'the close of Queen Margaret at Lyndhurst.'<sup>62</sup> Later in the century the Sheriff of Southampton was ordered to provide the necessary transport for the work of inclosing the king's park at Lyndhurst.<sup>63</sup> In 1358 John de Beauchamp was charged to sell sufficient timber from the park of Lyndhurst to defray the expense of making four lodges and ridings in the forest.<sup>64</sup> In 1387 and again in 1428 payments were made for the fencing and repairing of the palings of the king's park at Lyndhurst.<sup>65</sup> At the beginning of the 17th century there is mention of certain arable land and woodland commonly called 'The Old Park of Lyndhurst.'<sup>66</sup> After this date the references to it are less frequent, but it is always mentioned separately in the grants of the manor.

In 1334 the king granted a yearly fair to last three days, viz. on the eve, the day and the morrow of St. James the Apostle, to Queen Philippa in her manor of Lyndhurst.<sup>67</sup> This is the only mention found of a fair, and it is probable that it was only granted for life.

The church of ST. MICHAEL CHURCHES consists of a chancel with north organ chamber and vestry, a nave with shallow transepts and aisles, a north-west tower and a south porch. The whole building is modern and is built in brick with stone dressings in a rather free adaptation of 13th-century style. The interior is finished in hard burned brick in bands of various colours and cut and moulded bricks are considerably used. The roof is extremely ornate with nearly life-sized carved figures of angels on the corbels.

The most interesting feature of the church is the wall-painting at the east of the chancel by Frederick (Lord) Leighton of 'The Ten Virgins.'

The tower is surmounted by a stone spire of a fair height and contains a ring of modern bells. There are no traces or fittings of an earlier structure.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten cover of 1757, another chalice of 1841, a paten of 1847, a flagon given by 'Mrs. Jone Benet' in 1694, a silver-gilt chalice of 1871, two silver-gilt patens and a flagon of 1885 and a silver-gilt mounted glass flagon.

The registers are as follows: Book (1) beginning in 1737 has baptisms to 1789, burials to 1798 and marriages to 1754; (2) baptisms 1790 to 1812 and burials 1799 to 1812; (3) marriages 1772 to 1812. Some earlier entries are at Minstead.

CHRIST CHURCH, Emery Down, is a plain red brick building in 13th-century style.

Lyndhurst was and is a chapelry ADVOWSONS attached to the church of Minstead (q.v.).

Emery Down was formed as a district chapelry out of Lyndhurst in 1864.<sup>68</sup> The living is a vicarage in the alternate gift of Major C. Boulton of Kenilworth and the Ven. William Bree, D.D., Archdeacon of Coventry.

There are a Roman Catholic chapel of Our Lady of the Assumption and St. Edward, built and endowed by M. Edouard Souberbielle in 1895-6, a Baptist chapel founded in 1700 and a meeting-room for Plymouth Brethren.

Charity of Thomas Brown, founded CHARITIES by will, 1667. (See under Christ-church.)—The yearly sum of £3 is received by the rector, who is entitled to retain 10s. for preaching a sermon on New Year's Day, the residue being applicable in the distribution of clothes or bread.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

In 1692 Joan Bennet by will left £20 for the poor. In 1766 a rent-charge of £1 per annum was secured on property adjoining the meeting-house. The annuity is regularly paid and applied with the before-mentioned charity.

In 1814 the Rev. Scrope Berdmore by will directed his executor to place £200 stock in such a manner that the interest might be received annually by the rector and distributed annually about Christmas among the poor. The sum of £200 consols is held by the official trustees in respect of this legacy.

In 1824 Elizabeth Dege by will bequeathed a sum, now represented by £179 13s. 3d. consols, with the official trustees, the dividends to be applied in the distribution of bread.

The annual dividends of these charities, amounting to £9 9s. 8d., are remitted to the rector for application.

John Dege, by will proved in the P.C.C. 25 March 1830, left £360 consols, the income to be distributed in bread.

In 1856 Elizabeth Woodfield, by will proved 5 March in that year, bequeathed £400 consols, the dividends to be applied for educational purposes, subject to the preservation and maintenance in thorough repair of the family vault and of the two marble tablets above the vault of the late Robert Woodfield in the parish church.

In 1881 Jean Baptiste François Ernest de Chatelain, by will proved 21 September, bequeathed the sum of £666 13s. 4d. consols, the dividends to be applied for keeping in good repair the tomb of the testator in the churchyard, the surplus to be applied in providing bread for poor to be distributed annually at the end of January.

The three sums of stock are held by the official trustees, by whom the dividends amounting yearly to £35 13s. 4d. are remitted to the rector and churchwardens, of which £8 15s. is applied for educational purposes in respect of Woodfield's charity and the residue in accordance with the respective trusts.

In 1858 3a. 1r. 17p. were conveyed for the purposes of allotments. A sum of £100 left by the will of Sir J. Schoedde, proved 1862, was expended in laying out the ground. The land produces £5 a year, which is paid towards providing a parish nurse.

In 1787 William Phillips, by his will proved in the P.C.C. (inter alia), bequeathed £1,250 stock for the preaching of the word of God at the meeting-house and for the support of a school, and further directed that certain residuary estates should be settled for charitable purposes. The trust funds of the two branches of the charity now consist of £1,250 consols and £799 11s. 2d. consols held by the official trustees.

The charity is regulated by a scheme of the Charity Commissioners of 24 January 1896, whereby the trustees thereby constituted are directed to pay a moiety of the income of the £1,250 towards the stipend of the officiating minister of the Baptist chapel, who is also to receive the other moiety of the income so long as a Sunday school in connexion with the same chapel is carried on, or failing the fulfilment of this condition for the purposes next mentioned. The income of the £799 11s. 2d. consols is directed to be applied in the purchase of books for a free library, in clothing for poor children, and outfits for poor children leaving a public elementary school.

In 1754 Grace Carpenter conveyed to trustees 5 acres of land, the rents and profits, subject to the payment of £1 to the poor in bread, to be paid to the minister of the Baptist chapel. The land known as 'Barnaby's meadow' is let at £15 a year.

In 1770 Elizabeth Cox by deed gave a yearly rent-charge of £1 issuing out of land called 'Burton' at Brockenhurst for the minister of the same chapel. The annuity is duly paid by Mr. Morant.

In 1833 William Hinves, by will proved in the P.C.C. on 23 January, bequeathed a legacy for charitable purposes connected with the Baptist chapel. The legacy is represented by £75 15s. 3d. consols, with the official trustees. The yearly income derived from these charities amounts to £69 2s. 4d.

In 1906 Harry Lewis Saltarn, by will proved in the Principal Probate Registry 10 November (among other charitable legacies), bequeathed to the managers of the public elementary schools the sum of £1,500, the income thereof to be applied towards providing an annual treat to the children attending those schools, to be called the 'Saltarn Treat,' and providing prizes, if there be any surplus.

The legacy was invested in the purchase of £1,630 7s. 7d. India 3 per cent. stock, with the official trustees, producing a yearly income of £48 18s.

By an Order of the Board of Education, dated 10 June 1908, the body of trustees was constituted, to consist of six representative trustees to be appointed in equal proportions by the Managers of the Lyndhurst School, the Emery Down Church of England School, and St. Mary Roman Catholic School.

Emery Down.—Endowments for Incumbent of Christ Church, Emery Down.

Vice-Admiral Frederick M. Boulton, by will proved 1877, bequeathed 28 Netherland Government 2½ per cent. bonds and 29 shares in the General Steam Navigation Co. to Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty in trust to vary investments at discretion and accumulate income as in the will mentioned and then to pay income to the incumbent, subject to his being resident.

Miss Charlotte Anna Boulton, by her will proved 1896, devised a house and garden for parsonage (transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners), also bequeathed £10,743 0s. 4d. consols (transferred to the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty) in trust for augmentation of income of incumbent.

The Emery Down Cottages Endowment Charity consists of £585 19s. 8d. Bank of England stock, with the official trustees, producing yearly £55 10s. 4d. which by a declaration of trust 1876 is applicable for repairs of the almshouse and for benefit of inmates.

MINSTEAD

Mintestede (xi cent.); Menestede (xv cent.).

The parish of Minstead, including Canterton, London Minstead and Alum Green (formerly extra-parochial), contains 13 acres of land covered with water and 10,321 acres of land, of which 399 acres are arable, 1,263 are permanent grass and 2,832 woodland<sup>1</sup> exclusive of the New Forest.

In the small village in the north-east of the parish are the rectory, the village smithy and the inn with its sign, a copy of 'The Trusty Servant' of Winchester College. West of the village are the parish church and the village school. The rest of the village is composed of scattered deep-roofed and thatched cottages. Three streams known as the Fleet Water and the Bartley Water flow through the parish in a south-easterly direction. In Canterton Glen, upwards of a mile from Minstead, is Rufus Stone, marking the site of the oak tree from which the arrow which proved fatal to William Rufus is said to have glanced. Near this glen is Stony Cross, one of the highest parts of the forest, from which Romsey Abbey may be seen.

The soil is loam. The subsoil to the south of Stony Cross is of Barton clay and to the north of Bracklesham beds. The tops of the hills are gravel and are from secondary deposits.

The manor-house is a fine old brick building in a park of 400 acres, of which 200 acres are planted with rhododendrons. Sir John Compton made this his residence at the end of the 18th century and very much enlarged the house. Castle Malwood, rebuilt by Mr. Charles Hill in 1892, is now the property and residence of Mr. Hanbury. At Castle Malwood Lodge, now called 'Malwood,' the residence of Lady Harcourt, is one of those fortified earthworks of which so many exist in this part of Hampshire. Blackwater House is the seat of Mr. Francis Compton, M.A., D.C.L., D.L., J.P., and Canterton Manor of Mr. John Jeffreys, J.P. The ruined manor-house of Canterton, reputed to have been mostly burnt down some centuries ago, is in the occupation of the game-keeper of Mr. John Jeffreys.<sup>2</sup>

Before the Conquest MINSTEAD, MANORS assessed at 3½ hides, was held by a certain Godric Malf, whose sons in 1086 were holding half a hide; the remaining 3 hides had been taken into the New Forest. A house in Winchester worth 12*d.* yearly was attached to the manor.<sup>3</sup>

By deduction from facts, stated below, it is shown probable that the name 'Ivez' or 'Ives'<sup>4</sup> was used alternately for that of Minstead in the 12th and early 13th centuries, and yet was also the name of a fee held by a special serjeanty by the descendants of the sons of Godric Malf, including lands in Minstead, Bisterne (in Ringwood) and Totton. These three manors were from the first closely associated. They were held by Godric Malf before the Conquest, by his sons in 1086, and followed the same descent in later years, so it is reasonable to suppose they were also associated in the 12th century. Yet Minstead under that name does not appear from the 11th to the 13th century. However, in 1186-7 tallage was due to the king from 'Ivez, Budesthorn (Bisterne) and Todinton (Totton)' which had belonged to Hugh de Ivez and Robert son of Ulf.<sup>5</sup> At a later date (1189-90) the sheriff was accounting for Robert's portion only,<sup>6</sup> and two years later the tallage for that portion was rendered by the men of Bisterne and Totton.<sup>7</sup> The portion of Hugh de Ivez had undoubtedly by that time passed to his heir, and that heir was probably the Andrew de Ivez who at the time of the Testa de Nevill was holding 1 virgate of land in Totton,<sup>8</sup> and was probably identical with the Andrew de Minstead who was about this time, according to an undated charter, granting out adjoining lands to Guy de Testwood.<sup>9</sup> At the time of the Testa de Nevill Reginald de Bettesthorpe, who also evidently held the portion in Totton that had belonged to Robert son of Ulf,<sup>10</sup> and Maud de Ivez were holding jointly in Ivez a carucate of land for the service of one man armed with a halberd for forty days in England and for finding the king whenever he should stay at Ivez straw for the couch and fodder for his horse.<sup>11</sup> Maud de Ivez, probably widow of Hugh<sup>12</sup> and mother of Andrew, was probably holding her moiety in dower, but she evidently died before 1248-9, in which year Andrew de Ivez or Minstead (as he is alternately called) was said to hold jointly with John de Bettesthorpe, then a minor, son and heir of Reginald and Maud, half a hide in Testwood, Eling and Bisterne by serjeanty.<sup>13</sup> This land was described on the death of Andrew the same year as land and a mill in 'Ives' held for half the above serjeanty.<sup>14</sup> His son and heir William, already thirty years old, succeeded to this property<sup>15</sup>; the other half remained with John de Bettesthorpe son of Reginald and Maud. Thus in 1255-6 John de Bettesthorpe and William de Ivez were said to be holding their land conjointly by the above serjeanty,<sup>16</sup> while in 1279-80 they were given as John de Bettesthorpe and William de Minstead.<sup>17</sup> Moreover, at these same dates William as William de Minstead was granting out neighbouring lands in Totton and Testwood (q.v.).

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

After this time the name of 'Ivez' disappears, but the Minsteads and the Bettesthorne were holding side by side in Minstead and Totton their respective halves of the fee. Thus in 1272 settlement was made on John de Bettesthorpe<sup>18</sup> and Margaret his wife of one messuage, 1,050 acres of land, 1,000 acres of wood, 3s. 5d. rent in Minstead, the advowson of Minstead Church and land and rent in Totton, &c., representing the Bettesthorpe moiety.<sup>19</sup> In 1316 Walter de Bettesthorpe, presumably son of John and Margaret, was holding Minstead conjointly with Juliane widow of William de Rivers, who represented the Minstead interest,<sup>20</sup> and was probably widow of John de Minstead<sup>21</sup> (who seems to have been a son of William) before her marriage to William de Rivers. She was, it seems, succeeded by a Thomas de Minstead, possibly her son by her first husband. Thomas died in 1361, leaving two infant daughters and heirs, Isabel aged three and Christina aged one and a half years.<sup>22</sup> In the meantime the Bettesthorpe moiety of Minstead had passed from Walter to Richard, presumably his son, who also died in 1361, leaving as his heirs two daughters, Joan and Margaret, and one grandson, John Bradeway son of his daughter Agnes.<sup>23</sup> The Bettesthorpe moiety was thus divided into thirds.

In 1361-2 Joan and Margaret were said to be holding their share of the messuage and lands in Minstead for the serjeanty above described conjointly with the heirs of Thomas de Minstead.<sup>24</sup> A year later (1363) they settled their two-thirds on themselves for life with reversion to John de Bettesthorpe<sup>25</sup> son of Roger de Bettesthorpe and lord of Bisterne (q.v.). This John is said to have died in 1380,<sup>26</sup> and to have been succeeded by a son John who died in 1399<sup>27</sup> holding the two-thirds of the Bettesthorpe moiety of Minstead jointly with the heirs of Thomas de Minstead. The third which John Bradeway held was at his death in 1396-7 also said to be held jointly with the heirs of Thomas.<sup>28</sup> However, Elizabeth wife of John Berkeley<sup>29</sup> acquired the two-thirds by inheritance from her father John de Bettesthorpe,<sup>30</sup> and her son and heir Maurice Berkeley acquired not only the Bradeway third,<sup>31</sup> but also the Minstead moiety, since he died in 1460<sup>32</sup> seised of the whole manor, leaving a son and heir also Maurice known as Maurice Berkeley of Bisterne. The latter at his death in 1474<sup>33</sup> left a son William, who was concerned in the rebellion of the Duke of Buckingham against Richard III and was attainted in the first Parliament of that reign.<sup>34</sup> His estates were apparently forfeited and Minstead was granted in the following year to John Hoton 'for his good service against the rebels,' to hold by a rent of £5 yearly.<sup>35</sup> He could, however, have held the manor for a short period only, as in 1489 Katherine formerly wife of William Berkeley, now married to Sir Henry Grey of Codnor, brought a suit against Katherine sister and heir of William and John Brewerton her husband for one-third of the manor of Minstead as her dower.<sup>36</sup> The result appears to have been in favour of the latter, as in 1494 she died seised of the manor.<sup>37</sup> She left as her heir a daughter Werburg, aged six years, who married first Sir Francis Cheyney and afterwards Sir William Compton of Compton Wynyates (co. Warw.), Groom of the Bedchamber and favourite courtier of Henry VIII, who was knighted after the battle of the Spurs for his valiant conduct.<sup>38</sup> Werburg predeceased her husband three years<sup>39</sup> and he then held the manor till his death in 1528.<sup>40</sup> He left as heir a son Peter, aged six years,<sup>41</sup> whose wardship was granted by the king first to Cardinal Wolsey<sup>42</sup> and after his disgrace to George Earl of Shrewsbury, who married him in 1537 to his daughter Anne.<sup>43</sup> Peter died in 1544, leaving a posthumous son Henry,<sup>44</sup> who was created Lord Compton in 1572. He was among the peers who tried Mary Queen of Scots and at her funeral is described as one 'of the four principal assistants to her corpse.'<sup>45</sup> He died in 1589<sup>46</sup> and was succeeded in his Hampshire estates by his youngest son Henry. In 1649 Richard son of the latter conveyed the manor to trustees for the purpose of barring the entail.<sup>47</sup> He suffered a recovery of the property and in 1670 he appeared before the judgement seat held at Lyndhurst before Vere Earl of Oxford, justice in eyre—the last held for the New Forest—to assert formally his claim to the manor. The record of this court is interesting as showing the special privileges attached to the manor of Minstead. After describing the estate as 'adjoining to the waste soil of the forest of Charles II without any separation or enclosure,' he claimed for himself and the tenants of the manor common of pasture and common of mast 'without

He also claimed the right to the left shoulder of all deer found within the woods of the manor. Finally on the day of the holding of the view of frankpledge he claimed for himself and his steward the right to kill and carry away one deer.<sup>48</sup>

Richard Compton died in 1684 and was succeeded by his only surviving son Henry, who had married Elizabeth daughter and co-heir of Sir Thomas Hoby.<sup>49</sup> Henry died in 1702 and was followed by a son Hoby, at whose death unmarried in 1714<sup>50</sup> the estate was inherited by his brother Henry,<sup>51</sup> who also died without issue in 1724. By his will dated the previous year his Hampshire property, including Minstead, passed to his wife Eleanor daughter of John Willis of Ringwood, who married as her second husband Dr. Charles Bave. On her death without issue in 1742 she left Minstead to her nephew Henry Willis, second son of her brother James Willis, on condition that he took the name of Compton.<sup>52</sup> He was Sheriff of Hants in 1758 and was a noted racing man, being an original member of the Jockey Club founded in 1753. His racing career extended from 1751 to 1786, during which time his horses ran in 119 races, of which he won forty-one.<sup>53</sup> He died at Bath in 1786, leaving a son Henry, who succeeded, but only survived him one year, when the property passed to his brother John, who was Sheriff of Hants in 1797 and kept the hounds from 1800 to 1803.<sup>54</sup> He died in the latter year, his eldest son Henry Combe then being a boy of fourteen. Henry became Sheriff of Hants in 1819 and took a prominent part in suppressing the 1830 agrarian riots at Fordingbridge. One of the pikes with which his men were armed is now in the manor-house.<sup>55</sup> His son Henry who succeeded him was sheriff in 1871, and on his death in 1877 his son Mr. Henry Francis Compton became lord of 'the manor of Minstead and Brook,' as the manor, including all his property at Brook, is known at the present day.<sup>56</sup>

In the time of the Confessor CANTERTON (Cantortun, xi cent.) was held by Chenna and was assessed at half a virgate. He was, however, only allowed to retain one half of his holding, the remainder being taken into the New Forest. It had formerly been worth 20s.: in 1086 the shares of the king and his tenant were 16s. and 4s. respectively.<sup>57</sup>

The records of the early history of Canterton are very scanty, but at an early date it gave its name to a family who were possessed of land in the neighbourhood and certainly held property in Canterton as early as 1227, as in that year Roger de Sevenhamton gave a messuage and all his lands in Canterton which he had of the gift of Ralph de Canterton to the church of the Holy Trinity at Mottisfont.<sup>58</sup> From scanty documentary evidence it is clear that this family continued to hold property in Canterton during the next two centuries. In 1316 Nicholas Canterton was returned as lord of the vill of Canterton,<sup>59</sup> and he was apparently succeeded by a son Andrew, who was collector of customs in the port of Southampton in 1343.<sup>60</sup> In 1473 John Canterton died seised of Canterton,<sup>61</sup> then for the first time called a manor, which he held jointly with Alice his wife of the Earl of Arundel at a rent of 6s. 1d. Alice survived and continued to hold the property till her son came of age.<sup>62</sup> From him it appears to have passed to William Canterton, who in 1556 conveyed the manor by fine to Philip Darvalt,<sup>63</sup> probably only for the purpose of a settlement, as the same year John Ringwood and Jane his wife transferred it to Alexander Mill.<sup>64</sup> In 1580 Roger Mill (probably a son of Alexander) and Alice his wife conveyed the manor to Nicholas Fuller,<sup>65</sup> who the same year jointly with Sarah his wife sold it to Thomas Goddard, member of an old Wiltshire family who had held land in Hampshire since the reign of Henry I, and with whose descendants it remained for a century and a half.

GODDARD. Gules a chevron vair between three crescents argent.

In 1608 Thomas Goddard was summoned before the Attorney-General to show by what right he held the manor of Canterton. Thomas in his reply stated that he held it under the king as of his manor of Lyndhurst by suit of court and the payment of a small annual sum<sup>66</sup>—an answer presumably satisfactory to the court, as Thomas was holding the manor at his death in 1623.<sup>67</sup> He was succeeded by a son Henry, who died four years later, having left the manor by will to his nephew Henry, then an infant, son of his brother William.<sup>68</sup> On the death of William in 1640 Alice his widow petitioned for the wardship of her son,<sup>69</sup> who subsequently succeeded and was holding the manor in 1684.<sup>70</sup> In 1703 David Goddard, probably son or grandson of Henry, sold the property to Richard Paulet of Little Testwood,<sup>71</sup> whose kinsman John Henry Beaumont fifteenth Marquess of Winchester sold it in 1887 to Mr. John Jeffreys, the present owner.<sup>72</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

1895<sup>73</sup> part of the manor of Canterton was in Wiltshire.

In the defence of Thomas Goddard in 1608 he mentions 'an ancient farm with a dwelling-house belonging to the demesne of the manor called the site or farm of the manor of Canterton with common of pasture in the commons and wastes of Brook Heath and Shave.'<sup>74</sup>

A mill was attached to the manor of Canterton as early as 1348,<sup>75</sup> probably the water-mill of which mention is made in several documents of the 17th century.<sup>76</sup> The last notice of it is in 1703.<sup>77</sup>

The church of ALL SAINTS consists of chancel with a large pew on the north and a south vestry, nave with a north pew and large south transept, west tower and north porch. The internal arrangement produces a very quaint effect, the transept being almost as long as the nave, and two large galleries entirely fill up the west end of the church. The chancel and nave are of stone, partly plastered, and all the rest of the building is in red brick. The chancel and nave seem to date from the first half of the 13th century, but the font belongs to the latter part of the 12th century and some of the walling of the church may be as old as it is. The brick additions are all of 18th-century or later date, including the tower, which, however, appears to have replaced an earlier one, for in the west wall of the nave are the jambs of a segmental headed arch, which may be of 13th-century date. The east window of the chancel is a modern double lancet. The pew on the north side has a fireplace, carpet and cushioned seats, while that to the north of the nave, though larger, has fewer domestic comforts. The chancel arch dates from the first half of the 13th century and has three engaged shafts in the jambs, while the arch, of two chamfered orders, is nearly straight-sided and has been rebuilt, the original curve being clearly shown on the stones of the arch. The north door is of the same date as the chancel arch, and has two orders with continuous edge-rolls broken by a shallow undercut abacus at the springing; the label is double chamfered. The porch is of brick and on the outer doorway are the initials and date R E W S C W 1683, doubtless, in spite of their spacing, those of the churchwardens for the year.

The south transept has three windows, each of three wood-framed lights. On the south wall of the nave below the gallery is a three-light trefoiled 16th-century window, the head in a very distorted condition, and over it is another light for the gallery. The 'three-decker' pulpit, though disfigured by graining, makes a very effective group, with its hexagonal canopy, the shape of which is spoilt by an added piece at the back; it is partly of 17th-century woodwork and on the north side of the steps to the chancel is the mutilated base of a 15th-century screen. Most of the benches in the chancel and nave have moulded back rails and are probably of 17th-century date, and the gallery fronts are very good specimens of 18th-century panelling.

The font stands in front of the pulpit and has a square Purbeck marble bowl with four restored angle shafts, stem and base. On its west face is our Lord's Baptism, on the east an Agnus Dei, on the north a lion with two bodies and a single head, and on the south two eagles having what may be a conventional tree between them. The surface is a good deal damaged, as the font has been buried in a garden.

The bells are three in number, the first bearing the inscription 'Love God R B 1604'; the second 'Sancta Maria'; the third 'In God is My Hope.'

The plate consists of a silver parcel-gilt chalice of probably 17th-century date, a silver paten with gilt edges of 1836, a silver paten of 1876, a flagon parcel gilt of 1739 and a plated almsdish.

The first book of registers contains mixed entries 1683 to 1762, the second baptisms and burials 1764 to 1812.

There is also a copy 1762 to 1768 with mixed entries.

The first mention of a church in ADVOWSON Minstead is in 1272, when, attached to the Bettesthorpe moiety of Minstead, it was settled on John de Bettesthorpe and Margaret his wife.<sup>78</sup> In 1291 it was assessed with the chapel of Lyndhurst at £6 13s. 4d.<sup>79</sup> It followed the descent of the manor,<sup>80</sup> Mr. Henry Francis Compton, the lord of the manor, being the present patron.

Among possessions forfeited for superstitious uses in the reign of Edward VI was land worth annually 1s. which had been 'appointed for ever to have continuance, of whose graunt they know not, to mayntayn 2 lightes.'<sup>81</sup>

Charity of Thomas Brown, founded CHARITIES by will 1667. (See under Christchurch.)—The yearly sum of £6 is received by the rector, who is entitled to retain 10s. for a sermon on New Year's Day, the residue in the distribution of clothes or bread.

In 1814 the Rev. Scrope Berdmore, D.D., by his will directed his executor to place the sum of £200 stock in such a manner as that the annual interest might be received by the rector to be distributed by him among the poor people of the parish on or about 6 April. The trust fund consists of £200 consols with the official trustees. The yearly income of £5 is distributed in bread.

MINSTEAD CHURCH : THE 'THREE-DECKER' PULPIT

LYMINGTON BOROUGH

LYMINGTON BOROUGH

Lentune (xi cent.); Leminton, Lyminton, Lymington (xiii cent.).

The quiet town of Lymington lies on the western bank of the Lymington River, about 2 miles from the Solent. The mud flats lining the little creek lie exposed except at high tide, and behind them is a level sweep of land rising to the west; the town stretches from the river up the hill. The original borough would seem to have been a strip of land lying by the river bank and its wharf, and probably included the High Street and the land to the south. In evidence of this it would appear that when the borough boundaries were extended in the middle of the 13th century the 'extension' lay on the north side of the church, which lies at the west end of the High Street, a long wide way leading up the hill at Flushard at the close of the 17th century, and probably identical with the three closes called Fleshetts in the tenure of John Pope in 1589-90.<sup>8</sup> Possibly here, too, may have been 'the lord's mead.'<sup>9</sup> Both these plots of land, however, seem to have been in the manor of Old Lymington and without the limits of the borough which was contained in 'the Hundred Acres.' Within this 'Hundred Acres' was the Barfield, commonable land, on which the lord of Buckland had the right of 'breach' with ten kine and a bull.<sup>10</sup> North of Barfield was Buckland Hill, with further common and a pound wherein the stray cattle of New Lymington folk were confined.<sup>11</sup> Some of the waste of the manor was inclosed by John Long in or about 1609, but part was still uninclosed in that year, and on it was a certain green hill thought to be butts and a 'summer bugg',<sup>12</sup> and a cross where the farmers of Buckland 'at the time of the procession kept drinking.'<sup>13</sup> The earthwork known as Buckland Rings was probably part of this waste.<sup>14</sup> On the lower ground there was a water-mill in 1340 belonging to the fee of Buckland,<sup>15</sup> and in 1299-1300 there was at Peisford a second mill, held by tenants paying a yearly rent of 1 lb. of pepper.<sup>16</sup>

Lymington has never played any notable part in the affairs of the kingdom at large, though, according to tradition, it has been thrice burnt in French raiding expeditions. In spite of its mud flats it was said to be growing into some repute as a watering-place in 1778,<sup>17</sup> and baths were erected in about 1830. In the Boundary Commission Report of 1831, however, the commissioners did not give a hopeful prospect for the borough. From the general appearance of the town, the absence of manufactures and trade and its unfitness as a bathing-place there was no likelihood of any considerable addition in the number of houses, of which there were then 427, only 232 being worth £10 a year. The inhabitants were chiefly tradesmen 'of a middling description,' and there were only 260 ratepayers. The present yacht-building industry dates from about this time,<sup>18</sup> and Lymington is now, perhaps, best known as a harbourage for those yachting in the Solent. But if Lymington has never been famous for political events it has latterly had several well-known persons connected with it in various ways. William Allingham held an office in the customs here; Coventry Patmore lived here from 1891 until his death in 1896; Henry Francis Lyte, the author of the hymns 'Abide with me' and 'Pleasant are Thy courts above,' held the curacy here, and here wrote many of his works.<sup>19</sup> Its nearness to Portsmouth made it in the 18th and 19th centuries, as now, a favourite place for naval officers to make a home.

right angles to the stream. Here there are still some houses with good 18th-century fronts, but the old Town Hall has gone,<sup>1</sup> and with it the Blind House and the permanent booths that stood in a row down the middle of the street. Here must have stood in 1675 the 'Nagg's Head,' the 'George,' the 'White Lion' and the 'Bugle'<sup>2</sup>—one of them doubtless that tavern at which scandal said the vicar of Boldre played tables one day while the congregation vainly waited in church for evensong.<sup>3</sup> Parallel to the High Street on either side there ran a lane, each connected with the main road by a transverse way crossing just above the Town Hall. Probably the original Town Hall was that belonging to the manor, and described in 1299-1300 as 'the hall with a garden containing  $\frac{1}{2}$  acre,' and worth 7s. per annum saving repairs.<sup>4</sup> In the reign of Edward III it was spoken of as a house with a little close used for holding courts, and worth nothing beyond repairs.<sup>5</sup> In the 17th century the hall had come to be regarded as the property of the burgesses, but it was admitted that the courts of the lord were always held there.<sup>6</sup> In the section thus formed to the south lay Holme's Mead, belonging to the town and let in 1676 for 17s.<sup>7</sup> Just east of it lay the land of Christchurch Priory, and across the road and to the south was a piece of land known as

The parish of Lymington contains the manors of Old and New Lymington and the borough of New Lymington. In 1086 the manor of Old Lymington with its vill alone existed,<sup>20</sup> and no mention is made in the Domesday Survey of the salterns here that in 1147 were already important.<sup>21</sup> About a century later the vill was so prosperous that a fresh extent of the manor was made and the rent of the tenants increased by 10s. 9d.<sup>22</sup>; apart from the salterns, some of which were held in villeinage and some in demesne,<sup>23</sup> the accounts of the reeve of the manor in 1269-70 present the usual items of a rural community.<sup>24</sup> At what date the manor of New Lymington was formed is not known, but the mesne borough on the river bank probably came into being in the 12th century,<sup>25</sup> and owed its origin to the proximity of the salterns and the conveniences of the wharfrage for the light ships of the time. The prosperity of the settlement must have increased rapidly, for by the all tenements erected after the incorporation, unless erected upon the site of tenements standing at the time of incorporation, or upon ground attached to such tenements, are exclusive of the borough.<sup>29</sup> Moreover, by the charter of 1271 the two tenements of the Abbot of Beaulieu were expressly excluded from participation in the liberties and acquittances of the borough.<sup>30</sup> It was doubtless concerning these two tenements that a dispute arose at the beginning of the 14th century<sup>31</sup> between the abbey and the borough over tolls; in the end it was agreed that the abbey might buy and sell free of toll while bound to do its part in the defence of the town.<sup>32</sup>

The borough of Lymington was BOROUGH a mesne borough held of the lords of the manor of New Lymington. It was apparently established under the charter of William de Redvers (1184-1216),<sup>33</sup> which is only known to us by a confirmation of his great-grandson middle of the 13th century Baldwin de Redvers extended the limits of the borough,<sup>26</sup> so that from this time it was comprehended within 'the Hundred Acres' and was practically conterminous with the manor of New Lymington.<sup>27</sup> The boundaries were not, however, defined until 1795,<sup>28</sup> and as late as 1847 certain tenements within the borough area were assessed not in it but in the manor. This fact was well known in 1833, when tradition had it 'that at some early period, on an incursion of some French, a great part of the then town was burnt, that what remained became incorporated as a borough, and that

Baldwin de Redvers<sup>34</sup> (1246-62). This Baldwin not only confirmed the charter of William de Redvers, but, as has been already mentioned, extended the borough on the north so as to include the Hundred Acres which it afterwards covered. In 1271 Isabella de Fortibus granted the burgesses a new charter, by which they obtained all such liberties and free customs, quittances and toll as free burgesses enjoyed throughout her land.<sup>35</sup> The borough, under this charter, was to be held at a yearly rent of 30s., and, further, the burgage rent was fixed at 6d. from the messuages both of the original borough and of the extension, and the townsmen obtained the collection of the toll while perquisites of court were expressly reserved to the lord.<sup>36</sup> All pleas arising in the borough were to be settled before the bailiffs of the lord, and amercements were limited to 30d.; they were to be quit of shire and hundred court, and had liberty to choose their own reeve (prepositus), who was to be presented and sworn at the lord's court.<sup>37</sup> The charter of Isabella further granted to the burgesses the toll and stallage in the extension of the borough made by Baldwin de Redvers, her brother.<sup>38</sup> In 1404 the burgesses obtained a confirmation of the charter of 1271 by indenture from Edward Courtenay Earl of Devon.<sup>39</sup> From that time the rights of the borough were not re-stated until 1578, when a writ of quo warranto was issued,<sup>40</sup> probably with a view to the grant of Parliamentary franchise in the interests of the Crown; on the production of the indenture of 1404 the rights of the burgesses were fully recognized. In 1688 a second writ of quo warranto was issued against the borough, but the mayor and burgesses pleaded that they were a corporation by prescription, and the Crown proceeded no further.<sup>41</sup> 'The Mayor and Burgesses of the Borough of Lymington' were still governing the town under the charters of 1271 and 1404 when the commissioners drew up their report in 1833.<sup>42</sup> Two years later the borough was reconstructed<sup>43</sup> and incorporated under the style of 'The Mayor and Corporation of the Borough of Lymington,' the government being vested in a mayor, four aldermen and twelve councillors.

An extent of 1299-1300 shows that in the borough there were thirty whole burgages and forty-nine parts, making a total of fifty-one burgages; the new burgages of the extension would seem to have been generally larger holdings; one consisted of eight and a-half burgages, and the whole amounted to thirty-seven and a-half burgages.<sup>44</sup> The usual rent from a cottage was 2d.<sup>45</sup>

In 1269-70<sup>46</sup> the reeve of the borough rendered account of 30s. from the ferm of the tolls and market, and Isabella de Fortibus confirmed this composition in the following year<sup>47</sup>; owing to the nature of the arrangement no details of the incidence of the toll are mentioned.<sup>48</sup> It must have been under this right of toll that the burgesses claimed to have anchorage and keelage in the 16th century,<sup>49</sup> and that in 1833 the borough officers claimed 'one bushel of coal from every ship that discharged at the port and six pennyworth of fish from every boat bringing fish to the quay,'<sup>50</sup> these dues forming the emoluments of the mayor (see infra).

Of the early history of the body of burgesses of Lymington little record has been preserved. The courts leet of the manor of New Lymington retained all the police and a certain amount of the civil jurisdiction in the hands of the lord,<sup>51</sup> leaving the burgesses to organize defence and regulate certain branches of trade. 'The bailiffs and commonalty' supplied the demand of Edward I for ships for his navy<sup>52</sup>; Edward II made a similar order 'to the bailiffs, men and commonalty' in 1324,<sup>53</sup> and in 1334 'the bailiffs, burgesses and commonalty' received a grant of certain privileges from the burgesses and commonalty of Southampton.<sup>54</sup> In 1408-9 'the bailiffs and burgesses' granted certain common land to John Pepwhyte under the common seal.<sup>55</sup> The present common seal<sup>56</sup> came into use in the 17th century, and shows on the sea a ship with one mast, her sail furled; on the sinister side of the mast an escutcheon of the arms of Courtenay with a label of three points.<sup>57</sup> The style of the borough from the close of the 16th century until 1835 was that of 'The Mayor and Burgesses of the Borough of Lymington.'

In 1584 a body of orders was issued which shows that the Common Hall met at irregular periods, its members assembling at a special summons,<sup>58</sup> the penalty for non-attendance being a fine of 5s. for each offence or two days and two nights' imprisonment.

The Parliamentary history of Lymington, which began in 1584 with the election of two members,<sup>59</sup> was destined to have an influence paramount over the story of the borough until the early 19th century, though it was not until another hundred years had passed that the right of the burgesses alone to elect members of Parliament was established. In the first and four subsequent elections of the reign of Elizabeth both election and return were made by the scot and lot men who joined with the mayor and burgesses, each indenture bearing a clause stating that the burgesses had authority from the community.<sup>60</sup> In 1588 there occurs the first notice of the election of a non-resident as a Burgess of Lymington<sup>61</sup>; five years later Robert Pamplyn, the queen's page, was similarly elected.<sup>62</sup> From the accession of James I onwards the mayor and burgesses alone elected, their privilege being distinctly valuable in the party warfare that followed the Restoration. Whig feeling was predominant among the burgesses, over whom the family of Burrard had already obtained a political leadership; the majority of the inhabitants of the town were Tories. John Burrard and Richard Holt were returned as members of the Convention Parliament of 1688-9 by the mayor and burgesses, while 'the scot and lot men' at a rival election returned Thomas Jervoise and Thomas Cromwell. The mayor and burgesses refused to recognize the claim of the 'popular' candidates, who presented petitions in Parliament in 1690 and 1691.<sup>63</sup> In December of the latter year the Committee of Privileges reported that the Corporation of Lymington was a corporation by prescription and that the mayor and burgesses alone had the franchise.<sup>64</sup> To this the House agreed. In 1695 a second petition was presented with a like result,<sup>65</sup> and in 1710 the 'populace' made a last attempt to participate in the election, but their claim was disallowed.<sup>66</sup> Even at this date only fifteen or sixteen out of seventy burgesses were inhabitants of Lymington,<sup>67</sup> the rest being honorary burgesses whose chief and recognized function was to support the family in power at the Parliamentary elections.<sup>68</sup> From this time onwards the elections became not so much struggles between two political parties as between the adherents of the rival families of Burrard and Paulet. This may be illustrated by the events of 1745 when the mayor, a strong partisan, knowing that most of his opponents were away from Lymington, called a meeting and elected fourteen of his own party as burgesses.<sup>69</sup> The contest between the two families ended in an agreement by which the Burrards obtained the patronage on condition that the Paulet nominee was returned to the Parliament of 1774.<sup>70</sup> The Burrards further secured their position by first electing thirty-nine new burgesses and then by obtaining the re-enactment of by-laws limiting the number of burgesses to fifty, depriving the mayor of power to elect burgesses unless the number were under twenty and stipulating for six days' notice of a meeting of the burgesses.<sup>71</sup> From 1774 until 1832 the patronage of the borough was regarded as the private property of the Burrards, who at will elected burgesses 'in order to strengthen and support their family interest.'<sup>72</sup> In 1831 the constituency, which returned two members to Parliament, consisted only of thirty-eight electors.<sup>73</sup> With the reconstruction of the borough in 1835<sup>74</sup> this state of affairs came to an end, but Lymington continued to return two members to Parliament until 1867. By the Representation of the People Act<sup>75</sup> it still retained one member until 1885, when by the Redistribution of Seats Act<sup>76</sup> its representation was merged in that of the New Forest division of the county.

The earliest extant charter of Lymington contained a clause directing that no burgess should be made reeve of the borough but he who should be chosen by common consent and presented to the lord.<sup>77</sup> In 1269-70 Robert de Lisle (L'Isle) rendered account as reeve of the borough, and among the expenses of the year was 12d. paid to the reeve and bedel, an item also mentioned in 1271-4 and 1297-9.<sup>78</sup> The first mention found of the 'bailiffs and commonalty' occurs in a letter addressed by them to Edward I,<sup>79</sup> and they received writs under that style in 1308<sup>80</sup> and 1346,<sup>81</sup> when they were ordered to prevent the bringing in of papal bulls or instruments prejudicial to the king. Though bereft of its glory the office of bailiff still existed in 1598, when the burgesses passed a resolution that none but burgesses should be elected to this office, an order that was afterwards cancelled.<sup>82</sup> In the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries the officers of the borough seem to have been much the same as in 1833, when they were a mayor, a recorder, a town clerk, a town serjeant and burgesses to an indefinite number.<sup>83</sup>

A mayor is first mentioned by that name in the Town Books in 1508, when Robert Bishop held the office, and with the lord of the manor signed an agreement between the boroughs of Southampton and Lymington.<sup>84</sup> Like the bailiff, the mayor was chosen by the burgesses, the day of election being the Sunday after St. Matthew's Day, though from 1651 until the Restoration the date was changed to the Tuesday before Michaelmas<sup>85</sup>; from early in the 19th century the election was made on the Monday following.<sup>86</sup> Before the reform of 1835 the burgesses met on that day and inspected the 'Record,' a list containing the names of the outgoing mayor and two other burgesses. They then struck off the Record the name of the mayor, who submitted to them the names of three burgesses suited to fill the vacancy; the burgesses had, however, power to elect an entirely new Record. If an individual burgess proposed a name of a burgess other than those named by the mayor, the mayor read out the whole list, and the Record was filled by a majority of votes. When the Record was completed the names upon it were submitted to the outgoing mayor and the burgesses, who by a majority of votes elected from among them the mayor for the ensuing year. In 1677, 'for the preventing of animosities and other inconveniences which may arise at the choice of a fit person to serve as mayor for this town,' the ballot was adopted; but six weeks later the burgesses concluded that the order was 'prejudicial and inconvenient,' and rescinded it accordingly.<sup>87</sup> The new mayor, generally the burgess whose name was last placed upon the Record, then attended the court leet, and, after paying homage, was sworn in and admitted to office.<sup>88</sup> In 1653 the court leet fined William Burrard £5 'for not taking upon him the office of mayor, as he was enioyned att the last law-day,' as well as £10 for not taking the oath of office.<sup>89</sup> An entry in the town books implies that before 1586 the 'rents, entries and forfeits' were claimed by the mayor as his emoluments; but in that year these were secured to the town, the mayor being granted 'the benefit of the wool'<sup>90</sup> until the expiration of the lease of Holme's Mead,<sup>91</sup> which he was then to have 'in respecte of the greate trouble and chardge he shall be put to by reasone of his sayde offyce.'<sup>92</sup> In 1599 the finances of the town were straitened by a dispute with certain 'disobedient persons,' and Holme's Mead was let, the mayor being compensated by a yearly sum of 50s.<sup>93</sup> This order was rescinded at a later date, and in 1833 the only emoluments of the mayor were one bushel of coals from each ship unloading at the port and sixpennyworth of fish from each fishing boat.<sup>94</sup> The chief function of the mayor was the regulation of the trade of Lymington as affected by its markets and fairs, quay and wharf.<sup>95</sup> He also acted as treasurer of the borough, and in 1584 the burgesses threatened that if he did not cause all forfeits to be paid in his year of office and accounted for at its end he would have 'to paye the same in that case of his owne purse.'<sup>96</sup>

The stewards are mentioned in 1584, when two burgesses were appointed to that office,<sup>97</sup> their duty being to collect the dues from the market and quay and account for them to the mayor.<sup>98</sup>

In 1596 a 'recorder' is mentioned,<sup>99</sup> though the borough possessed no courts. The name was probably assumed in emulation of other towns, for in 1698 'recorder' was used as synonymous with 'steward,' and in 1833, though the name 'steward' had disappeared, the recorder remained, without either functions or emoluments.<sup>100</sup> In practice the place of the stewards was taken by the town clerk, first mentioned in 1699.<sup>101</sup> In 1727 the burgesses 'ordered that the town clerk do receive the rents and do account for the same.'<sup>102</sup> The ale-taster was always a burgess, and held office for a year, his appointment being made at the time of the mayor's election. Although it is probable that an officer of the borough had been appointed ale-taster at a much earlier date, he is first mentioned in 1602,<sup>103</sup> and in 1652 the court leet fined Richard King 40s. for refusing the office.<sup>104</sup> The town serjeant held office at the pleasure of the mayor and burgesses, and is first mentioned in 1675, when 30s. were given him as his yearly wage,<sup>105</sup> a sum increased to 45s. in 1681.<sup>106</sup>

Of the origin of the Saturday market, which is still held in Lymington, no record remains, but the charter of Baldwin de Redvers speaks of the toll, while in 1269-70 the reeve of the borough rendered account of 30s. from the ferm of the toll and market.<sup>107</sup>

The right to hold a fair on St. Matthew's vigil, feast and morrow was granted by Henry III to Baldwin de Redvers in 1257,<sup>108</sup> and is mentioned in his grant to the borough.<sup>109</sup> In 1269-70 the reeve of the borough rendered no account from the tolls of the fairs, since the constable Hugh de Manby was answerable<sup>110</sup>; shortly afterwards these tolls yielded 17s. 4½d.,<sup>111</sup> though in 1297-9 the amount had dropped to 3s. 8d.,<sup>112</sup> and the average in 1299-1300 was returned as 6s. 8d.<sup>113</sup> The stallage of the fair had been granted by Isabella de Fortibus to the burgesses in 1271,<sup>114</sup> and they claimed this with the picage in 1578,<sup>115</sup> when the fair was said to be held in the High Street. This fair is still held there on 2 and 3 October, but a second fair, said in 1578 to be also held in the High Street on the feast of St. Philip and St. James, has been discontinued during the last thirty years.<sup>116</sup>

Concerning the internal regulation of trade apart from the markets and fairs little information has been preserved, but the orders of 1584 forbade, under a penalty of 5s., the taking of a stranger as tenant without the mayor's consent.<sup>117</sup> That some further attempt was made to exclude aliens is evident from the further order of 1587, by which it was enacted that none 'shall use or occupye anie kinde of crafte occup'ion or trade within the Towne' without first compounding with the mayor.<sup>118</sup> In this connexion may also be mentioned an agreement made in 1594 by the mayor and burgesses and sundry butchers of the town, by which it was determined that all tallow should be delivered to John Pratt, the town Chandler, at a fixed price of 2d. per lb., on the understanding that Pratt sold candles at 3s. per lb. to the inhabitants of the New Town and the burgesses living in the Old.<sup>119</sup>

The manor of Old Lymington undoubtedly owed its importance to its salterns,<sup>120</sup> the proximity of which must have greatly influenced the growth of the town; but while the tenants of the manor were labouring at their salterns it is evident that the burgesses were no less busily employed in faring over seas. The first known mention of the bailiffs and commonalty of Lymington occurs in their reply to the mandate of Edward I for the supply of three ships for his navy.<sup>121</sup> The larger ships, they said, were at sea and in the keeping of God, they had only little cogges left and these were not sufficient for war. However, they offered to furnish one large ship at their own cost for three weeks after the Assumption.<sup>122</sup> In 1324 the king demanded two ships instead of one from Lymington, 'Boldre' and 'Kyavene,'<sup>123</sup> and two years later Maurice de Brune and others were appointed to survey the ships of over 50 tons burden in the town of Lymington.<sup>124</sup> Some of the names of these merchantmen have been preserved. In 1349 Nicholas de Stok, a merchant of Norwich, and Thomas de Coventry, a merchant of Bristol, chartered the Rode Cog of Lymington, John de Ouse, master, to bring wine, mead, leather, canvas and other goods from Harfleur to England.<sup>125</sup> Again in 1342 a barge of Lymington was trading with wine and other merchandise between Brittany and Weymouth.<sup>126</sup> Salisbury seems to have looked upon Lymington as a convenient port, for in 1434 one of her merchants complained of the arrest of his ship the Marie of Lymington,<sup>127</sup> and in 1462 the citizens chartered the Trinity of the same port as their contribution to the fleet that put to sea under the Earl of Kent and Lord Audley.<sup>128</sup> It is not likely that the men of Lymington confined themselves to trade; acts of piracy, such as that committed by two men of Lymington in 1426 against the Christopher of Sluys belonging to John 'of Rows,' were doubtless frequent.<sup>129</sup>

During the Middle Ages Lymington would seem to have been particularly engaged in the wine trade, and the prosperity of the town in 1325 was such that the men of Southampton lodged a formal complaint with the Crown that whereas they had been granted all privileges as a port between Hurst and Langstone, in aid of their fee-farm, yet the men of Lymington had taken customs from certain ships putting in there. Southampton obtained a pronouncement from the courts in its favour,<sup>130</sup> but the complaint cropped up again and again. Thus in 1328

auntz of the Havene of Lymyngton' in 1432, setting forth that in the past 'many divase shippes and vesselx with grete substaunce of merchaundises not staple ware but other were wont to put in there, but that of late there have been no customers, and the ships have therefore discharged elsewhere.'<sup>136</sup> The result of this was that the customers of Southampton were required to supply deputies for Lymington and for the collection of duty on goods other than staple.<sup>137</sup> The arrangement was not entirely satisfactory, and in 1508 the two towns agreed on a schedule of goods the duty on which was assigned to Southampton, while keelage, wharfage and other duties went to Lymington.<sup>138</sup> Disputes with Southampton on the collection of duty continued until 1730, when a judicial decision secured the petty customs to Lymington.<sup>139</sup> In the 17th century the carriage of New Forest timber formed an important item in the trade of the town,<sup>140</sup> and Lymington ships are mentioned as trading with Bordeaux,<sup>141</sup> and as carrying salt and the town of Southampton declared that the men of Lymington had taken and carried away customs to the amount of £600,<sup>131</sup> and in 1330-1 two customers were appointed for the port of Lymington,<sup>132</sup> while a chief butler there is spoken of in 1334.<sup>133</sup> In 1346 there is record of the appointment of a king's yeoman for the port,<sup>134</sup> and in the same year masters of ships bringing in wine there were ordered to take security from the assignees 'that they would take the same to the accustomed places where the wines have been wont to be gauged.'<sup>135</sup> A petition was addressed to Parliament by 'the marchauntz and pooere inhabit-

Domesday Book records that one MANORS Lening or Leving held 1 hide of land at LYMINGTON in parage under Edward the Confessor. Attached to this land was woodland which William annexed to the New Forest, and the assessment of the hide was lowered to half a hide in consequence, the value dropped at the same time from 20s. to 15s. The hide was granted to Earl Roger of Shrewsbury,<sup>145</sup> who held it in 1088, when Fulcuin was his tenant there. From Earl

Roger Lymington descended, with his other lands, to his son Hugh Earl of Shrewsbury, who died in 1098, and was succeeded by his brother Robert.<sup>146</sup> On the accession of Henry I Robert took up the cause of Robert of Normandy, and in 1102 suffered forfeiture.<sup>147</sup> Lymington was then granted with Christchurch (q.v.) by Henry I<sup>148</sup> to Richard de Redvers, and like Christchurch<sup>149</sup> descended to Isabella de Fortibus, whose right to Lymington was attacked by the Prior of Breamore in 1267. The prior's claim was based on a grant made by the will of Baldwin, the late earl, who was buried in the priory. He also produced a charter given by Isabella herself confirming the gift and another confirmation made by Henry III on the testimony of Eleanor the queen.<sup>150</sup> Isabella admitted that Baldwin had granted the manor to Breamore Priory for a term of years, but since the prior had no seisin at the time of the earl's death the royal charter was of no avail. Her own charter of confirmation she maintained was exacted from her during the barons' wars, when she had remained loyal to the Crown in spite of the persistence of Simon de Montfort. After the battle of Lewes, while 'robbers and disturbers of the peace of the kingdom rode ravaging with horses and arms throughout England,' she had sought shelter at Breamore only to find in the prior a friend of Simon de Montfort the younger, to whom she had been 'sold seditiously' for 50 marks. In despair she had offered the charter upon the altar of the priory church of St. Michael of Breamore, and, the bribe proving successful, she was allowed to escape from the priory, though Simon de Montfort pursued her from place to place with horse and arms, desiring to capture her and seditiously abduct her until she found refuge in Wales. That Isabella's version was true may be inferred from the final agreement by which in return for £20 land in 'Portbyri' the prior acknowledged her right to the manor of Lymington, and returned to her the charter in dispute.<sup>151</sup> Avelina, the only daughter of the Countess Isabella, died in her mother's lifetime in 1274, and in 1293 the countess sold to the king the Isle of Wight with Christchurch and other manors.<sup>152</sup> On her death in the same year Edward I took the manor of Lymington, as a member of Christchurch, into his own hands,<sup>153</sup> and in 1299 he assigned it to Queen Margaret as part of her dower.<sup>154</sup> In 1302, however, Henry Courtenay, cousin and heir<sup>155</sup> of Isabella, successfully claimed the manor of Lymington, maintaining that it had never been a member of Christchurch Twyneham and was not included in the grant to the Crown.<sup>156</sup> In 1315 Hugh was empowered to enfeoff his mother Eleanor, daughter of Hugh Lord le Despenser, in the manors of Old and New Lymington,<sup>157</sup> and he was returned as lord in 1316.<sup>158</sup> Hugh Courtenay died in 1340 and was succeeded by his son of the same name,<sup>159</sup> who in the following year had livery of the 'manor of Bremmore and Lymington . . . held in chief' by the service of two knights' fees,<sup>160</sup> New Lymington being assessed in 1346 at half a fee.<sup>161</sup> Hugh died in 1377 and was succeeded by his grandson Edward,<sup>162</sup> who in 1385 received licence to grant messuages, land and rent in Old and New Lymington to feoffees.<sup>163</sup> Dying in 1419 he was succeeded by his son Sir Hugh Courtenay,<sup>164</sup> and he in 1422 by his son Thomas, then a child but eight years old.<sup>165</sup> In the Wars of the Roses Thomas Courtenay remained a firm Lancastrian, and his principles were inherited by his son Thomas, who succeeded his father in 1458,<sup>166</sup> and, being made prisoner at the battle of Towton, was beheaded in April 1461.<sup>167</sup> Lymington, with his other lands, was confiscated,<sup>168</sup> but in the July of the same year his brother Henry received licence to enter freely into the manor of Lymington,<sup>169</sup> and in the following February Edward IV granted him the manor and borough, confirming them to him in 1465.<sup>170</sup> However, after the death of Henry in 1467 the king granted Lymington to Walter Blount<sup>171</sup> created Lord Mountjoy in 1465.<sup>172</sup> He died in 1474 and was succeeded by his son Edward, then a child of seven years<sup>173</sup>; the close of his minority must almost have coincided with the accession of Henry VII, who in October 1489 restored Lymington to Edward Courtenay as heir of Henry, the grant being afterwards allowed by Parliament.<sup>174</sup> As Edward died childless, the manors passed to his sister Joan wife of William Knyvet, and on her death without issue to her sister Elizabeth, who had married Sir Hugh Conway, kt.

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

Possession of the manors was confirmed to them in 1490, but they too were childless.<sup>175</sup> In 1511 Henry VIII granted the reversion of the manors to William Courtenay Earl of Devon and Katherine his wife,<sup>176</sup> sixth daughter of Edward IV, but William died shortly afterwards and the grant was confirmed to Katherine in 1512.<sup>177</sup> From her it descended in 1527 to her son Henry created Marquess of Exeter in 1511,<sup>178</sup> and it was among the possessions confiscated on his attainder and execution in 1539.<sup>179</sup> Lymington remained in the hands of the Crown until 1541, when it formed part of the jointure of Katherine Howard.<sup>180</sup> On her execution it was once more forfeited and granted by Edward VI in 1553<sup>181</sup> to his uncle, Sir Henry Seymour, kt. One of the first acts of Queen Mary was to release Edward Courtenay Marquess of Exeter, who had been imprisoned in the Tower since the execution of his father, and Lymington was restored to him in May 1554.<sup>182</sup> He died unmarried at Padua in 1556 and Lymington again came into the hands of the Crown.<sup>183</sup> Portions of it were leased in 1589 and 1590; in 1593 it was granted for a term to Thomas and William Fortescue and seven years later it was granted in fee to Nicholas Lord Zouche and Elizabeth his wife.<sup>184</sup> The latter in 1601 conveyed Lymington to Charles Earl of Nottingham and Katherine his wife,<sup>185</sup> who held it for less than eight years, Abraham Campion, citizen and cloth-maker of London, being the lord in 1609.<sup>186</sup> He died in London in 1611<sup>187</sup> and was succeeded by Henry, his son, and Lymington is said to have been held by his descendants in 1664.<sup>188</sup> However, in 1665 Bartholomew Bulkeley was in possession<sup>189</sup> and was succeeded by a son of the same name, whose son Thomas was followed by a son Bartholomew.<sup>190</sup> In 1733 the manor was in the hands of Thomas Missing,<sup>191</sup> who, with Thomas Marday and James Missing, conveyed it in 1778 to Clewer Stares.<sup>192</sup> Mrs. Elizabeth Gwiton had become lady of the manor by 1785–90<sup>193</sup> and was still holding it in 1795<sup>194</sup>; but in 1805 she sold it to George Bishop of Lincoln and afterwards of Winchester. In 1834 the bishop's eldest son

William Edward Tomline, sometime M.P. for Truro, sold it to John Pulteney, who died in 1849, having by his will devised this manor and his other estates to uses under which his grandson John Granville Beaumont Pulteney became tenant for life. Mr. J. G. B. Pulteney died in 1875, leaving an only son, Mr. Keppel Pulteney, the present lord of the manor.<sup>195</sup>

The manor of NEW LYMINGTON followed the descent of the older manor, and is practically continuous with the borough.

As a member of the manor of Old Lymington the overlordship of BUCKLAND (Boclande, xiii cent.) followed the descent of that manor (q.v.).<sup>196</sup> Its recorded history begins in the 13th century when Nigel de Buckland with the consent of Nigel his son and heir granted a saltern to the monks of Quarr in the marsh of Oxeheye; this was probably in the early years of the century, for in 1299–1300 John de Buckland, apparently a son of the younger Nigel,<sup>197</sup> was holding 28 messuages, a water-mill and a saltern of the manor of Old Lymington.<sup>198</sup> In 1316 William de Percy, possibly a trustee, granted to this same John 2 carucates of land, 45 acres of meadow, 57 acres of pasture in Buckland, Arnewood and other places.<sup>199</sup> Before 1340 John had been succeeded by William de Buckland, who in that year made a settlement of the land on himself and his wife Joan with remainder to Robert, their son and heir.<sup>200</sup> Robert probably died before his father, or could only have held the manor a short time, since in 1362<sup>201</sup> a Sir John de Buckland died seised of the manor, assessed at one eighth part of a fee, leaving a brother and heir Thomas.

A few years afterwards it must have come into the hands of Walter Sydeylng, who died before 1397,<sup>202</sup> leaving two daughters and co-heirs, Margery, who married John Durneford, and Amflesia, who married Thomas Colyngton, to whom the manor descended in two moieties.<sup>203</sup> Both John and Margery Durneford had died childless before 1413,<sup>204</sup> when Thomas Colyngton also died, having survived his wife, whose heir was her cousin Agnes daughter of Emmote the sister of Walter de Sydeylng.<sup>205</sup> The two moieties of the manor thus became united in the hands of Agnes, then a woman of fifty,<sup>206</sup> and possibly married to a member of the Popham family, for in 1417 it was held by Henry Popham, who before his death in that year had settled it on his younger son John Popham,<sup>207</sup> and in 1444-5 certain trustees demised the whole manor to Margaret widow of Henry Popham.<sup>208</sup>

Shortly after this the manor seems to have been again divided into two moieties through the succession of co-heiresses. In 1473 a John Long died seised of the manor of Barton Stacey (q.v.) and half the manor of Buckland in right of Margaret his wife.<sup>209</sup> He was succeeded by Thomas his son, and he in 1497 sold this moiety of the manor to John Long,<sup>210</sup> who in his turn dealt with it by fine in 1567.<sup>211</sup> In 1601 he sold it to Sir Walter Long,<sup>212</sup> mentioned as lord of half the manor of Buckland in 1609. He died in 1611 and was succeeded by Walter, his son, then a minor,<sup>213</sup> who was still holding the land in 1621, when he was party with John Long to a settlement.<sup>214</sup>

The second moiety of the manor was held in 1524 by Sir Thomas Lovell, kt.,<sup>215</sup> who by his will bequeathed it to Thomas Manners Lord Roos in tail male. In 1534 Richard Colville and others conveyed it to Matthew Hardys.<sup>216</sup> Ten years later it was in the hands of William Kellaway and Anne his wife,<sup>217</sup> whose daughter Mary married William Button of Alton and brought this moiety into that family.<sup>218</sup> They were succeeded by their eldest son Sir Ambrose Button,<sup>219</sup> who held it in 1609.<sup>220</sup> Settlements were made of the manor on their younger sons Edward and Henry Button, with contingent remainders to their nephew John son of John Button and others. Both Edward and Henry died without male issue, and in 1624 the succession passed in accordance with the settlement.<sup>221</sup> The fourth John Button of Buckland died without issue in 1679, when his lands were divided between his sisters and co-heirs, Anne wife of Paul Burrard, Cecilia wife of William Knapton and Elizabeth wife of John Burrard.<sup>222</sup>

The heritage of Elizabeth was further divided between her daughters and co-heirs: Mary who married Robert Knapton, Sarah, who married Hugh Harsnet, and Betty wife of Ralph Hastings.<sup>223</sup> It was their children who conveyed some rights in the manor to George Middleton in 1713.<sup>224</sup> In 1705 the entirety of the manor passed to William son of Cecilia and William Knapton.<sup>225</sup> His trustees in 1716 conveyed it to Edward Dummer, who left co-heiresses, one of whom was Mary wife of John Bond. In 1775 the co-heiresses made a conveyance under which John son of Mary and John Bond ultimately became tenant in tail of the manor. John Bond lived at Buckland in 1790 and in 1802 sold lands in Buckland, but not the manor, to George Tomline. These lands have followed the descent of the manor of Lymington and are now owned by Mr. Keppel Pulteney. The old manor-house known as Little Buckland was sold by Mr. Pulteney to Captain Cotton, the present owner, in 1895.

The church of ST. THOMAS OF CHURCH CANTERBURY consists of chancel with continuous nave, north chapel, transepts, and aisle with a north porch, containing a stair to the gallery above, a tower south-west of the chancel, a south aisle with gallery and a west gallery approached by a stair from a passage and doorway at the west end. There is little of real architectural interest, but the north chapel dates from the end of the 13th century, and the chancel, retaining a mid-13th-century piscina, is doubtless older. Traces of an arcade discovered in its south wall show that it had a south chapel also, and the north transept is probably on old lines. All other evidence of ancient work is destroyed, but enough remains to show that the church was of considerable size and importance by the end of the 13th century.

The present tower dates from 1670, and possibly represents an earlier one in this position. The nave and aisles appear to be entirely of the 18th century or later. Records of work done in 1682, 1756 and 1792 give the dates for these works, but in modern times most of the windows have been fitted with Gothic tracery, and the general external effect is that of a much-restored Gothic building.

The east window of the chancel is modern of five lights in 15th-century style. On the south wall is a trefoiled piscina recess of 13th-century date, with a well-moulded arch and shafted jamb and two modern three-light windows.

The rear arches and jambs of the east and two north windows of the north chapel are original and of very good detail, with moulded labels, and in the case of the east window engaged shafts in the jambs. The pair of buttresses on the north-east angle are also original, but the window tracery is entirely modern.

The window in the north transept is modern, of three lights, and has some very poor foreign stained glass representing the nailing of Christ to the cross. West of this in the north aisle are three modern two-light windows.

The interior is full of galleries; a large one at the west containing the organ, another in the south aisle, and a third running the full length of the church, from the east wall of the north chapel to the west end of the nave. All have panelled wood fronts, and are carried on pairs of plastered columns, with similar pairs above them to support the roofs. The principal entrances to the church are under the tower and at the west of the nave, and over the latter is a five-light window with modern tracery of 15th-century style.

The roofs of the chancel, nave, north chapel and transept are of a mediaeval type common in the district, with arched plaster ceilings divided into panels by thin moulded ribs, with carved bosses at the intersections. On the chancel roof is the date 1720, and some cherubs' heads at the east end are certainly of this time, but in the main the roof must be old work repaired. The bosses are crudely coloured, and in themselves are of very poor workmanship; but some seem mediæval, and this is notably the case in the north transept, where the Trinity emblem of the three fish in triangle occurs, as well as an angel holding a shield with its lettering in late Gothic. Much of the work looks to be 18th-century imitations of 15th-century details. The altar table is dated 1673, with the initials I. K. P. W., but there are otherwise no old wood fittings, and the roof is comparatively modern. The only monument of interest is a small brass to Joan wife of Francis Guidott, whose death on Christmas Day

The registers are contained in seven books. Book 1 has all entries, 1662 to 1709 (incomplete to 1683); 2, the same, 1709 to 1754; 3, baptisms and burials, 1754 to 1812; 4, 5, 6, and 7, marriages only, 1754 to 1764, 1764 to 1772, 1772 to 1785, and 1785 to 1812 respectively. There are also two volumes of churchwardens' accounts, 1669 to 1797; vestry minute books, 1738 to 1812; and a minute book of poor-house committee, 1775 to 1790.

The earliest known record of a chapel at Lymington is in a charter of 1141-55 by which Baldwin de Redvers granted to Christchurch Twyneham the church of Boldre, with its chapels of Brockenhurst and Lymington.<sup>226</sup> The right of presenting a chaplain

There are nine funeral hatchments and many late mural monuments throughout the church.

On the stair at the west end are the royal arms of George I, dated 1716.

There are eight bells.

The plate consists of two silver chalices, of 1774 and 1840 respectively, two silver patens of 1774 and one of 1840, and a flagon and two almsdishes of

In 1657, on the petition of the mayor and burgesses, the Commonwealth Council ordered the trustees for the maintenance of ministers to allow the minister of Lymington an augmentation of £50.<sup>228</sup> In the early 19th century the practice was for the vicar of Boldre to nominate a curate and for the parishioners to present,<sup>229</sup> but in 1870 the chapelry of St. Thomas of Canterbury was erected into a vicarage, the Bishop of Winchester being patron.

The chantry of St. Edward the Bishop at Buckland is first mentioned in 1396-7 when the advowson was granted with 2 carucates of land by Edward Courtenay to John and Margery Durneford.<sup>230</sup> It was held by the successive owners of the second moiety of the manor, being in the hands of Richard Colville in 1534<sup>231</sup> and in those of Sir William Kellaway ten years later,<sup>232</sup> when it is last mentioned. About this date it is called a free chapel, founded for a priest to sing for the ease of the tenants there. The value of the chapel was 66s. 8d., which the priest received as salary, and it was said that there were no ornaments, plate, jewel goods or chattels appertaining thereto.<sup>233</sup> It seems, however, to have been endowed with some land, for in 1609 it was stated that the only land round Buckland Common not belonging to Buckland was the 'Chaurtrie' Close.<sup>234</sup>

The Roman Catholic chapel of Our Lady of Mercy and St. Joseph was built in 1859. There are also a Baptist chapel, founded in 1688, a Congregational chapel, founded in 1700, a Wesleyan Methodist chapel and the Salvation Army have a meeting place.

In addition to land and buildings, the school is endowed with £156 17s. 3d. consols, with the official trustees, who also hold a sum of £313 14s. 6d. consols, representing a legacy of £300 by will of Ann Burrard, bearing date 4 July 1777. The income is applied in support of the National school, conveyed by deed 1835.

Charity of Thomas Brown (see under Christchurch).—The share applicable in Lymington amounts to about £12 10s. a year, of which 10s. is paid to the minister for preaching a sermon on 1 January, and the residue is applicable in clothes, bread or otherwise.

In 1721 George Burrard, by will proved in the P.C.C., gave to the poor £100 to be laid out for their benefit. The principal was originally laid out in the erection of almshouses, subsequently added to the poor-house. Under order of the Poor Law Board, 1853, a sum of £130 was invested in £143 8s. 11d. consols in respect of this charity.

Rear-Admiral Thomas Rogers, who died in 1814, by his will bequeathed £1,000, the income thereof to be applied for the benefit of ten old and indigent men and women, five of each sex. The trust fund consists of £1,082 4s. 10d. consols, producing yearly £27 1s., which is divided equally among the ten recipients.

Howe's Charity.—In 1868 Lieut. Thomas Rogers, R.N., by will proved at Oxford 27 May, bequeathed £2,100 consols, to found a charity to be called after his wife, the income to be distributed on 21 October in every year in overcoats, cloaks or blankets amongst poor men and women attending church, the minister to receive £1 and the churchwardens 10s. each. The stock is held by the official trustees. In 1906 44 persons received £1 each.

India 3 per cent. stock, income applicable under deed of 6 November 1787 in defraying expenses; £500 13s. 11d. like stock, income applicable under deed of 2 August 1890 in maintenance, clothing and education of poor children belonging to Presbyterian congregation, residue for poor of same; £255 India 3½ per cent. stock, arising from gifts of Sarah Jefferey and Ann Burrard, by deeds, dated respectively 2 May 1745 and 1 June 1787, for the minister, and £391 6s. 1d. India 3 per cent. stock, also for the minister, under will of Charles Rice dated 23 February 1854. See also under East Boldre.

The New Lane Baptist Chapel, founded in 1688, is endowed with a house in New Street, a garden in Gosport Street containing 3a. 3r. 15p., and 5a. 1r. 6p. of meadow-land, producing yearly £70 or thereabouts, applicable under deeds of 1792 and 1878 towards the pastor's stipend and repairs. In 1883 Robert Wheeler, by will proved at London 9 March, bequeathed £10,000 consols, the dividends of which are applicable in the payment of £50 to the minister of the same chapel, and the residue for poor widows, children and indigent poor members of the congregation. # A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

BEAULIEU LIBERTY

Bellus Locus Regis (xiii cent.) ; Bewley (xvi cent.) ; Beaulie (xvii cent.).

The parish of Beaulieu contains 9,914 acres, which include 2,974 acres of arable land, 2,345 acres of permanent grass and 2,699 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>1</sup> Denny Lodge,<sup>2</sup> the northern part of the parish, which was formed into a township in 1868, comprises 10,832 acres. Of these 31 acres are arable, 158 acres permanent grass and 2,947 acres woods and plantations.<sup>3</sup> Extending over a large area are Beaulieu Heath and the Denny Lodge Walk of the New Forest. The whole parish also includes 95 acres of water, 135 acres of tidal water and 1,157 acres of foreshore. The geological formation consists of the Bagshot and Bracklesham beds in the north and the oligocene series in the south, with alluvial deposits at the mouth of the Beaulieu River,<sup>4</sup> which winds through the parish and empties itself into the Solent. The chief crops are cereals. The elevation varies from sea level up to nearly 150 ft.

The remains of the abbey and the church stand in a bend of the Beaulieu River. The old gatehouse was fitted up at the Dissolution for the use of Lord Chancellor Wriothesley. It is now known as Palace House, and is still the residence of the lord of the manor. The remains of a wine-press are still to be seen, and brandy was made from grapes grown here as late as the beginning of the 18th century. The village lies immediately south of the site of the monastic buildings across the river, which is here spanned by a bridge. 'The village itself,' says a modern writer, 'with its ancient water-mill, its palace of the Montagus and the Abbey of Beaulieu, a grey ivied ruin, has a distinction above all Hampshire villages, and is unlike all others in its austere beauty and atmosphere of old-world seclusion and quietude.'<sup>4a</sup>

Otterwood, mentioned in Domesday Book, is half a mile east and Penderley 2 miles north-west. Sowley is a hamlet  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles to the south-west of Beaulieu. From the large pond there the abbey fish-ponds were stocked (vide infra). At Bucklers Hard, near the mouth of the river, John second Duke of Montagu, known as 'John the Planter,' projected a town and docks as a dépôt for the produce of the island of St. Lucia, then in his possession. The plan, however, came to nothing. In 1894 Lord Montagu of Beaulieu erected a pier there for the use of excursionists.

There are roads running from Beaulieu to Lyndhurst, Lymington and Marchwood, and the site of a Roman road passes through the north-east of the parish.

Beaulieu Road station on the Southampton and Dorchester Railway is  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles north of the village.

In 1205 King John founded Beaulieu MANOR Abbey, endowing it with lands in the New Forest,<sup>8</sup> which remained to it until the Dissolution. In 1220 the abbot and monks obtained permission to mark off their land from the forest with a dyke,<sup>9</sup> and in 1235 the forest officers were instructed to assign them a carucate of heath in the bailiwick of Richard Foillet, containing 100 acres by the king's perch, to make up 5 carucates, four of which had been assigned to them in another part of the forest.<sup>10</sup> Such close proximity to the forest must have been a sore temptation to abbots of sporting proclivities, and in 1278 Abbot Dennis obtained pardon—on payment of 40 marks—for making three breaches in Beaulieu Close and placing there stakes and engines for taking deer, as well as for hunting a stag and taking a buck in the forest.<sup>11</sup> In 1300 the monks had licence to inclose 8 acres of waste of their own soil at Black Down, near Holbury,<sup>12</sup> and in February 1324 they had a grant to hold 223½ acres of waste land in the south bailiwick of the forest, for which they had received no charter.<sup>13</sup> These comprised 80½ acres in 'Notle,' 22 in 'Codelesdon,' 38 in Otterwood, 25 at 'la Gunildcrofte,' on both sides of the water, 50 at Culverley, and 8 at 'la Fermcroft.' A rent of 4d. an acre was charged, and the abbot and convent were to inclose the land with a small dyke and a low hedge, leaving free ingress and egress from the nearest highway. They were further to claim no common outside this area.<sup>14</sup> These inclosures were not, however, permitted to be made without protest. The abbot's dykes were filled up, and his hedges and stakes uprooted and burnt. His men went in fear of their lives, and at 'Notle' were so badly beaten that he lost their service for a long time.<sup>15</sup> The matter had not been settled completely two years later, in June 1326, when those who had not appeared to answer these charges were pardoned of outlawry on condition that they surrendered themselves to prison and stood their trial if the abbot should proceed against them.<sup>16</sup>

The abbey lands were held in free alms, and on this ground the abbot in 1341 obtained for himself and his successors freedom from attending Parliament.<sup>17</sup> In 1405, and again in 1438, the Beaulieu manors, because of waste and impoverishment caused by misrule, were put in the hands of trustees.<sup>18</sup>

In April 1538 the abbey and all its possessions were surrendered to the Crown,<sup>19</sup> and, notwithstanding the desires of Arthur Plantagenet Viscount Lisle,<sup>20</sup> they were at once granted to Thomas Wriothesley, afterwards Earl of Southampton.<sup>21</sup> This grant comprised the house and site of the monastery, the church, steeple and churchyard, the manor and the great close of Beaulieu, with another close lying near by, and the three chapels of Boverey, Thorougham and St. Leonards within the limits of the great close, tithes in the grange and farm called Leonards.<sup>22</sup>

In 1544 Wriothesley gave an annuity of £60 from the manor to Richard Cox, clerk,<sup>23</sup> and in the following year one of £100 to Robert Peterson, clerk.<sup>24</sup> He was created Earl of Southampton in 1547 and died in 1550,<sup>25</sup> being succeeded by his only son Henry, who died seised of Beaulieu in 1581.<sup>26</sup> His son Henry, third Earl of Southampton, forfeited all his honours in 1601 for his part in the rebellion of the Earl of Essex. He was restored, however, on the accession of James I, who regranted him the Beaulieu estate,<sup>27</sup> of which he died seised in 1624.<sup>28</sup> His son Thomas, the fourth earl,<sup>29</sup> was a faithful servant of the Stuart cause, and Charles I was often at Beaulieu in the early days of his reign.<sup>30</sup> In August 1635, however, the king laid claim to Beaulieu as Crown property, and in October the earl was deprived by a forest court of land worth £2,000 a year.<sup>31</sup> The following year Charles consented to nullify this unjust decree, granting the earl absolute freedom from the forest laws over the site of the abbey and certain other lands in the manor.<sup>32</sup>

On the earl's death without surviving male issue in 1667 his honours became extinct and Beaulieu passed to his youngest daughter and co-heir Elizabeth, wife firstly of Jocelyn (Percy) eleventh Earl of Northumberland and secondly of Ralph (Montagu) first Duke of Montagu.<sup>33</sup> Thence it passed to the son of the second marriage, John second Duke of Montagu, whose honours became extinct on his death in 1749.<sup>34</sup> Beaulieu was then equally divided between his two daughters and co-heirs, Isabel wife of Sir Edward Hussey (afterwards Hussey-Montagu), created Lord Beaulieu of Beaulieu in 1762 and Earl of Beaulieu in 1784,<sup>35</sup> and Mary wife of George Brudenell, afterwards Montagu, fourth Earl of Cardigan and first Duke of Montagu of a new creation.<sup>36</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The entire property was, however, subsequently vested in Lord Beaulieu,<sup>37</sup> but on his death without issue in 1802 it passed to Elizabeth, only daughter and heir of Lord Montagu (ob. 1790) and wife of Henry (Scott) third Duke of Buccleuch.<sup>38</sup> The estate continued to be held by the Dukes of Buccleuch and Queensberry until 1884, when Walter Francis (Montagu-Douglas-Scott), the fifth duke, left it to his second son Henry John, who was in the following year created Lord Montagu of Beaulieu.<sup>39</sup> His son John Walter Edward (Douglas-Scott-Montagu) second Lord Montagu of Beaulieu is now lord of the manor.

Fairs for horses and cattle are held at Beaulieu on 15 April and 4 September.<sup>40</sup>

A mill is mentioned in 18th-century conveyances of the manor.<sup>41</sup> To-day there is the site of a mill close to Palace House and a corn-mill at the north end of the village.

Two small holdings in OTTERWOOD in this parish are entered in Domesday Book<sup>42</sup> and one in 'Hariforde,' which may be the later HARTFORD.<sup>43</sup> These are entered under Redbridge Hundred and were all three in the New Forest.

The abbey of Beaulieu BEAULIEU ABBEY AND CHURCH was placed in the heart of the New Forest, on the north bank of the River Exe, at a point from which two smaller valleys diverge. It was surrounded by a precinct embracing roughly a square of 58 acres. The inclosing wall is traceable on all but the east side, and was 10 ft. high, 2½ ft. thick, with a gabled coping of small stones. The entrance was at the south-east corner, and the outer and inner gatehouses still remain.

The outer gatehouse has a wide segmental-headed doorway of entrance surmounted by a gable, in which are three loops, and there is a small room for a porter on the east side. Within the gate was a narrow court or lane running direct to the inner gatehouse. On the east side was the mill, of which the south end remains as high as the eaves, but the rest has gone, though the foundations have been traced. The mill was divided in two parts and in both were wheels driven by water, taken in wide culverts from the mill-pond above. Northward was a large barn or garner, of the same width as the mill, and it had a porch on the west side.

The inner gatehouse of 14th-century date has, since the suppression, formed part of a dwelling-house, now known as 'Palace House' and the residence of the Lord Montagu of Beaulieu. It consists of a porch and an inner hall, with a bay on either side of each and a chapel above. The main arch of entrance is flanked by deep buttresses and is surmounted by a canopied niche. There was a small door on the west side for foot passengers, but it has been destroyed by an inserted window. The division wall and the inner face were arranged in the same way as the front except that the main arch in the former is rebated for doors. Both parts of the gatehouse are vaulted, which is a modern restoration and is unusually rich, having wall, cross, ridge, diagonal and two intermediate ribs all moulded, but without bosses. A vice in the middle of the west side leads to the first floor and from thence is continued with a smaller vice up to the roof. The first floor is occupied by two parallel chapels connected with each other by two pointed arches. The northern chapel has a square-headed east window with heavy reticulated tracery and retains its piscina. The southern chapel has a piscina with a locker, and its west window of three lancet lights with attached columns is earlier than the rest of the building.

Within the inner gate was the great court of the abbey containing the guest houses, stables, brewhouse, bakehouse and other buildings, but of these nothing remains except a few scattered foundations at the north end. The chief group of buildings occupied the east side of the court and had the church to the north.

The church was of greater area than any of the Cistercian order in this country. It was 336 ft. in length by 186 ft. across the transepts and in plan was unlike any other English example. The whole building save for the aisle wall next the cloister has been pulled down to the ground, but the foundations remain for the most part and have been completely traced by excavation.

The presbytery was of three bays with an apsidal end, surrounded by two aisles, the outer of which was divided into ten chapels.

The north transept was of four bays with aisles on both east and west sides, and at the north end was another bay forming a porch or galilee similar to that at Cîteaux. The south transept was of the same length as the north, but had only an eastern aisle divided into three chapels. The west wall had in its thickness the night stairs to the dormer, an arrangement only paralleled by those at the daughter house of Hayles. Beyond the transept, in a corresponding position to the galilee, were the vestry and library, which had the south wall of unusual thickness, suggesting that the structural transept extended above them, in which case it would measure 216 ft. from end to end.

The nave was of nine bays with aisles and had an entrance at the west end, inside of which a considerable amount of the tile flooring was found. The wall of the south aisle is 10 ft. thick, with deep arched recesses in each bay towards the cloister in order to reduce the bulk of the wall. Internally each bay is marked by a vaulting column, and above a string-course, 10 ft. from the ground, is recessed about 2 ft. and contains a pair of lancet windows. In the easternmost bay is the processional doorway of three moulded members, and in the eighth bay is another doorway, which is an insertion. The last bay contains marks of the doorway of the stairs to the lay brothers' dormer and another door to a vice in the south-west angle. In the middle of the easternmost bay of the nave was a rough foundation, which must have supported the pulpitum, though its position is further east than might have been expected. No other evidence of internal arrangements has been found, save that in the westernmost bay of the south aisle of the presbytery was the drain from a lavatory.

The cloister was 138 ft. square, and was surrounded by alleys covered with lean-to roofs, supported upon open arcades of Purbeck marble next the garth. In the transept wall is a vaulted recess to contain the common book cupboard.

Next the transept was a long building vaulted in five bays, but divided at the first bay from the west by a cross wall. The western part was the library, opening from the cloister, and the eastern the vestry, entered by a door in the south end of the transept, and contained in its side walls remains of cupboards for vestments.

Southward was the chapter-house, of which the east end has completely gone. The west end is formed of three pointed arches, originally supported by marble shafts. The middle arch was the entrance, and those at the sides had dwarf walls, and were probably subdivided. The chapter-house was vaulted in three spans, carried by marble pillars, and around it was a stone seat raised upon a step.

Next the chapter-house was the parlour, of which scarcely anything remains but its plain segmental arch of entrance from the cloister.

Extending southward from the parlour was the subvault of the dormer, having a row of circular pillars down the middle, of which the base of the northernmost remains. Part of its east wall remains in the present graveyard, together with a fragment of a cross wall at the third bay, but its southern end is uncertain. Above this, and extending over the chapter-house up to the church, was the dormer of the monks, gained by a flight of steps at its north end and another on its west side. Of the latter the lower steps, of quadrant form, remain projecting into the south-east angle of the cloister.

The reredorter, of which nothing but the foundations of its side walls were found, extended eastward from the south end of the dormer, and had the drain, 4 ft. wide, on its south side.

On the south side of the cloister, next the dormer stairs, are the remains of the entrance to the warming-house. This was vaulted in two square bays, and had a hooded fireplace at its west end.

Adjoining the warming-house, but placed north and south, was the frater, now used as the parish church. It was entered from the cloister by a moulded doorway of three members, which retains an original door with its ironwork, and in the gable above are three lancet windows. In the east wall are six tall lancet windows, and in the west four, in two pairs. In the middle of the west side is the pulpit, entered by a wall stair having an open arcade on coupled columns next the frater, and each bay is vaulted. The pulpit has a semi-octagonal stone corbel, carved with leafwork, which supports a front of stone with panelled faces. In the recess behind is a doorway to a vice, contained in a turret, which led to the parapet. At the north end of the west side is the hatch from the kitchen, formed by a depressed arch of three chamfered members. In the north wall, adjoining the hatch, is a large locker, now formed into a window. The frater is covered with an arched rafter-roof of the 14th century divided into bays with transverse ribs, and has longitudinal ribs with bosses at the intersections.

The kitchen occupied the remainder of the south side of the cloister, but of it nothing remains.

Between the frater and warming-house doors are the remains of the lavatory, which, though of the 13th century, is an insertion. It consisted of three open arches, upon columns, projecting from the wall face, and flanked on either hand by splayed arches. The back of the lavatory is recessed into the wall, and has a grooved ledge for the pipe, off which the water was drawn by a row of taps. The basins were segmental on plan, very shallow, and carried on moulded capitals with truncated columns dying into deeply splayed plinths.

On the western side of the cloister was a narrow court or lane, with the long building for the housing of the lay brothers on its west side. This building was originally no less than 264 ft. in length, of which the northern half remains tolerably perfect. On plan it is divided roughly into three parts. The northernmost part was cellage, and is lighted by loops on the west side; between this and the next division is the cloister entry, which has a simple doorway at either end, and is covered with a barrel vault. The second part was apparently the frater of the lay brothers, originally vaulted into six bays, of which the two northern remain, and lighted by deeply splayed lancets on the west. At the north end are two round-headed lockers. Beyond the south wall the main drain of the abbey crossed the range. The third division seems to have been of one story only, and may have been the lay brothers' infirmary, but it was much altered at the suppression, and its arrangements are not clear. Over the northern part and the frater was the dormer of the lay brothers, lighted by narrow loops on the west and approached by a straight stair at the north end from the church and by two pairs of stairs on the east. At the south end was the reredorter, over the drain, but contained within the range, like that for the monks at Kirkstall.

Eastwards of the claustral buildings was the infirmary of the monks, which has completely disappeared above ground, but a considerable amount has been traced by excavation. The great hall was placed north and south, though not parallel to the other buildings, was divided into eight bays by cross arches carried upon piers projecting into the hall, and gained from the parlour next the chapter-house by a wide passage. The fourth bay from the north is narrower than the rest, and probably carried a louvre over a central fire; it had the entrance in its west wall. In the sixth bay on the east side is a small moulded doorway, which led into the chapel. This projected eastward, and had double buttresses to the eastern angles. At the south end of the hall are the remains of a fireplace; there was another in the second bay on the west, and a third in a late wall just beneath the suggested central lantern.

The infirmary kitchen seems to have been at the south end of the hall, but the remains of it are very fragmentary.

In the passage just outside the infirmary door is a block of masonry with moulded base which supported the conduit to which the water supply was brought for dispersal to the various buildings. Immediately opposite are remains of a flight of stairs against the hall wall, which seem to have led to an upper floor over the northern end of the hall itself. On the west side of these steps was an added room, 18 ft. wide but of uncertain length, which in consequence of its position was probably the misericorde or rater where meat was allowed in later monastic days to be taken thrice a week.

One hundred yards northward of the church are the ruins of a large building placed east and west, having a projecting wing to the north. The main portion was a barn or hayloft, over a cellar, the roof of which was carried by a row of wooden posts on either side, dividing it into a nave and aisles. It originally extended a bay and a half further west than the present end. The northern wing was also above a cellar, and from its north end a causeway level with the first floor leads to the high land beyond the precinct still known as 'the vineyards.' For many years this ruin has been called 'the wine-press,' and such seems to have been its use, especially when it is compared with the plan and 16th-century description of that at Clairvaux.

The water supply was obtained from springs, in the high ground east of the abbey, which were collected into a conduit and conveyed thence in lead pipes by gravitation. The conduit is circular on plan, 12 ft. in diameter, with a plain domed ceiling and is entered by a small shouldered doorway on the west side.

The fish stews were arranged up the two small valleys north of the precinct, and there were at least six, four up the north valley and two up the north-east, through which from the spring-head from where the water supply is obtained runs the Shireburn. Each pond is formed by solid earthen banks from one side of the valley to the other, and some appear to have had side channels, so that an upper one could be emptied without interfering with a lower pond. There were also two small stews eastward of the infirmary.

Owing to the convenient position of Beaulieu upon a tidal river, the whole of the building materials could be brought by sea. The freestone for external work came from Binstead, next Quarr Abbey in the Isle of Wight, for internal work from Caen, in Normandy, and the marble for inside capitals, columns and bases from Purbeck. The walling generally was of rubble formed of wasters from the Binstead and Caen blocks mixed with beach boulders, and had freestone dressings throughout, though the church walls seem to have been faced with ashlar both inside and out. The roofs of many of the buildings were covered with slate of a poor quality which probably came from Cornwall. The floors of the important buildings were laid with tiles of a fair quality which seem to have been made near the site, as clay is still dug on the manor which burns to a similar texture. The patterns are various and a quantity are preserved in the floors of two garden houses opposite Palace House.

A number of architectural fragments are preserved in the lay brothers' frater, together with three grave slabs. Of these latter one of the 14th century measures 10 ft. 1½ in. in length by 2 ft. 9 in. in breadth. In the middle is the housing for a brass effigy under a rich canopy which is of white stone inlaid in the slab. Round the edges was an inscription having each letter incised in a little square of white stone; most is obliterated, but that which was on the north reads, 'JESU · CRIST : OMNIPOTENT : FI . . . .' Another slab, also of Purbeck, has the housing of a lady under a cusped canopy and of the inscription '✠ HIC : IACET : YSABELLA : PRIM . . . ' is all that is legible. The third slab is perfectly plain and the inscription is perfect : '✠ DAV | N : WILLAME : DE : CORNWAILLE : | GIST : ICI | : DEV : DE SA = ALME : EIT : PITE : ET : M | ERCI.' He was a Prior of Beaulieu, who was made abbot of the daughter house of Newnham on 12 September 1272 and died at Beaulieu in 1288.<sup>44</sup> There is also a small coffin 1 ft. 11½ in. in length, tapering from 14½ in. to 12½ in. and 9½ in. deep; it contains two heart-shaped sinkings and is covered with a slab 3 in. thick. In one of the sinkings was a green-glazed vase, and the coffin was doubtless for the reception of the heart and entrails of some distinguished person whose body was buried elsewhere.

On the large manor of Beaulieu the monks had granges at Herfords, Otterwood, Bockelodginge and St. Leonards.

Though all but Bockelodginge are represented by farms of the original name, ST. LEONARD'S GRANGE is the only one of which any remains are left, and these consist of a chapel and barn.

The chapel is a detached building of late 13th-century date, of which all the walls remain to their full height, save half that on the north and the east gable. The east window has lost its arch and tracery, but was originally of four lights, and is flanked on either side by a large niche with pinnaced side shafts and trefoiled head, under a straight-sided pediment terminated by a foliated cross. The side walls had each two single-light windows, and on the south side are the remains of a piscina and a locker. There is a similar locker in the north wall. The west end had a pointed doorway and a window of three lights with plate tracery; inside was a gallery 6 ft. wide carried on corbels in either side wall.

A few foundations of uncertain character have been found (1906) on the north side of the chapel, but no other indications of the original buildings remain.

South-eastward from the chapel are the remains of a great barn 216½ ft. long by 61½ ft. wide. Of this the east gable, north wall and part of the south, with half the west gable, remain to their full height. The barn was divided into seven bays by wooden posts, forming a nave with side aisles about 15 ft. wide. Opposite each post were buttresses to the side walls and other larger buttresses opposite each line of posts to the gables. There is a large segmental-headed doorway, with the valves opening outwards, in the middle of the north side, and to the west a smaller door opening inwards. Both doors were protected by a porch, the beginnings of the side walls of which remain as buttresses. The only windows seem to be two narrow square-headed loops high up in each gable.

The plate consists of a silver chalice of 1734, inscribed, 'Pray for the soul of Far Edmond Flanagan who got me made in ye year 1734'; two silver-gilt chalices, one of 1846, the other undated; a silver paten of 1887; two silver-gilt patens of 1846 and 1895; a silver-gilt flagon of 1845, given by Jane Margaret widow of Henry James Lord Montagu of Boughton, in 1846, and a copper-gilt alms plate.

The registers are in six books. The first contains all entries 1654 to 1705; the second baptisms and marriages 1706 to 1745 and burials 1706 to 1734; the third has baptisms and burials 1745 to 1783 and marriages 1745 to 1754, the burials 1734 to 1745 being lost; the fourth has marriages only, 1754 to 1812, and the fifth and sixth baptisms and burials 1783 to 1802 and 1802 to 1812 respectively.

In 1227, twenty-two years after the foundation of the abbey, the church of Beaulieu was completed.<sup>45</sup>

The rectory and advowson were ADVOWSON kept in the king's hands when the Beaulieu lands were given to Wriothesley in 1538. They were, however, granted him in January 1544,<sup>46</sup> and have ever since been held with the manor.<sup>47</sup> Lord Montagu of Beaulieu is the present patron.

Three chapels, those of Boverey, Througham and St. Leonard, were included in the grant to Wriothesley in 1538.<sup>48</sup> The remains of St. Leonard's Chapel are still in existence, and there is the site of another chapel by Park Farm.

The district church of ST. JOHN THE EVANGELIST at Park, of red brick with Bath stone facings, was built in 1906.

There is a school for boys, built in 1858, and a school for girls and infants built in 1841. There is also a mixed school at Park, in the southern extremity of the parish.

The Poor's Money consists of CHARITIES £120 18s. 1d. consols, held by the official trustees, arising from original gift of £70, mentioned in the Parliamentary returns of 1786, by an unknown donor, and accumulations. The yearly dividends, amounting to £3 os. 4d., are distributed at Easter amongst widows and persons having families.

Daniel Elliott, by will dated 24 February 1628, devised an annuity of £40, applicable as to one moiety for the establishment of a lecturer in this parish, and the other moiety for the like purpose in All Hallows, Bread Street, London.

The annuity is charged upon, or issuing out of, lands in the parish of Sturminster Marshall, Dorset, now the property of Mr. George Onslow Churchill, of Alderholt Park, Salisbury.

By an order of the Charity Commissioners of 23 July 1907 the rent-charge is vested in the official trustee of charity lands.

DIBDEN LIBERTY

Depedene (xi cent.); Dupeden (xiv cent.); Debden (xvi cent.).

At the Great Survey and throughout the middle ages Dibden was included in Redbridge Hundred.<sup>1</sup> In 1831 the liberty consisted only of the parish,<sup>2</sup> but Mudie, who published his history of the county in 1838, included also Beaulieu, Fawley and Exbury.<sup>3</sup> The liberty, he wrote, 'occupies the eastern part of the New Forest district; and its form resembles that of a triangle, having its two seaward sides about 8 miles in length each and its landward side about 9 miles. Some parts of the interior are very bare, being upon the worst portion of the crag sand; but the coasts are very beautiful—more so, perhaps, than those of any other part of the district.'<sup>4</sup>

The total area of the parish is 3,270 acres, comprising 471½ acres of arable land, 1,100 acres of permanent grass and 201 acres of woods and plantations.<sup>5</sup> There are also 325 acres of land covered by tidal water and 710 acres of foreshore. The level of the land rarely rises much above 100 ft., the highest parts being to the south in the district of Dibden Purlieu. The soil is sandy and the subsoil of the latest Eocene formation.<sup>6</sup> The chief crops are wheat, barley and oats.

A little cluster of buildings consisting principally of the school and the home farm form the village, the main population being scattered over the parish, which is notable for the large number of farms it contains. The church stands in the north-west with only the rectory and Dibden Farm in its immediate neighbourhood. A mile to the east is Westcliff Hall, and south of that Depedene Brow, the residence of Col. Charles Edward de la Poer Beresford, with grounds of 300 acres. Langdown House, the property and residence of Mrs. Benskin, standing in a considerable park, lies to the south of Hythe, a detached portion of Fawley. The Windmill, the property and residence of Mr. Frederick Hewett, and Purlieu House, the residence of Mr. Arthur Herbert Edwards, are both in the south of the parish.

The site of a Roman road runs along the Denny Lodge boundary.

An Inclosure Act for Dibden was passed in 1790.<sup>7</sup>

Among early place-names may be mentioned 'Thommesheyes' and 'Whetelond'<sup>8</sup> (xiv cent.).

DIBDEN was held by Ode of the MANORS king in 1086. In the time of the Confessor, of whom it had been held by Chetel, it was assessed at 5 hides, but three of these had been taken into the New Forest and only one paid geld in 1086. There were a salt-pan and a fishery in the manor.<sup>9</sup> The overlordship belonged in the 12th century to Reynold de St. Valery,<sup>10</sup> who died in 1166, and his son Bernard de St. Valery, who was killed at the siege of Acon in 1190,<sup>11</sup> is doubtless to be identified with the Bernard who was lord of Dibden in 1167.<sup>12</sup> Descending with his granddaughters to Robert Count of Dreux, it fell, with the rest of the honour of St. Valery, into the hands of the Crown, when it was given to Richard Earl of Cornwall and King of the Romans, the younger brother of Henry III,<sup>13</sup> whose son Edmund Earl of Cornwall died in 1300 seised of a fee there which belonged to the honour of St. Valery, the king being his heir.<sup>14</sup> Dibden was thereafter held of the Crown as of the honour of St. Valery,<sup>15</sup> and afterwards as of the honour of Wallingford,<sup>16</sup> to which the less important lordship had doubtless been attached by the Earl of Cornwall. It was thus held in the reign of Henry VII of Arthur Prince of Wales.<sup>17</sup>

A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE

The demesne of Dibden was early split up into three parts<sup>18</sup> which seem at first to have been looked upon as one manor divided and later as three manors. By a lost charter, confirmed by Henry II, Reynold de St. Valery gave a third of the manor to Edmund and Osbert de Dibden at a yearly rent of 33s. 4d.<sup>19</sup> Edmund's name occurs constantly in the Pipe Rolls of Henry II.<sup>20</sup> Nicholas de Dibden held a third of a fee of Edmund Earl of Cornwall in 1300,<sup>21</sup> and Richard de Dibden was one of the three holders named in the Nomina Villarum of 1316.<sup>22</sup> He died shortly afterwards seised of one-third of the manor and leaving a son and heir Nicholas, aged eighteen months,<sup>23</sup> to whose mother Joan the custody of the estate was ordered to be delivered in June 1316.<sup>24</sup> Nicholas de Dibden was holding in 1346<sup>25</sup> and Thomas de Dibden in 1428.<sup>26</sup> It was presumably this last who closed the male line of the Dibdens, for Agnes daughter and heir of Thomas de Dibden married Edmund Brudenell, who died about 1469.<sup>27</sup> The only child of this marriage was a daughter Alice, who inherited her mother's property and became the wife of Richard Waller of Groombridge (co. Kent), who died in 1486.<sup>28</sup> In 1503 it was found that his son John Waller might without damage grant the manor of Dibden to St. Swithun's Priory at Winchester,<sup>29</sup> but he evidently changed his mind, for it belonged to his grandson Richard Waller on his death about 1551.<sup>30</sup> In 1594 William son of Richard Waller sold the manor, which in 1575 he had mortgaged to Anthony Kempe of London, to William Webbe,<sup>31</sup> who was already lord of the other two manors in Dibden (vide infra). Since that date the three have not been divided and have usually been treated as one manor. In April 1616 William Webbe, who had been knighted, was granted free warren in the manor of Dibden,<sup>32</sup> and in the following June was licensed to hold court leet and view of frankpledge twice in the year there.<sup>33</sup> He died in 1627, leaving an only daughter and heir Rachel wife of Sir John Croke of Chilton (co. Bucks.), on whose issue the manor was settled in remainder.<sup>34</sup> John Croke, son and heir of Sir John and Rachel, had succeeded by 1650<sup>35</sup> and was still holding five years later, when he was begging discharge of a tenement lately held by William Woodson, a recusant, in the manor for which he had already compounded.<sup>36</sup> Direct evidence at this point fails, but it is probable that the manor shortly passed like the advowson to William Churchill, who presented in 1663,<sup>37</sup> and thence to the Harris family,<sup>38</sup> who had the patronage of the living throughout the 18th century. James Harris father of James first Earl of Malmesbury dealt with the manor by fine in 1756,<sup>38a</sup> and the earl presented to the church in 1796.<sup>39</sup> Before the middle of the 19th century it had passed to Edward Nourse Harvey of Over Ross (co. Heref.). A Mr. Ross bought it in 1861,<sup>40</sup> but in the following year sold it to the Romsey Charity Commissioners, the present lords of the manor.<sup>41</sup>

The manor of DIBDEN HANGER derived its distinctive suffix from the family first found holding it. John atte Hanger was apparently seised of this land here in 1276,<sup>42</sup> and on the death of Edmund Earl of Cornwall in 1300 Richard son of Richard atte Hanger held a third of a fee of him in Dibden.<sup>43</sup> This Richard was still holding in 1316<sup>44</sup> and his son and namesake in 1346.<sup>45</sup> By 1422 both this and the manor of Dibden Poleyn (vide infra) had come to the hands of John Hall, who granted them at that date to John Roger or Rogers.<sup>46</sup> Consequently in the 'Aid' of six years later John Rogers junior appears with Thomas de Dibden in the place of Richard atte Hanger and Walter Nott.<sup>47</sup> After the death of John Rogers, his wife Ann, who married

DIBDEN LIBERTY

John Tuchet Lord Audley,<sup>48</sup> held the manor. She died seised of it in 1498, leaving a son Henry Rogers, aged fifty-two, as her heir.<sup>49</sup> In 1544 Sir John Rogers grandson of Henry sold the manors to William Webb,<sup>50</sup> Mayor of Salisbury in 1523 and 1534, who died in 1553.<sup>51</sup> His son William Webbe dealt with the manors in 1554 and 1568<sup>52</sup> and died seised thereof in 1585, leaving a son William,<sup>53</sup> who in 1594 purchased the manor of 'Dibden's Fee,' thus uniting the three estates, which have never since been divided (vide supra).

In 1300 Walter Nott held one-third of a fee in Dibden of the Earl of Cornwall as of the honour of St. Valery.<sup>54</sup> Sixteen years later John Nott was one of the three holders of the vill,<sup>55</sup> and he in 1346 had been succeeded by another Walter.<sup>56</sup> In 1360 Walter Nott, parson of the church of Michelmersh, reserved a messuage and 2 carucates in Dibden from a grant of land which he made to Romsey Abbey.<sup>57</sup> Shortly after this the estate came into the hands of the family which gave it its distinctive name of DIBDEN POLEYN. John Poleyn presented to the church in 1369<sup>58</sup> and again in 1396,<sup>59</sup> and in 1413 a third part of the manor and advowson of Dibden,<sup>60</sup> with six messuages and various lands, was settled on Margaret wife of John Poleyn, with remainder to John Fromond and Maud his wife and the heirs of John Fromond.<sup>61</sup> By 1422 the manor had come, with Dibden Hanger, to the hands of John Hall,<sup>62</sup> and thereafter followed the same descent.

The church of ALL SAINTS CHURCH consists of chancel 21 ft. 3 in. by 13 ft. 9 in., nave 48 ft. 2 in. by 14 ft. 6 in., north aisle 11 ft. wide, south aisle 14 ft. wide and a west tower 14 ft. 9 in. wide and 14 ft. 6 in. deep.

The proportions of the nave suggest that its walls represent those of a 12th-century church, which would have had a small chancel to the east. Early in the 13th century this chancel was replaced by the present one with its wall arcades on each side, which presumably contained 13th-century windows. The chancel arch was built at the same time. Following the chancel, further enlargement of the church was carried out by the addition of the south aisle with the present arcade, and this was in its turn followed by the north aisle and arcade. The north aisle wall has been rebuilt in modern times, and the tower was added in 1884. The east window of the chancel is modern, of three lights in 14th-century style, but the reveal is old and has a continuous wave-mould. On the north wall is a wall arcade of two bays of a single chamfered order. Springing at the east from a half-round shaft with moulded capital in the north-east angle, the middle shaft is half-octagonal, and the west end dies into the west wall of the chancel. In each bay a window has been inserted, probably at a late date, and made up of the trefoiled heads of 14th-century lights which have belonged to windows with tracery over.

The south wall has a similar arrangement of bays, the head of the second being altered to give room for the window. The windows have cinquefoiled lights and blocked spandrels above under a square head; they are probably of late 15th-century date. In this wall is a piscina with pointed head and continuous mouldings of 14th-century date. It is almost on a level with the floor, showing that the chancel was originally considerably lower; the floor of the nave was also somewhat lower than at present, but it seems probable that the chancel floor, following the fall of the ground from west to east, was originally lower than that of the nave.

Below the second window in the south wall is a blocked doorway showing on both faces of the wall, though externally it is only 18 in. wide. It has a low four-centred head of the date of the window, but the jambs may be older. The chancel arch is of two chamfered orders, which originally appear to have died into the wall but in later times have been mutilated. The north arcade is of four bays with arches of two chamfered orders, the responds shafted and with small moulded capitals; the piers are octagonal with moulded capitals; their bases are hidden by the floor.

The south arcade has similar bays and arches, the capitals are a little earlier in date and the responds are half-octagonal with moulded capitals. The west nave wall had apparently been thickened when the present tower arch was added and the tower built, for the outer order overlaps the respond of the arcade. The north aisle has a modern east window of two lights; in the north wall are three windows of two plain lights with a pierced head, almost entirely new, and there is a modern door in the west wall.

The south aisle has a late 13th-century east window of three plain lancets with pierced spandrels. The angle of the reveal is moulded and with the sill is carried down for the aisle altar. In the south wall are three windows of the same date, some portions only having been restored; these three windows have moulded rear arches and jambs. The south door contemporary with the aisle has shallow continuous mouldings consisting of a chamfer between two small flattened rolls. The porch is probably late; it has a stout oak beam on either side laid to serve as a seat. The tower, entirely modern, is in two stages with diagonal buttresses. It has a west window of three lights, a south window of two lights, single-light belfry windows and embattled parapet.

The roofs are modern, the nave having four dormer windows on each side. The south aisle roof however is partly of 17th-century date. The altar rails date from the same century and consist of twisted baluster shafts with a heavy rail; on each side of the gate are carved shields of Croke quartered with Haines. The first window in the north chancel wall has fragments of old glass with the same arms. The opposite window has two pieces of old glass, one a female figure with cloak over the head, the other a male saint, right hand raised in benediction and a book in the left.

In the north aisle is a 17th-century table, to which two panels have been added to form a cupboard. These consist of four pieces of blind tracery of flowing type, the work being good. The font dates from c. 1200, and has a square marble bowl with central stem and a square base. The sides of the bowl show traces of decoration with lines and curves.

In the tower is a 13th-century tomb slab, the edges worked to a hollow chamfer, and with a flowered cross and lobe-shaped leaves along the stem.

In the churchyard are carved headstones, as at Eling, one of 1750 to a Mrs. Wyatt being apparently the prototype of the mariner's tomb at Eling. Busts of the husband and wife are cut above the inscription, with a single heart over them; their four children and a ship are also shown.

The bells are eight in number and modern.

The plate consists of a silver chalice and paten cover, undated, a silver paten of 1696, a silver flagon of 1871 and a pewter tankard-shaped flagon of late 17th-century date.

The earliest book of registers is a printed copy containing baptisms and burials 1750 to 1796, the second the same, 1796 to 1802, the third printed, baptisms 1802 to 1812, the fourth burials 1803 to 1812. There are two printed marriage books, 1754 to 1778 and 1778 to 1812.

While the manor of Dibden was ADVOWSON in three parts the right of presentation belonged to each of the lords in turn.<sup>63</sup> The advowson continued with the manor down to the lordship of the Harrises, who presented throughout the 18th century.<sup>64</sup> In 1838 Joshua Powel presented,<sup>65</sup> but by 1841 the patronage had been acquired by Alexander (Baring) first Lord Ashburton, whose successors held it until 1865. Shortly afterwards it was acquired by Edward Nourse Harvey, formerly lord of the manor. From him it passed in 1894 to the Rev. William Frederic Berry, rector of the parish, from whom it was acquired in 1898 by the Izard trustees, the present patrons.

In 1262 Ralph, the rector, had a dispensation to hold an additional benefice, as Dibden was worth hardly more than ten marks.<sup>66</sup>

In 1291 the church was valued at £16 13s. 4d.,<sup>67</sup> and in 1535 the rectory was worth, beyond reprises, £5 12s. 11d.<sup>68</sup>

In the 14th century licence was granted to reconsecrate the churchyard of Dibden, which had been polluted by bloodshed.<sup>69</sup>

The school has accommodation for 100 children.

There are apparently no endowed charities in this parish.
